This trust was never revoked by Caroline Frances Dillingham during her lifetime. It continued in existence up to the time of her death, and the stock, which was the corpus thereof, was at the time of her death held by the First Wisconsin Trust Company, as trustee under said trust. On March 7, 1922, the last will and testament of Caroline Frances Dillingham, together with three codicils thereto, were admitted to probate in said county, and letters testamentary were on said day issued to the First Trust & Savings Bank of Pasadena, which said institution was appointed executor of the last will and testament of said deceased. In the third codicil to her last will and testament the testatrix disposed of the Dillingham Manufacturing Company stock, held subject to the Wisconsin trust, share by share.

The inheritance tax appraiser, in her "Report of Inheritance Tax Appraiser," filed in the estate proceeding, taxed the persons receiving the Dillingham Manufacturing Company stock upon the value of the amount or number of shares of stock received by each. Objections to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser were filed, and a hearing was had thereon. Upon said hearing the court found that at the death of Caroline Frances Dillingham the said First Wisconsin Trust Company of Milwaukee, and not Caroline Frances Dillingham, was seized and possessed of the preferred capital stock, and 2 shares of the common capital stock of said Dillingham Manufacturing Company. The court further found that—

"Said beneficial interest in the trust of said First Wisconsin Trust Company of Milwaukee, Wis., was not property of which Caroline Frances Dillingham, was seized or possessed at the time of her death, and was not property within the state of California, at the time of the death of said decedent, and did not pass to said legatees mentioned in her last will and testament and the codicils thereto or any of them under the laws of the state of California, but passed to said legatees under the laws of the state of Wisconsin, and by the transfer to them of said shares of stock by said First Wisconsin Trust Company of Milwaukee in the state of Wisconsin."

Pursuant to said findings, the court decreed as follows:

"That a decree fixing inheritance tax be made, wherein it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the transfer of said shares of stock from said trustee to the beneficiaries named in the last will and testament of said Caroline Frances Dillingham is not a taxable transfer under the laws of the state of California, and more particularly the Inheritance Tax Act of the state of California (chapter 821, Statutes 1921)."

This appeal is taken from the decree made and entered by said court determining the amount of inheritance tax on the shares or interest in said estate, and ordering a refund of the $4,855.91 paid by the executor of the estate, in the course of administration, as inheritance tax upon the transfer of the aforesaid shares of stock.

[1] Upon the hearing of the objections to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser in the lower court, no oral evidence whatever was offered or received, but all of the files, records, and papers in the estate were introduced in evidence. A search of the record before us fails to reveal any evidence to support the finding of the court to the effect that the said shares continued to be owned by and to stand in the name of said First Wisconsin Trust Company of Milwaukee, until the same were transferred by said company to the order of the persons designated in the codicil of the last will and testament of said Caroline Frances Dillingham. Nor is there to be found any evidence supporting the finding of the court below that the executors of the last will and testament of Caroline Frances Dillingham did not at any time take possession of the said shares of stock, or the certificates representing the same. The only evidence contained in the record upon this phase of the case is contrary to the findings. It is found in the "First and Final Account, Report and Petition for Distribution," in which the First Trust & Savings Bank of Pasadena, Cal., as executor of the estate of Caroline Frances Dillingham, deceased, represents itself as chargeable with the shares of the preferred and common capital stock of the Dillingham Manufacturing Company "issued in the name of First Trust & Savings Bank of Pasadena, Cal., executor of the estate of Caroline Frances Dillingham, deceased." It would seem, therefore, that the finding upon this particular phase of the case is not supported by the evidence adduced upon the hearing of the objections to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, and that the evidence does show that the certificates of stock in question were, subsequent to the death of Caroline Frances Dillingham, and during the course of the administration of her estate, indorsed over, by the First Wisconsin Trust Company, to the First Trust & Savings Bank of Pasadena, Cal., executor of the estate of Caroline Frances Dillingham, deceased, and new stock certificates issued to and in the name of said executor.

The question presented here for determination is whether Caroline Frances Dillingham, under the facts hereinbefore stated, was "seized or possessed" of the 900 shares of the preferred capital stock and 2 shares of the common capital stock of the Dillingham Manufacturing Company, held by the First Wisconsin Trust Company subject to the trust created by her, and did transfer the same by her last will and testament to the persons therein designated, within the meaning of section 2 and subdivision 1 of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1921. Stats. 1921, c. 821, p. 1500. Said section and subdivision read as follows:

"Sec. 2. A tax shall be and is hereby imposed upon the transfer of any property, real, personal or mixed, or of any interest therein or income therefrom in trust or otherwise, to persons, institutions or corporations, not hereinafter exempted, to be paid to the treasurer of the proper county, as hereinafter directed, for the use of the state, said taxes to be upon the market value of such property at the rates hereinafter prescribed and only upon the excess over the exemptions hereinafter granted, in the following cases:

"(1) When the transfer is by will or by the intestate or homestead laws of this state, from any person dying seized or possessed of the property while a resident of the state. * * *"

It is conceded at the outset by appellant that during the period of the trust the legal title to the property was in the trustee, and that at the time of the death of Caroline Frances Dillingham she was not "seized" of the trust property within the meaning of the above provision of the California law. Appellant maintains, however, that Caroline Frances Dillingham was "possessed" of the property, within the meaning of said provision, because she owned the entire beneficial interest in the property which was the corpus of the trust—the right to receive the income thereon, until the trust was terminated, the right to terminate the trust at pleasure, and in addition the right to dispose of the corpus by will, which right she exercised and accomplished through the third codicil to her last will and testament. In this behalf appellant argues that immediately upon the death of the testatrix, when the will took effect and the trust terminated, the beneficial interest, transmitted and transferred by her, ripened into a perfect legal title to the property in question by reason of the fact that at that moment the trust terminated and the legal title no longer stood in the trustee, and that the actual transfer under the third codicil of the will of decedent's beneficial interest in and to the trust property carried with it the legal title to the property; the trust having been terminated thereby and the trustee divested of the legal title to said property.

The words "seized" and "possessed," as used in the provision of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1921 governing and controlling in the instant case, are used disjunctively and not conjunctively; the act reading "seized or possessed." The transfer is therefore liable for taxation if the testatrix died "possessed" of the property, regardless of whether or not she died "seized" of the property. It is to be noted that the transfer which is subject to the tax is not only the transfer of the legal title to the property, but also "any interest therein."

[2] "Possessed" is a variable term, and has different meanings as it is used in different circumstances. It may, for example, imply no more than a corporal having. On the other hand, it is commonly employed to indicate ownership of any kind of property. Having in mind the nature and purpose of the statute under discussion, the word "possessed" could not have been used in the sense of mere "corporal having," for obviously no tax could have been intended to be levied on a mere transfer of actual physical possession. Webster's New International Dictionary gives the definition of the verb "possess" as "to have and to hold as property; to have a just right; to be master of, to own. * * *" It was in this sense, we think, that the word "possessed" was used in the instant case, with the intent to indicate a character of ownership falling short of seizin. Used in that sense, there can be no escape from the conclusion, it seems to us, that Caroline Frances Dillingham, at the time of her death, was possessed of an interest in the property transferred by her will. She owned exclusively every beneficial interest therein, immediate and prospective. She had the control over the whole beneficial interest. She had the absolute right of ownership, both legal and beneficial, if she chose to revoke the trust. In short, she had not only an interest in the income from the property, but she, as creator of the trust with a reservation of the right of revocation, had a beneficial interest in the corpus of the trust itself.

[3] It was not, we think, the intention of the Legislature to tax merely the transfer of property to which the transferor had legal title and exempt from taxation property which was temporarily held in trust by another for his exclusive use and benefit. Such a construction would open up an easy way for the evasion of taxes and prevent the collection of any inheritance tax by the state. Such a construction would lead to the illogical result that property which the transferor owned and had in actual possession would be liable to a tax in the hands of the transferee, regardless of the fact that the transferor might have incumbered such transfer by trust provisions and the transferee be entitled only to a beneficial interest in the property, whereas property of the transferor held subject to a trust for his exclusive use and benefit is not liable for the tax in the hands of a transferee, who by the transfer became entitled, not only to a beneficial interest, but to the legal interest as well.

[4, 5] The theory upon which the inheritance tax is imposed and sustained is that the state which confers the privilege of succeeding to property may attach thereto the condition that a portion of the property shall be contributed to that state. Estate of Bowditch, 189 Cal. 377, 379, 208 P. 282, 23 A. L. R. 735; In re Wilmerding, 117 Cal. 281, 284, 49 P. 181. There can be no question in the instant case but that the transfer was accomplished through the third codicil to the testatrix's last will and testament. Indeed, it is conceded by respondents that "the property passed to the beneficiaries by a clause of the codicil." The testatrix, by the instrument of trust, designated her will, or in the case of her intestacy, the laws of succession of the state of California, as the source of title for the transferees. This was clearly the intent and purpose of the provision that, unless previously revoked by her, upon her death the trustee shall "distribute and convey the trust fund and any undistributed income thereof after its deduction, to the executor or administrator of the said donor." There is, therefore, in existence no other instrument other than the will passing or purporting to pass the interest of the testatrix to the transferees. There can be no question, it seems to us, therefore, but that the transfer of the property was accomplished by the will, the efficacy of which depended upon the authority of the state of California. In the ultimate analysis a necessary incident to the transfer of the interest depended for its efficacy upon the laws of the state of California, and was for that reason liable for the imposition by the state of a tax upon said transfer. Bullen v. Wisconsin, 240 U. S. 625, 36 S. Ct. 473, 60 L. Ed. 830.

The case at bar is distinguishable from the case of Estate of Bowditch, supra, cited by respondents in support of their contention. In the Bowditch Case, one J. Ingersoll Bowditch died a resident of the state of Massachusetts, where his will was admitted to probate and his estate distributed. By his will certain personal property was bequeathed to Massachusetts trustees in trust, to pay the net income derived therefrom to Charlotte Bowditch during her life, and upon her death to convey the corpus and remainder of said property to such person or persons in such way or manner as said Charlotte Bowditch should direct in and by her last will and testament. The trustees, in accordance with this direction, paid the income from the property to Charlotte Bowditch during her lifetime, and, upon her death in California, where she had established her residence, transferred the property to certain persons named in her last will and testament. The court in that case held that, inasmuch as the imposition of the inheritance tax was predicated upon the theory that the state required a compensation in the form of an inheritance tax for the privilege which it conferred of succeeding to the property, and no necessary incident of transfer depended for its efficacy upon the laws of California in that particular situation, the transfer made by Charlotte Bowditch was not taxable in California. As we have before indicated, the transfer in this case was dependent upon the laws of the state of California. In the Bowditch Case the interest of the transferees was derived from the will of J. Ingersoll Bowditch, probated in Massachusetts. The will made by Charlotte Bowditch merely designated those entitled to take under the will of J. Ingersoll Bowditch. As pointed out in that case, had the will of J. Ingersoll Bowditch designated some other method of appointment or had specified, for instance, a will invalid under the laws of California, nevertheless the interest would have been transferred. In that situation it could not rightly be said that the transfer of interest was dependent upon the laws of the state of California.

In short, the distinction between the two cases rests upon the fundamental reasons for the imposition of an inheritance tax, a resort to the sovereignty of the state for a transfer of an interest. In the Bowditch Case no such resort was had, and no tax could be imposed. In the instant case resort to the sovereignty of the state is necessary, and a tax is therefore proper and permissible.

Judgment reversed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF CARUTHERS v. CLIFTON. (Civ. 5144.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 8, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1925.)

1. Bills and notes ⟸227—Defendant liable in damages, where breaching promise to indorse note of another.

Defendant, who promised to indorse note of another in consideration of a renewal of a loan by plaintiff to such other, was liable in damages on breach of such promise.

2. Bills and notes ⟸227—Immaterial that defendant did not accept plaintiff's offer, where plaintiff accepted defendant's offer to indorse note with another.

Where plaintiff asked defendant to indorse note, offering to extend loan, and defendant replied that he would indorse "with H.," that defendant did not accept plaintiff's offer was immaterial, where plaintiff accepted defendant's offer within a reasonable time and before its withdrawal by extending loan, making new note, which H. indorsed, and presenting it to defendant for indorsement.

3. Bills and notes ⟸227—Prospective indorser on note held not prejudiced because coindorser appended his name thereto as guarantor.

Where defendant promised to indorse a note with another, that such other appended his name to note as guarantor, held not prejudicial to defendant, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2807, 3147, where both maker of note and such other were insolvent, and note could not be collected from either of them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by the First National Bank of Caruthers against U. J. Clifton. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur Allyn, of Fresno, for appellant.

Milton M. Dearing, of Fresno, and Robert M. Thomas, of Berkeley, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. Defendant has appealed from a judgment against him in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for breach of a contract by which defendant promised to indorse the note of the Bethel Vineyard Company in consideration of a renewal of a loan by the plaintiff bank to said company.

The trial court has found that on the 24th day of November, 1922, Bethel Vineyard Company was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,000 upon two promissory notes; that at the time Bethel Vineyard Company was a vendee under a contract to purchase from defendant certain real property in the county of Fresno; that said Bethel Vineyard Company upon said day applied to plaintiff for an extension of said loan for one year; that plaintiff was unwilling to grant such extension of said loan in the form in which said loan then stood and upon the security plaintiff then had, but said Vineyard Company represented to plaintiff that, if it would grant such extension of said loan, said company would give to plaintiff a new note for said loan, and that one K. Horita and the defendant, U. J. Clifton, would indorse such new note, and that said Vineyard Company would give to plaintiff for the purpose of securing said note a crop order on the Raisin Growers' Association for 40 per cent. of the proceeds of the raisin crop produced upon the land during the year 1923, and that said defendant would indorse said order; that plaintiff agreed to extend said loan for one year upon the same conditions, and thereupon, and on the same day, plaintiff addressed and mailed to defendant the following letter:

"We are informed that you are the owner of the land which is being operated by the Bethel Vineyard Company. They owe us at the present time $1,000, and do not seem to have received crop sufficient to liquidate the loan this year and ask for an extension. We do not feel justified in carrying this another year under the present security, as they are only purchasing it under contract, and understand that they still owe you $13,000 and interest. Therefore, we have agreed to renew the loan for another year, if you will indorse the note with a crop order on the 1923 crop for the 40% they are to receive, as we feel that you are amply protected in the matter, as you have it under your thumb, so as to speak, that they will have to pay over the money.

"Mr. Horita was in today and I agreed to renew the loan with that understanding, while we must say that we are reluctant about renewing it, as $700 has now matured the second fall."

A few days later the foregoing letter was returned to plaintiff by defendant with the following statement, signed by defendant, written on the back of said letter:

"I will indorse the note with a crop order for the 40% of the crop of 1923 with Mr. Horita."

It was further found that upon receipt of this communication from defendant plaintiff extended said loan for one year, and made out a new note therefor, and said Horita indorsed the new note, which is set forth in the findings; that in extending the loan plaintiff relied upon defendant's agreement to indorse the note, and the extension was made within a reasonable time after defendant's said promise to indorse the note, and before any notice of the withdrawal of defendant's agreement had been received by plaintiff, and that within a reasonable time thereafter plaintiff presented a new note to defendant, and requested defendant to indorse said note; that defendant failed and refused to indorse said note in any manner or form, and still fails and refuses to do so; that said note has never been paid, and the Bethel Vineyard Company and Horita are insolvent, and the note cannot be collected from either of them; that in August, 1923, defendant brought an action against the Bethel Vineyard Company to quiet his title to said property, and took possession of the crops upon said land, and delivered them to the Sun Maid Raisin Company, and has collected all the proceeds of said crops.

[1-3] Appellant admits that there is ample authority fixing liability for damages upon one who breaches his promise to indorse a negotiable instrument, if his promise be supported by a sufficient consideration. In the instant case defendant promised to indorse the note as a consideration for the extension of the loan. He wrote, agreeing to do so "with Mr. Horita." Acting upon this offer, the bank renewed the loan, canceling the old notes and accepting a new note of the company upon which appears the signature of K. Horita. This note was presented to defendant for his signature. According to his own testimony, he refused either to "indorse or guarantee or sign it in any way." Later, when defendant called at the bank and was asked by one of its officers to indorse the note, he refused again, and the court has found that defendant refused to indorse said note in any manner and form. These facts are so simple that there scarcely seems to be a basis for argument about many of the matters discussed in the brief for appellant. It is strenuously contended that, since plaintiff asked defendant to indorse the note, and he replied that he would indorse "with Mr. Horita," he did not accept plaintiff's offer. Conceding this, it is nevertheless true that, after defendant agreed to indorse "with Horita," the bank accepted this offer by acting upon it within a reasonable time and before its withdrawal, according to the findings. It is next contended that Horita did not indorse the note; that his signature was appended to the note as a guarantor. Horita's signature appears on the note after the following statement:

"For value received, I hereby guarantee payment of the within note at maturity, or at any time hereafter, with interest at the rate of eight per cent. per annum until paid, waiving demand, notice of nonpayment and protest."

Defendant's complaint seems to be that Horita assumed even a larger responsibility than he would have assumed as an indorser, all of which was to the benefit of defendant. As a general indorser, Horita would have engaged that on due presentment the instrument should be accepted and paid, and that, if it was dishonored, and the necessary proceedings on dishonor were duly taken, he would pay the amount thereof to the holder. Section 3147, Civ. Code. But Horita signed a contract, making himself liable immediately upon default of the principle, and without demand or notice. Section 2807, Civ. Code. The greater liability must include the lesser, and in the contract of guaranty every liability of an indorser was included and some of an indorser's privileges abrogated.

If it be contended that the contract could not be varied in any particular, even to the advantage of the defendant, we are faced with a situation where no prejudice resulted to defendant by treating Horita's guaranty as a general indorsement upon the note, because the court has found that both the maker of the note and Horita are insolvent, and that the note cannot be collected from either of them. Therefore defendant has not been prejudiced by reason of the fact that Horita was not, strictly speaking, an indorser. Defendant had as much right against Horita as a guarantor as he would have had against him as a prior indorser, and neither right had any value when he was insolvent. In other words, since Horita was insolvent, whether he was a prior indorser or a guarantor, defendant would have been called upon to pay the note had he fulfilled his contract and indorsed the same. The judgment awards to plaintiff, as damages for breaching this contract, the amount of the note and interest which plaintiff has been unable to collect either from the maker or the guarantor.

There are no other matters requiring discussion, and the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SANDERS. (Cr. 1254.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 23, 1925.)

1. Assault and battery ⟸91—Robbery ⟸24(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for aiding and abetting robbery and assault.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction for aiding and abetting in crime of robbery and assault.

2. Criminal law ⟸1169(2)—Evidence in prosecution for robbery and assault as to means employed by police in locating guilty persons, though hearsay, held not prejudicial.

Where, in prosecution for robbery and assault in taxicab, witness testified as to number of taxicab, and police testified to finding such taxicab with blood upon the floor, running board, and fenders, and on a bar therein, testimony of town marshal that another person reported to him the number of the taxicab which prosecuting witness had given such person, though hearsay, was not prejudicial.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃1036(1)—Objection to admission of testimony not considered when no objection made below.

Objection to admission of testimony will not be considered on appeal, when no objection was made in the lower court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Elizabeth Sanders was convicted of robbery and assault, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Philip M. Zwerin and Frank J. Hennessy, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment entered upon a verdict of a jury finding her guilty of the crimes of robbery and assault.

The prosecuting witness, W. R. Brookes, lived in Downieville, Cal. He came to San Francisco and met defendant about a week before the date of the commission of the crimes charged, which was October 20, 1924. On said date, he had breakfast with her at a restaurant in San Francisco, and while there wrote out a check for $200. He then called for a taxicab, and defendant asked that No. 102 of the Checker Taxicab Company be called. This taxicab arrived, driven by Jack O'Connor, who was also charged with assaulting and robbing Brookes. Defendant and Brookes were driven to the bank, where defendant cashed his check. That afternoon Brookes and the defendant went to the theater together, and then went on a shopping tour in the taxicab driven by O'Connor, and then to a restaurant for dinner and to the apartment of the defendant. O'Connor was invited into the apartment also, and the trio drank intoxicating liquor. Later, Brookes was driven by O'Connor to a club where more intoxicating liquor was consumed by them, and then Brookes was driven to his hotel. He testified that he dismissed the taxicab and prepared to leave the hotel and return to his home. Before he had completed his arrangements for departure, the defendant in the taxicab called for him again, and asked him to go for a ride with her, and he consented. Driven by O'Connor, they went to the beach, where O'Connor purchased some whisky. Brookes said that several times he asked to be taken back to his hotel so that he might return to his home, and that O'Connor always replied, "On the way, Chief" The defendant urged Brookes to go to the Sixteen-Mile House, and he objected. O'Connor continued driving away from San Francisco, and when they were in San Mateo county near the Tanforan racetrack, Brookes became conscious that defendant had her hand in his pocket. He protested, and, in his own language, "started to bawl her out." He stated that, upon his protests, O'Connor suddenly stopped the taxicab; that Brookes attempted to get out of it, and O'Connor hit him over the head with something; that he struck him several times until he became unconscious, and the next thing he was conscious of was of being in the hospital. He stated that he had about $180 and three gold nuggets in his possession and also certain papers at the time he was struck by O'Connor. When he was picked up along the road by a passing automobile, these articles had been taken from him. The hospital records show Brookes was admitted there at 1:15 a. m. on October 21st, suffering from several cuts in his head. The next morning, the police officers located the taxicab. They arrested O'Connor and took him to the apartment of the defendant. She refused to admit them, and they were compelled to force an entrance. They found her in bed. She had over $80 in her purse; and in the garbage container in her apartment was found a torn labor claim with reference to work at Brookes' mine, and bearing his name, which he stated he had with him in the taxicab on the night of the assault. O'Connor and defendant were taken to the police station in an automobile, and when they left this vehicle two gold nuggets were found hidden under the seat which they had occupied during the ride.

[1] There are other circumstances in the case all indicating the guilt of the defendant. We have only recited the outstanding facts, and they are sufficient to convict the defendant of aiding and abetting the felony, and she is punishable as a principal. Section 971, Pen. Code.

[2] The only other point made upon the appeal is that error was committed in the admission of certain hearsay testimony. This testimony was given by the marshal of the town of San Bruno. He testified that he sent his "night man" to the hospital to see Brookes, and that the "night man" reported to him a number of a taxicab which Brookes had given him and that he (the marshal) telephoned that number to the detective bureau in San Francisco. It is contended that this testimony is hearsay. Conceding that it was not admissible, it is, nevertheless, not prejudicial. It is not necessary in the record to sustain the conviction. Brookes testified at the trial that the taxicab in which he was riding was No. 102. The police testified to finding that taxicab the morning after the assault, with blood upon the floor, running board and fenders; that in the taxicab was also found a bar about a foot long, which was covered with blood, and also a bottle of whisky; that one of the windows was broken. It was unnecessary for the state to prove how the police followed the trail of the crime and located the taxicab and the guilty persons, and therefore the testimony that Brookes gave the number to the marshal's assistant, and that he repeated it to the marshal, etc., was immaterial and could not have been prejudicial.

The story of Brookes alone sustains the conviction, and the other evidence in the case is merely corroborative of that story. He positively identified the defendant, and she admitted being in the taxicab with him at the time of the assault, but denied she had put her hands into his pockets or that she had received any part of the spoils. She said she was frightened and helpless, and that after O'Connor had injured Brookes and put him out of the taxicab, she had asked to be driven to her home, and that she had no part in the crime. From all the facts and circumstances, the jury disbelieved her, and there is nothing in the record which warrants the interference of this court without its verdict.

[3] The other objections of appellant to the admission of testimony are without merit. There was no objection made at the trial to the testimony of which complaint is made.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BLACK et al. (Cr. 1154.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 29, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1144(12)—Confessions will be presumed properly admitted, where evidence as to coercion is conflicting.

Admission, in evidence, of confessions claimed to have been secured by coercion, will be assumed proper on appeal, where evidence upon coercion is in conflict.

2. Criminal law ⟸736(2)—Whether confessions voluntary decided by court before admission, but jury not bound thereby.

Before admitting confession for consideration of jury, judge must determine whether it was free and voluntary, but, when admitted, the jury is not bound by such determination, but may determine that it was not voluntary, and therefore refuse to consider it.

3. Criminal law ⟸781(5)—Refusal of instruction that jury must believe confessions were voluntarily made error.

Where confessions of accused had been introduced over his objection that they were secured by coercion, on determination of trial court that they were free and voluntary, though evidence thereof was conflicting, refusal to instruct jury that, before that body could consider confessions, they must believe that they were voluntarily made, and explaining what was meant by voluntarily, held error.

4. Criminal law ⟸763, 764(19)—Instruction that jury were not to consider whether confession was voluntary or not held error.

Where confession of accused had been admitted over objection that it was not voluntary, instructions to jury that question whether it was made voluntarily was one to be passed on by the court, and that court had decided that the confession was voluntary, held error.

5. Criminal law ⟸1137(3)—Accused may not object to instruction which he has requested.

Accused may not object to an instruction which he has requested.

6. Criminal law ⟸1038(2)—Accused held not to have waived objection to refusal to allow jury to consider whether confession was free or voluntary.

Although, throughout trial, counsel for accused assumed that determination as to whether confession was voluntary was for trial court, and not for jury, where he requested an instruction requiring jury to find confession voluntary before considering it, he was entitled to complain of its refusal.

7. Criminal law ⟸535(2)—Corpus delicti must be proved aside from confession.

The corpus delicti in every criminal case must be proven by evidence aside from any confession or admission of accused.

8. Burglary ⟸10—Facts held not to show burglary in first degree.

Where property burglarized was not inhabited, it being merely a dry goods store, and evidence did not show that burglary was committed during the night, or that burglars were armed with a deadly weapon, but only that it was committed between seven in the evening and 10 or 11 the next morning, and that burglars took certain guns found in safe in store, conviction for burglary in first degree was unwarranted, under Pen. Code, § 460.

9. Criminal law ⟸317—To allow jury to draw inferences from silence of witness, who refused to answer because he might incriminate himself, held error.

Where building was burglarized through hole in floor of hotel room, and occupant, who was under arrest, but not on trial, refused to testify on ground that it might incriminate himself, though questioned at considerable length, court's statements that jury might draw inferences from such refusal, and refusal to admonish jury that district attorney's remark to that effect was erroneous, held error.

10. Criminal law ⟸814(1)—Instruction allowing jury to consider opportunity of another to commit crime, and his proximity to place of commission, properly refused.

In burglary prosecution, requested instruction that, in determining whether evidence pointed to guilt of another as strongly as to accused, jury could consider that such other was near place of commission, and could consider whether he did not have same opportunity to commit crime, held properly refused; it being incorrect to embark jury upon inquiry as to whether another was near where crime was committed, or had same opportunity to commit it as accused had.

11. Criminal law ⟸830—Instruction, partially incorrect, is properly refused.

An instruction, not correct in its entirety exactly as requested, is properly refused.

12. Criminal law ⟸1186(4)—Refusal to allow jury to consider whether confession was voluntary held prejudicial.

In prosecution for burglary, over refusal of court to allow jury to consider question of coercion, in procuring confession, held prejudicial, within Const. art. 6, § 4½, in view of seeming credibility of accused's testimony as to coercion and fact that confession constituted bulk of evidence.

13. Criminal law ⟸1186(4)—Errors of court in permitting jury to draw inferences from refusal of witness to testify prejudicial.

In prosecution for burglary error of trial court, in permitting jury to draw inference against accused from refusal of witness to answer questions because they might incriminate himself, held prejudicial error as to one count, notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 4½.

14. Criminal law ⟸1186(4)—Errors of trial court concerning rulings on evidence not reversible, where conviction would have been reached on other evidence.

In prosecution for burglary on three counts, evidence as to one count held to require conviction, so that errors of trial court as to rulings on evidence did not require reversal, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

15. Criminal law ⟸1186(4)—District attorneys and trial judges should conduct trial without relying on constitutional provision, saving conviction where errors would not have changed result.

District attorneys and trial judges, in prosecuting cases, should conduct them as faithfully and diligently as if Const. art. 6, § 4½, saving conviction where errors at trial would probably not have changed result, did not exist, and should not depend upon saving grace of that section.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Jack Black and Homer France were convicted of burglary on three counts. From the judgment of conviction, and from an order denying motion for new trial, they appeal. Judgment and order under first and third counts reversed. Judgment and order under second count affirmed.

Harold Ide Cruzan, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and J. L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendants were charged with the crime of "burglary with explosives" under an information in three counts. The designated crime is thus defined and denounced:

"Any person who, with intent to commit crime, breaks and enters, either by day or night, any building, whether inhabited or not, and opens or attempts to open any vault, safe or other secure place by use of nitroglycerine, dynamite, gunpowder or any other explosive, shall be deemed guilty of burglary with explosives." Pen. Code, § 464.

The first count of the information charged an entry into a store, building, or room of one Solomon, the second count related to an entry into property of a similar character of one Tarter, and the third count charged the offense by way of entry into like premises of one Fares. These several charges will hereafter be referred to, respectively, as the Solomon count, the Tarter count, and the Fares count. Defendants were found guilty as charged under the Solomon and Tarter counts. Upon the Fares count the verdict as to each of the defendants reads:

That the jury finds him "guilty of burglary, a felony, a lesser offense contained within the charge of burglary with explosives as charged in count 3 of the information, and find it to be burglary of the first degree."

As one of the points made for a reversal of the judgment of conviction renders necessary an examination of the statute defining burglary of the first degree, we here set it forth:

"Every burglary of an inhabited dwelling house or building committed in the nighttime, and every burglary, whether in the daytime or nighttime, committed by a person armed with a deadly weapon, or who, while in the commission of such burglary, arms himself with a deadly weapon, or who, while in the commission of such burglary assaults any person, is burglary of the first degree." Pen. Code, § 460.

The defendants appeal from the whole of the judgment of conviction, and from an order of the trial court denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] The trial court received in evidence certain confessions made by appellants. It is contended that these confessions should not have been received, that they were not free and voluntary, in fact, that they were secured through duress and coercion. There was much testimony by appellants, it is true, upon which the trial judge might justly have reached the conclusion that the confessions were not free and voluntary, and he might therefore justly have excluded them, but there was evidence directly to the contrary, and in our opinion the whole question resolves itself into one merely of conflicting evidence; the determination of the result of the conflict resting finally in the trial court. Both appellants testified upon the point. The alleged coercion was said by them to have arisen from the claim by officers of the law that France had committed a murder at Deming, in the state of New Mexico, and was being sought for extradition upon a charge in that regard. It was also said that the officers had insisted that Black had knowledge of the Deming affair, or was in some complicity concerning it. France testified:

"I asked them [the officers], if I signed a confession to that job on Spring street [involved in one of the charges here], that would I get out of it. They said they would clear me up on Deming, if I would sign a confession in this one, and I said, 'Well, that would be all right with me.' That was all that was said. I gave that statement to keep out of [New] Mexico; that was all."

Black testified that one of the officers said they had evidence against France in the case at Deming, and asked:

"Would you rather go back there and stand trial for murder or take a few years here, and we will have that dropped?"

He also said:

That one of the officers "said he would drop that murder charge and they would have it fixed up so it would only be one charge come into court."

The testimony of both the appellants was controverted by the officers. They admitted that the Deming affair was mentioned in conversations they had with appellants, but they denied that any inducements whatever were held out to appellants in connection with that event. The evidence upon the point being in conflict, it must be assumed that the confessions were properly admitted. People v. Castello (Cal. Sup.) 229 P. 855.

[2] Notwithstanding the fact that the ruling of the trial judge in admitting the confessions must be upheld, there yet remains to be discussed a question of great moment in connection with the same matter. Throughout the trial the judge evinced an incorrect understanding of the respective functions of judge and jury then dealing with evidence touching the question whether confessions are free and voluntary; but, upon the heels of this declaration, attention must be drawn to the fact that counsel for appellant long labored under the same misapprehension, and encouraged, aided, and abetted the judge in perpetuating it. Before we exhibit the state of the record upon this situation, it may be well to state the rule which regulates the respective functions of judge and jury when the question of the admissibility of a confession arises in a criminal case. The judge must determine, first, and as a matter of course, whether the confession was free and voluntary, and whether, therefore, it is to be heard by the jury. Notwithstanding, however, the settlement of this question, which is merely preliminary, and which bears solely upon the matter of the admissibility of the confession, as already indicated, there is yet a function to be exercised by the jury concerning it. In allowing the confession to go to the jury, the judge has ruled, it is true, that it was freely and voluntarily made, but the ruling in no way binds the jury. That body, now considering the matter substantively, may disregard the view of the judge made evident by his permitting the confession to be heard, and may, as the trier of all final questions of fact in the case, conclude that the confession was not free and voluntary, and may therefore refuse to consider it. We may therefore have this situation when a confession is sought to be used in a criminal prosecution: The judge may decide that the confession was freely and voluntarily made and, if he does, will allow it to be received in evidence; but the jury may, upon the same evidence, determine that it was not so made, and may refuse to consider it. Without going into the list of earlier cases on the subject, the rule is sufficiently indicated in People v. Zarate, 54 Cal. App. 372, 201 P. 955, and People v. Fouts, 61 Cal. App. 242, 214 P. 657, in which latter case we said:

That the jury "is always to determine in the last analysis whether a confession is freely and voluntarily made."

[3] We now come to a statement of those portions of the record showing not only the extent to which the trial judge departed from this well-settled rule, but the degree in which appellants aided him in the fault. Early in the trial the question arose as to the circumstances under which the confessions had been given. A police officer testified that appellant France had made a statement to him at a certain time and place. The officer said that the statement was free and voluntary, and that it was not induced by threats or violence, or by offers of reward or immunity. He was next asked to state his conversation with France. Then the following transpired:

"Mr. Cruzan [of counsel for appellants]: One moment. * * * Now in that matter * * * we ask that the statements—that your honor has the right to take the testimony as to any statements out of the hearing of the jury, to ascertain whether or not they were free and voluntary, and the proper foundation first has to be laid, and we ask * * * that the jury be excluded to take testimony * * * as to any and all purported statements on behalf of the defendants, or on the part of the defendants, so that we can determine right now as to the admissibility of any statements."

The jury was then excluded, not for the purpose of taking testimony on the question whether France's statement was freely and voluntarily made, but for the consideration of argument upon counsel's request for their exclusion for that purpose. In the midst of the discussion upon the merits of the request the following occurred:

"Mr. Cruzan: * * * The question as to whether or not any threats or duress or any thing of that kind was urged against the defendant is absolutely a matter within the discretion of the trial court.

"The Court: I think that is correct.

"Mr. Cruzan: The trial court takes the evidence as to the admissibility of the testimony.

"The Court: In the absence of the jury?

"Mr. Cruzan: He can do that, because there is a matter for your honor to decide, and that is the question that your honor has to try. It is an issue of law.

"The Court: Well, I would like to see the authorities on that, because I believe that that is a good, sound principle. * * *

"Mr. Cruzan: * * * That this purported confession was obtained by threatening to take these two boys back to [New] Mexico and try them for a charge of murder. Now, to bring that out before the jury would be most damaging, * * * it being a matter strictly within the province of the trial court, and the trial court being the only one to pass upon the matter, there is no question about it, that it should be heard out of the presence of the jury. * * * The jury is excluded time and again on motions, in order to give counsel particular latitude to argue points, so that statements that are made do not go in the untrained mind of the juror as evidence.

"The Court: I do not think there is any controversy that it is the province of the trial court to determine the admissibility of that confession."

This last statement of the judge, proper enough when considered alone, was improper when viewed in the light of the context leading up to it. Nevertheless, the district attorney did not come to the relief of the judge, for the following immediately took place:

"Mr. Ryan [deputy district attorney]: If the court please, before your honor determines that, we are not asking for the admissibility of anything that is particular or certain. We have asked for a conversation; we have not asked for a confession; we have not asked for an admission."

It had been contended by Mr. Cruzan during the argument that the people had not laid a sufficient foundation for the conversation by merely showing by the statement of the officer that France's statements were free and voluntary, and not induced by threats or violence, or by promise of immunity or reward. It was said that these statements were but conclusions, and that the prosecution must go further and show everything that had transpired between the officers and that defendant so that the judge himself might draw therefrom the proper conclusions. After the remark above quoted from him, Mr. Ryan proceeded with an answer to this argument contending that the foundation laid by the testimony of the officer was sufficient, and that the burden was upon the defense to show specific occurrences tending to prove that France's statements were not free and voluntary. At the end of Mr. Ryan's remarks, the judge thus expressed himself:

"The Court: Now, the question to determine is whether or not that should be done in the presence of the jury or out of the hearing of the jury. I personally would welcome a rule that would enable us to exclude it from the jury until the court has determined whether or not it is admissible; but I do not know whether that is the rule or not."

Following this statement, the district attorney made the following remark:

"Mr. Ryan: It is clear in my mind that this is the testimony that comes within the case. It is not on a question of law; it is a question of fact for the jury to consider."

Taking the complete record, however, it is evident that the prosecuting officer had not in mind the entire rule governing such a situation as was then under consideration. He evidently did not intend to dispute the view that the question was one solely for the judge. He apparently, judging from the whole record, intended only to insist that the judge could not hear the evidence in the absence of the jury. Surely, nowhere in the record did he state clearly the actual rule on the subject under consideration. Not only he, but counsel for the defendants as well, seem to have been afflicted with the same delusion which possessed the judge. This delusion long persisted, as the sequel will show, and the judge, while holding, with the assent of all concerned, that the evidence preliminary to the receipt in evidence of the confession was for his ear alone, determined that he could not hear that evidence in the absence of the jury and called the body back to the jury box.

Evidence was then offered by both sides upon the issue whether the confessions of the two appellants were free and voluntary. We must state various occurrences during the taking of the testimony on the subject, for the purpose of showing the continued attitude of the court concerning the question involved, as well as the manner in which the counsel for appellants comported himself toward it. After some testimony had been taken, the following occurred:

"Mr. Cruzan: * * * So that the record may be complete, we ask that the examination be conducted in the absence of the jury; it being strictly a matter in the discretion of the trial court, being only for the trial court to pass on.

"Mr. Ryan: We resist any such contention and refuse to let the witness testify upon voir dire if it is not conducted within the presence of the jury.

"The Court: The motion is denied. Proceed."

A little later Mr. Cruzan announced that he was about to call one of the defendants to the witness stand for the sole purpose of testifying to facts bearing on the question whether the confessions were free and voluntary. To this the court responded that the prosecution would have the right to cross-examine within the lines laid by the direct examination. Then this occurred:

"Mr. Cruzan: Only as to the issue of law that we are now trying before your honor.

"The Court: Is there any question about that, gentlemen? If there is—

"Mr. Ryan: Yes; the statement that this is an issue of law; this is an issue of fact.

"The Court: This is an issue of fact which is for the court, however, and not for the jury.

"Mr. Cruzan: It is clearly for the court to determine."

Again, while the same question was yet before the court, it was contended that one of the defendants had been deprived of sleep, while in jail, for the purpose of inducing a confession, by the slamming of a door and by the shooting of plungers and bolts by means of which the door was secured. It was remarked that the door in question was like one leading from the court room. Next, the record shows:

"The Court: Mr. Bryant, will you open the door so I can see out in the passageway? It is a question of fact I am to pass on and not the jury, so I will take a view of it. Let the record show the court has examined or inspected the door to the bridge."

Later, the same question still being under examination, counsel for the defendants insisted upon questioning one of them in a certain manner. Then:

"The Court: You have a right to do that, * * * but be very cautious about it, because of the weight I have already told you I will attach to it.

"Mr. Cruzan: I would be perfectly willing to let your honor examine this witness.

"The Court: I don't desire to do that. * * * Proceed. In these matters I feel free to comment, because it is a matter I am passing on, myself.

"A Juror: May we have the defendant turn this way?

"The Court: This is a matter only for the court. They asked to have you excluded entirely, but I felt I could not, under the law. I am going to pass on the question of fact now being developed, myself."

Thus speaks this unusual record, upon the subject which now engrosses our attention, up to the time when the various proposed instructions to the jury were requested by the respective parties. The district attorney asked no instruction upon the question which had so long occupied the attention of the court. The counsel for the defendants, however, experienced an eleventh hour reformation from the sins which he had committed during the taking of the evidence. He requested the trial judge to give to the jury an instruction to the effect that, before that body could consider any confession of the defendants as evidence, its members "must believe that such confessions were voluntarily made," and explaining what was meant by the term "voluntarily." The instruction was refused. The refusal was error.

[4] Not only did the trial judge decline to give this proper instruction, but he charged the jury, of his own motion, after stating correctly the duty of the body in considering the confessions:

"The whole question as to the admissibility of the confessions is one addressed to the sound discretion of the court. I think I have stated that two or three times. Now let me state it again. The whole matter of whether or not the confessions were properly admissible, and that is to say whether or not they were voluntarily made under promise of immunity or reward, whether they were made under threats or violence, is one to be passed upon by the court, and if the court had not found that they were freely and voluntarily made, and were not made under promise of reward or immunity, and they were not made under violence, or fear of violence, or threats, they would not have been read to you in evidence. Therefore that question is disposed of, as to the question of whether or not the confessions were properly made; but, as to the truth of what is contained in those confessions, the jury is the sole judge."

The giving of this instruction was error.

The judge, again of his own motion, gave another instruction upon the same subject:

"If any expression of mine has seemed to indicate an opinion relating to any of these matters, such an expression must be entirely disregarded by you, with this exception, and that relates to the matters of the confessions. It is the duty of the court to determine whether or not the confessions have been freely and voluntarily made, without promise of reward or immunity, and whether or not they were made under threats or duress, and matters of that character, and the court has determined that they were made without promise of reward or immunity, and were not made under duress or threats, and were freely and voluntarily given, and I have so expressed myself, and do now so express myself."

The giving of this instruction was error.

[5, 6] Upon the state of the record leading up to the requested instruction presented by plaintiff, and to the two instructions given by the court of its own motion, the question naturally arises as to whether appellants may avail themselves of the errors which are above made manifest concerning those matters. There could be but little doubt upon the point if appellants, with the conduct of their counsel as it stands forth upon the record, had not at last presented the requested instruction. It is settled by the adjudicated cases that a defendant in a criminal case may not object to an instruction which he has asked the judge to give to the jury. The cases on the point are many, and run, at least, from People v. Lopez, 59 Cal. 362, to People v. Rodley, 131 Cal. 240, 63 P. 351, and People v. Russell, 19 Cal. App. 750, 127 P. 829, without recourse to later adjudications touching what is evidently a just and proper rule. But, for the matter of the requested instruction, we should have little difficulty in applying this rule to appellants here, for their counsel was so persistent and cocksure in his attitude that we should feel bound, not alone upon what appears to us as sound reason, but upon authority as well, to determine that his conduct, laying aside his request for the instruction, was equivalent to a demand for a statement to the jury of an assumed rule of law such as was incorporated in the two instructions which the judge gave of his own motion. In a case in which an appellant sought to avail himself of alleged errors by the trial court and denying his challenges of members of the jury for cause, but in which he had not exercised all the peremptory challenges allowed him under the law, it was said:

That it is a "sound ethical principle that a defendant should not be heard to complain of an error, the injurious effects of which he has suffered, if at all, only by reason of his acquiescence in or failure to avoid it when he had the means and opportunity to do so." People v. Winthrop, 118 Cal. 85, 50 P. 390.

In a much later case the same rule was applied to a similar state of facts. There the appellant contended that the trial court had erred in limiting his examination of talesmen on their voir dire. He had not exercised all the peremptory challenges to which he was entitled. The Supreme Court said:

"The ensuing situation was, therefore, the result of his own acquiescence, and he cannot complain of it. This is the settled rule where a challenge for cause has been erroneously overruled. * * * And the reasons on which it is based apply equally to a case like the present. * * *" People v. Tyren, 179 Cal. 575, 178 P. 132.

In a prosecution under a charge of larceny by trick and device, in which the victim was plundered by means of the sale of stock in a corporation about to be organized, a part of whose property was said to be a certain invention, the appellate court said, after disposing of certain points:

"The defendant also complains of the ruling of the court in sustaining an objection to appellant's offer to prove that the stock of the company was of some value. Without determining whether or not such evidence was at all pertinent or material in view of the peculiar facts of the case, we do not think the court in its ruling committed any error of which appellant can be heard to complain. Before this offer of testimony occurred, appellant had offered in evidence certain letters from various persons, which, though not set forth in the record, seem to have been addressed to appellant, and to have contained statements bearing upon the value of the intention and the like. Upon objection these letters were ruled out, and appellant very properly makes no complaint as to such rulings. When he made his offer of the ruling out of which he does complain, he did not put his witnesses upon the stand, nor ask them any question. They were not shown to have had any knowledge of the company or of the value of the so-called invention. Appellant made a somewhat vague and general offer of testimony along certain general lines, and concluded his offer by the statement that 'Your honor has practically ruled on that.' By this statement counsel manifestly referred to the ruling of the court in rejecting the letters that had previously been offered, and we think in so doing really invited the ruling of the court that was thereupon made as to his present offer. The matter was certainly so presented to the court as to convey the idea that the same point was involved as had been ruled on. In this way the action of counsel was well calculated to mislead the court (unintentionally of course) as to the purpose of the offer. The previous ruling was clearly correct; and we think, under the circumstances above detailed as attending the last offer, appellant should not be heard to complain of the ruling which he in effect invited." People v. Miles, 19 Cal. App. 223, 125 P. 250.

These authorities, although proceeding upon facts utterly different from those which are now before us, seem to establish a rule which, but for the asking of the proposed instruction, would be applicable here. In addition to them, however, there is one case in which the facts are closely similar to those with which we now deal. It was there said:

"When the people offered in evidence the written confession which the defendant was alleged to have made, and the admissions and statements testified to by his fellow prisoner, the people and the defendant both consented that the preliminary evidence and the argument upon the defendant's objections to the offered evidence should be taken and heard in the absence and without the hearing of the jury. It is now claimed that the order and action of the court, taken in conformity with his consent, was error, and highly injurious to the defendant. It is not necessary to consider whether the action of the court in this matter would have been proper if objected to. It was not objected to at the time, there was no exception taken at the time, and there is nothing to review." People v. Evans, 5 Cal. Unrep. 125, 41 P. 444.

Of course, if the trial court here had granted the motion of the appellants for an exclusion of the jury while the testimony preliminary to the confessions was being taken, the damage would have been done, as in the case last cited, despite the request for the proposed instruction. This would have settled the question, unless, which we do not decide, upon the request for the instruction being made the judge could have submitted the preliminary evidence already heard by him to the jury, together with cautionary instructions designed to remove the effects of his many erroneous remarks.

Here, however, the jury was not excluded. Its members heard the preliminary evidence. At least, we think we cannot assume that they did not hear it, although they were repeatedly told that they were not to consider it. They were interested in what was going on, much more than the ordinary spectators in the courtroom, and must have heard everything that transpired. All that was necessary, therefore, when appellants took their belated attitude and asked for the instruction, was for the judge to submit it, perhaps with a more specific charge directing the jury to consider what they had before been forbidden to consider, thus removing from their minds the impressions erroneously created by the former attitude of counsel and judge. Such a course would have required care and circumspection, but the result could have been accomplished. Under all the circumstances of the present situation, we think the authorities above cited do not apply. We think that in the last analysis appellants did not waive the point they now seek to press. Despite the persistent flounderings of their counsel, they finally reached firm ground in the presentation of the requested instruction. They thus gave the judge the opportunity to right himself and they had the right to expect that he would scramble ashore with them. We think they may now justly complain that he did not.

We shall consider, when we come to apply the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution to the cause, as we must, whether the error of the court in refusing the instruction asked by appellants, and in giving the two instructions which he read to the jury of his own motion, must result in a reversal of the judgment.

[7, 8] Departing from the judgment of conviction as a whole, attention is now drawn to the judgment of guilt of first degree burglary under the Fares count of the information. It is contended that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that burglary in the first degree is a lesser crime than burglary with explosives, and is included within it. It is also insisted that, aside from the confessions of appellants, the evidence failed to establish certain material elements of the corpus delicti as to the Fares count. These two points we shall amalgamate and treat as one: Was the evidence sufficient to support the verdict upon the Fares count? As the two points are stated, and as they are argued, they naturally lend themselves to such a treatment.

In considering the single point into which the two questions are thus coalesced, we shall pay no attention to the confessions. They are excluded by the very terms of the second specific point made by appellants, if we were considering that point alone, and justly so, for the corpus delicti in every criminal case must be proven by evidence aside from any confession or admission of the defendant. People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 346, 40 P. 440; People v. Besold, 154 Cal. 363, 97 P. 871; People v. Clark (Cal. App.) 233 P. 980. The confessions here are especially to be omitted from our view because of the instructions given by the trial judge to the jury touching the evidence preliminary to their admission. In depriving the jury of the right to find whether the confessions were free and voluntary, the instructions prevented a final determination of the question whether they were to be considered as evidence, even though they had been read to the jury. And the right of appellants to have the jury pass upon the manner in which the confessions were secured, and thereby to settle the question whether they were to be viewed as proper evidence, was a most substantial one, as we shall discover when we come to consider the effect upon the appeal of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, for the evidence was such that the trial body might easily have determined that the confessions were not free and voluntary.

Laying aside the confessions, did the evidence uphold the verdict on the Fares count? Taking the definition to be found in section 460 of the Penal Code, it is necessary to a conviction of burglary in the first degree that at least one of the following elements be established by the evidence: (1) The building entered must be inhabited; (2) the burglary must have been committed (A) in the nighttime, or (B) at any time by a person (a) armed with a deadly weapon, or (b) who, while in the commission of the burglary, arms himself with such a weapon, or (c) who, while in the commission of the burglary, assaults any person. Considering these elements in the order stated, there was no evidence in the present case that the Fares property was inhabited. The record shows that it was a dry goods store and not a dwelling house, but the word "inhabited" in section 460 modifies or qualifies the word "building," as well as the words "dwelling house." People v. Clinton (Cal. App.) 233 P. 78. There was no evidence that the burglary was committed during the night. Fares closed his store between 7 and 8 on a Saturday evening and first went to the place thereafter on the next morning between 10 and 11. The crime was committed some time between these two events, as it was on the Sunday morning visit that it was first discovered that it had been perpetrated.

The Saturday and Sunday mentioned were the 15th and 16th days of March, and on the latter day 10 o'clock a. m. was approximately four hours after sunrise. Further, the burglarious entry into the premises was effected either by means of a skylight or through the "back door," and not from the street, and there was no evidence to show that the burglars were ever in the front of the store. Only the safe on the premises was "robbed," and there was no showing as to where it was located. For all these reasons we think that People v. Ross, 61 Cal. App. 61, 214 P. 267, is not in point.

There was no evidence that the burglars were armed with a deadly weapon when they made their entry into the premises. There was testimony that those who burglarized the place took from the premises certain "guns" or revolvers which they found in the safe in the store. The weapons were not loaded, and, without deciding the single question whether an unloaded firearm is a deadly weapon, we are satisfied that the burglars who entered the Fares premises did not "arm" themselves with deadly weapons in the commission of the burglary, as the quoted word is intended by section 460. We think it would be no more correct to say that a burglar arms himself with a deadly weapon when in his burglarizing he steals an unloaded firearm and carries it away as a part of his loot, than to say that one commits an assault with a deadly weapon when he points an unloaded firearm at another. This latter the courts refused to say in People v. Sylva, 143 Cal. 62, 76 P. 814, and People v. Montgomery, 15 Cal. App. 315, 114 P. 792.

Considering the last element of section 460 of the Penal Code as its parts are listed above, there was no evidence that the burglars who entered the Fares property made any assault upon any person while in the commission of the burglary. It is manifest, therefore, that the conviction under the Fares count cannot stand.

It was the theory of the prosecution, and there was evidence which tended to show, that the burglarious entry into the Solomon place—a clothing store—was effected by means of a hole which was cut in the floor of a certain room in a hotel which was immediately above the store. The manager of the hotel testified that the room in question had been rented by one Jack Brown—not the Jack Black who is one of the appellants—a day or two before the burglary, and that he had retained it until the time of the commission of the crime, or thereafter. The manager also testified that she saw two or three other men about the hotel with Brown, none of whom she could identify as either of appellants. At the time of the trial Brown was under confinement in the county jail. He was brought into the courtroom in the custody of a deputy sheriff, and was placed upon the witness stand for the purpose of showing that appellants had effected an entrance into the store by means of the hole in the floor, and had committed the burglary. Brown was represented by counsel during the time he was on the stand. When he was first sworn, his counsel plainly stated to the court that Brown would exercise his constitutional right of refusing to answer questions on the ground that his answers might tend to incriminate him, and on that ground his counsel objected to any questions being asked him. Notwithstanding that fact, and despite the further fact that, upon being questioned, Brown began at once, upon objections by his counsel, to refuse to answer on the ground stated, the prosecuting attorney kept him on the stand for a lengthy quizzing. At least 63 questions were propounded to him, going over the entire assumed story of the commission of the burglary under the Solomon count by appellants. To each of these questions Brown's counsel objected on the ground that an answer might tend to incriminate him, the judge asked him if he refused to answer on that ground, he said that he did, and the objection was sustained. At the conclusion of the attempted examination the court directed the deputy sheriff to return Brown to the county jail.

[9] In the midst of the questioning of Brown, and after he had refused to answer 19 questions, it was objected upon behalf of appellants that it would be error to continue the examination further; that the continued line of questioning was misconduct upon the part of the district attorney, as that officer had been sufficiently informed that Brown would rely throughout upon his constitutional right to refuse to answer; and that the prosecution had not the right to conduct such a "continuous performance" before the jury. The objection was overruled, but we need not decide whether the ruling was correct, as no point is made concerning it here. We state the circumstance, as well as the other incidents of the attempted examination of Brown, for the purpose of leading up to the discussion of a question which appellants do present. After Brown had been returned to the jail this occurred; italics being ours:

"Mr. Cruzan: * * * I desire to ask your honor to instruct the jury that any questions asked, and the refusal of the witness Brown to answer, should not be considered by the jury as evidence, or to be considered by them as an admission or confession in any way prejudicing the rights of these defendants. We ask your honor to so instruct the jury they cannot regard the attempt to elicit information as evidence to be considered by them, either as going to prove the acts or commission of any of these counts, or that it can be considered as an admission or confession or in any way affecting the rights of these defendants.

"The Court: Well now, I doubt perhaps whether it is evidence, but they are entitled to draw such inferences as to his refusal to testify, as the case may justify, it seems to me.

"Mr. Cruzan: We differ with your honor very decidedly on that point, and we request your honor to so instruct the jury.

"The Court: Ladies and gentlemen of the jury, in the matter of the testimony of Brown—rather, the lack of testimony—his refusal to testify on the ground that the various questions might tend to incriminate him, of course, it cannot be regarded there is any evidence in the case because he has refused to testify on that particular ground. I think that is about as far as the court can go, is to instruct you that there is no evidence before you, because he has refused to testify on the ground it might incriminate him, which he has a perfect right to do, under the statute of the state and under the Constitution of the state and of the United States. Proceed.

"Mr. Cruzan: Now, so there will be no question, we also ask your honor to instruct the jury that the reliance of the witness Brown upon his constitutional rights cannot be considered as an admission of guilt against these defendants, Black and France.

"The Court: I think that is true. They are not on the stand, therefore that instruction is very properly given. Neither Black nor France is on the stand. The effect of the refusal goes only to the defendant Brown himself; that is to say, he has refused to testify because he thought that the evidence that he might give in response to those questions would tend to incriminate him.

"Mr. Ryan: The ruling, if your honor please, does not exclude the privilege of the jury as drawing any such proper inference from the refusal to testify, either against the defendant Brown in the other case, or against these two defendants here; that is a matter wholly and solely in their province.

"The Court: I think that is true. I think you may draw such inferences as you desire, but it is not to be construed as the refusal of the defendants, because they are not making it, nor are they making the objection. The objection is being made by the witness Brown himself, and his counsel, Mr. Stutzman, who is his counsel independently in the proceeding which is now pending against Mr. Brown.

"Mr. Cruzan: To which we beg to differ, both with the court and the learned district attorney, and we will cite the statement of the district attorney in his argument as misconduct of the district attorney, and ask that the jury be so instructed.

"The Court: The admonition will not be given."

We cannot but regard these remarks of the judge, coupled with his refusals to instruct as requested, as exhibiting most damaging error. In an opinion approving an utterance of the District Court of Appeal, the Supreme Court said:

"In addition to what the Court of Appeal says in its discussion touching the error of the trial court in refusing to give instructions proposed by defendant, to the effect that the jury had no right to indulge in any presumption or inference unfavorable to the defendant because of the refusal of any witness to testify, or the failure of any witness to testify for the prosecution, it is to be borne in mind that the argument of the prosecuting attorney against the defendant for the refusal of Zimmer to testify contained not only a severe arraignment of the defendant, but implication and insinuation that the testimony, if given, would have been unfavorable to the defendant. * * * It will be remembered that Zimmer refused to testify upon the ground that his testimony would incriminate, not Glass, but himself. Says the Supreme Court of the United States [really the United States Circuit Court]: 'No inference should have been permitted to be drawn against the defendant because of the assertion by the witness of this right to protect himself. He was called by the government. If he had testified, his testimony might have been in favor of the defendant, though criminating himself. It might have entirely exonerated the defendant. To infer that the very opposite would have been or might have been the effect of his testimony, had it been given, was unwarranted.'" People v. Glass, 158 Cal. 665, 112 P. 297.

The extent to which this rule was violated in the present instance, and the extent to which the error must have influenced the minds of the members of the jury, will be apparent from an additional review of the circumstances which have already been stated. It was made evident to the jury that Brown was in the toils of the law upon some charge the nature of which was not disclosed. While we are not called upon to decide whether the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in questioning him so persistently, or whether the trial court committed error in not halting the attempted examination when objection was made, and have made no examination whatever into either of those questions, it is apparent that the questioning was so conducted as to make a deep impression on the jury. This statement is justified, especially when the nature of the questions propounded to Brown is disclosed. Laying aside all interrogatories which were pressed upon him before objection was made to a further prolongation of the attempted examination, we quote a few of those which were propounded after that event:

"I will ask you whether or not you and the defendants Black and France ever made a diagram of the Solomon clothing store in this city? * * * Over how long a period of time, Mr. Brown, have you known the defendant Black?"

The same question was then asked as to France. Further questions:

"I will ask you whether or not on [the date of the burglary] if you were in the presence of these two defendants Black and France, and saw the defendants Black and France bore a hole from [the room in the hotel] into the clothing store of Mr. Solomon * * *? * * * I will ask you whether, on [the date of the burglary] * * * in front of the Solomon clothing store, if you acted as what is called, what is commonly known, as a lookout, while the defendants Black and France were inside of the store of Solomon?"

Other questions of a damaging character, and especially many questions asked for the purpose of showing an intimate friendship and association between Brown and Black and France, were put to the unwilling and recalcitrant witness.

Under all these striking circumstances the trial judge, after a presentation to him in the most direct manner of the questions involved in the situation, told the jury that—"They are entitled to draw such inferences as to his refusal to testify, as the case may justify."

Then the district attorney made the erroneous statement to the effect that the jury might draw "proper inference" from Brown's refusal to testify "against these two defendants here; that is a matter wholly and solely in their province." To this the judge responded:

"I think that is true. I think you may draw such inferences as you desire."

When Mr. Cruzan asked that the jury be instructed that the remark of the district attorney was erroneous, the judge ruled: "The admonition will not be given." The remarks of the judge as to the drawing of inferences from Brown's refusal to testify, and those of the district attorney in which he concurred, were very general, it is true. We know, however, of no inference whatever which the jury might properly have drawn from that circumstance as against appellants. Moreover, a part of the vice in the judge's statements lay in their very general character. To tell the jury that they might draw such inferences "as the case may justify" and "as you desire" was to say to them that the members of that body might make an unbridled excursion into a field of riotous speculation concerning the guilt or innocence of appellants. So far as this particular question was concerned, they were left, absolutely untethered, to pasture themselves at will upon such succulent surmise as might suit their fancy. The result of the errors of the trial court in this regard will be considered when we come to contemplate the effect of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

[10, 11] The trial court was asked to instruct the jury:

"That in determining the question as to whether the evidence does point as strongly to the guilt of the witness Brown testified to by the witnesses as it does to the prisoners at the bar, it is competent for the jury, and, in fact they should take into consideration the fact, if proven in the case, that, about the time of the commission of the crime as charged, the said Brown was near the place where the crime was committed, and also consider whether one [he] did not then and there have the same opportunity to commit such crime as the defendants did"; and "that, before they can convict the defendants in this case, it must appear from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendants, and not somebody else, committed the offense charged in the information. It is not sufficient that the evidence shows that the defendants, or somebody else, committed the crime, nor that the probabilities are that the defendants, and not somebody else, committed the crime, and unless those probabilities are so strong as to remove all reasonable doubt of the innocence of the defendants, and that there is no other hypothesis than that of guilt of the defendants, then you must acquit them."

This matter was all included in a single instruction, which the court refused to give. It is insisted that the refusal was error. Even, however, if there was some matter in the instruction which was proper, a point which we do not decide, there were parts of it which were not proper. It was incorrect to seek to embark the jury upon an inquiry as to whether "Brown was near the place where the crime was committed," or as to whether "[he] did not then and there have the same opportunity to commit such crime as the defendants did." The refusal of the instruction was not error. If an instruction is not correct in its entirety exactly as requested, the action of the trial court in rejecting the whole will be affirmed. People v. Lips, 59 Cal. App. 381, 211 P. 22. Other points are made by appellants, but they do not merit a special consideration.

[12] We are now to inquire what is to be the result of the errors of the trial court upon the disposition of the appeal under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, to the effect that a reversal of a judgment shall not follow where error is asserted, "unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." As is our duty, we have complied with the provision of the section requiring an examination of the entire cause now before us, including the evidence. Before we take up a consideration of the constitutional provision as applied to the evidence in the record as a whole, and attempt to admeasure the general effect of the errors committed, it seems necessary to pay regard to a special feature of the cause. The vast bulk of the evidence against appellants, upon the score of weight, was in the confessions. Can we say that there has not been a miscarriage of justice in the one particular disclosed by the error of the court in excluding from the jury the evidence upon the question whether the confessions were freely and voluntarily made? Can we say that the jury would have been bound under the evidence to reach the same conclusion upon that point as was arrived at by the judge? Can we say that they possibly would not have arrived at that conclusion, upon a just consideration of the evidence upon the subject which is unfolded to us from the cold record? We have stated at the outset of this opinion the general features of the evidence touching the manner in which the confessions were procured, and it becomes necessary now to recur to that subject. The testimony of appellants concerning the alleged successful attempt of the police to coerce them into the making of a confession by means of a story of an assumed murder at Deming, N. M., was direct, clear, and positive. Judging from the only source of information open to us, the typewritten record of the evidence, it was not inherently incredible. Far from it. As parts of the story, it is to be especially noted that appellants both testified that they had been at Deming, and at the same time, although they had not arrived there together. France testified that he and some other men had "stolen" a ride on a train going toward Deming; that just before that place was reached an altercation was had between these men, including France, and a brakeman on the train, who insisted that each of the men pay him $5 or be put off; that during the row the brakeman struck France and blackened one of his eyes; and that one of the other men in the party felled the brakeman by a blow on the head with a coupling pin. Both appellants testified that the charge of murder alleged to have been mentioned by the police arose out of the killing of a brakeman. The writer of this opinion has at this moment concluded a third perusal of the testimony of both appellants upon this subject, and it must be remarked that the two stories taken together, so far as we are able to determine from the record alone and without a view of the witnesses, bear inherent marks of credibility. Some of the testimony of the police officers is opposed to the joint story, but a part of that testimony furnishes much that the jury might justly have regarded as corroborative of it. As already remarked, the officers, while admitting that the Deming affair was mentioned to appellants, denied that it was employed as a means of coercing a confession. In view of this state of the record, we shall recite some particular portions of the testimony of the officers. These were principally two, Officers P. and K., one or the other of whom appears to have been present at all times when appellants were questioned, although a sergeant of police, who was with them for a few moments on several occasions, also testified that no coercion was used in his presence. The interviews took place in a room in the city jail which is designated in the record as the "Crime Crushers' Office"; appellants being taken there from their cells from time to time for separate examination. The first circumstance we shall now note relates to the number of officers who attended upon appellants at these interviews. Speaking of a session with Black on the evening of the day of his arrest, he having been apprehended the day before France, Officer P. testified that—

"The officers who were working on the case at the time, and I am sure that each and every one of those, which I could name, were in and out of there during that time."

A few pages later in the record he named five of these officers, in addition to himself, and added:

"And there were several others that were picking up different angles of the case that were in and out of the office."

The sergeant testified that on one occasion when France was being questioned there were present six members of the police force, all of whom he named, in addition to himself. Speaking of France, again, the sergeant said:

"There was a dozen of us questioned him, to some extent."

Upon the head of the length of time that was expended in interviews with appellants, the record is equally remarkable. Officer P. testified that he talked with Black two or three times on the day intervening between the time of his arrest and the apprehension of France. Officer K. said that he and Officer P. talked with the two appellants the greater part of two days. Officer K. also said concerning one of appellants, apparently Black:

"I talked with him all the way from the time of the arrest until the time he was locked up."

And that, after his incarceration:

"I talked to him every day almost until the day he was arraigned and sent to the county jail."

We come now to a mention of the testimony of the officers concerning the Deming episode. Officer P. testified that knowledge of this affair came from a certain woman who was an associate of appellants. He said:

"She disclosed the fact to me that Homer France had told her that he had gotten into trouble coming out here from a southern state. I don't recall whether it was New Mexico or Arizona."

This was part of an answer to the question:

"Let us know what was said about this murder in New Mexico."

After 2 or 3 other questions Officer P. testified that—

"These talks [about the alleged murder] were after the arrest of Homer France. I asked them regarding the murder of the brakeman, if such did take place. They stated that it didn't take place. Homer France was the one of the two which was implicated, when stated to me that one of them had had a little trouble with a brakeman, so my questions pointed to him. He stated that he had a fight—no; I will withdraw that—there was two other boys riding in a gondola car with Homer France. That is the way it was in his answer to me, and that one of those boys hit the brakeman in the head with a coupling pin, and the brakeman fell to the bottom of the gondola car, and he further stated that the two boys robbed the brakeman of the money that the brakeman had in his pockets, and that he left the gondola car and got off, if I recall correctly, at the next stop."

In testifying about a conversation with Black, the same officer said:

"To my knowledge, there was never anything said to Jack Black regarding a charge—I will withdraw that answer—will you read the question? (Question read.) The only time I can recall that charging him with the murder of a brakeman was mentioned was—I don't recall anything like that in those words.

"Q. Well, what was said about the murder of a brakeman? A. Nothing was said about the murder of a brakeman. I recall asking him if he had murdered a brakeman."

He testified further about a conversation with Black:

"Did you tell him a brakeman had been killed down there in a fight? A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you say anything about anybody getting a black eye? * * * A. I believe I asked him if it was not a fact that Homer France did receive a black eye during that altercation I referred to."

Officer K. said in answer to a question concerning the Deming affair:

"I heard it mentioned, yes. I said nothing about it."

It is the law that, when applying the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution to an entire cause, we must direct a reversal when we are unable to say "whether appellant would or would not have been convicted but for the errors of the court." People v. Degnen (Cal. App.) 234 P. 129. The same rule is susceptible of an application to the special feature of the present cause which is now under consideration. Can we say whether or not the jury would have decided that the confessions were to be considered if its members had been permitted to pass upon the question whether they were freely and voluntarily made? We certainly cannot say that. We must assume that the members of the jury were in possession of the knowledge that the iniquity known as the "third degree" is stalking rampant throughout the land, in flagrant violation of human rights which are supposed to be secured by American constitutions, both state and national. This is a knowledge that is possessed by everybody, to the shame of the police organizations of the country. What evidence might the jury have seen in this cause, if its members had been permitted to exercise their functions, that appellants had been the victims of the nefarious practice? Why were appellants so thoroughly surrounded by the minions of the law? Why were they subjected to such lengthy "examinations"? Why was the Deming episode mentioned to them at all? In these circumstances would the jury have found, if it had been given the opportunity, that the police officers were merely attuning their ears to voluntary statements which they hoped might fall from the lips of appellants, or would it have found that the evidence disclosed one of those illicit inquisitions which are not only too frequent, but which should never occur, one of those assaults upon liberties which are guaranteed by the organic laws of state and nation? We cannot say what the jury might have decided in these respects. Therefore we must hold that the error of the trial court, in depriving the trial body of its duty to pass upon the manner in which the confessions were procured, cut deeply into the rights of appellants and worked a material injury to their defense, in the single feature of the cause which is now under examination. Therefore, also, as we have remarked in disposing of another point, the confessions can be considered by us in no phase of the appeal.

We are now to inquire into the effect of the errors of the trial court upon the disposition of the appeal, in the light of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6. This inquiry involves a statement of the evidence against appellants under but two of the counts, as we have already made disposition of the Fares count. And we must first marshal certain aspects of the evidence which apply generally to the two counts which are yet under consideration. There was ample evidence that both the Solomon and the Tarter premises were burglarized by means of explosives. The corpus delicti was undoubtedly proven. The question in the cause is as to whether appellants were the perpetrators of the offenses. The police officers first came in actual contact with appellants at an apartment house outside the business district of Los Angeles, in which city the crimes were committed. The two, in a conversation held at the apartment house, admitted that they lived at a hotel in the business district. To this hotel the officers soon proceeded and entered the room of appellants. Black came to the room while they were ransacking it. The officers found, as a result of their search, three bottles of nitroglycerine and some burglars' tools. While France was in jail, and after the confessions had been signed, he penned a letter to his sweetheart and handed it to a police officer for deposit in the mails. The officer apparently did not scruple to open the missive, for he at once did so, and he kept it for use at the trial, where it was introduced in evidence. The letter, which was of some length, contained the following:

"* * * It's all my own fault why I'm in here. * * * I should have quit when you asked me to, honey, * * * I am glad they got me before I had murder or something worse against me. I have too much against me already. * * * I told them every job I ever pulled, so they can't get me for another one when I get out. * * * I found it doesn't pay to try and beat the law. They get you in the long run. * * * I feel sorry for Jack. But any one that ever went with me, went on his own free will. * * * I don't feel that I was to blame for him being in this predicament. * * *"

Before we proceed to state the evidence which relates more specifically to each of the two counts, let us view for a moment this evidence which applies generally to both. Let us consider what arguments might have arisen in the minds of the jurors as to its various items. The possession of the nitroglycerine and the burglars' tools, while proper to be viewed as a circumstance in determining the guilt or innocence of appellants in the present cause, might have been considered by the jury as reflecting only upon the general bad character of appellants, the view that the jury took of this evidence depending largely upon the manner in which its members applied the entire evidence. The letter to France's sweetheart was, of course, not evidence against Black, but, in considering it as against the former, some question as to its applicability may have arisen in the minds of the jurors. The expressions in the letter were all of a very general character. It cannot be said that they referred to any of the three charges involved here, much less to all three, except in connection with the confessions, and to them we may not look. The expressions admitted a guilt upon no particular charge, and are therefore without weight here. If, however, we go so far as to ascribe some weight to them, or grant grudgingly that the jury might have given them weight, to what extent were they inspired by the fact that France's confession had already been signed? Did the writer foresee that his letter might possibly be purloined by a zealous police officer, and for that reason continue to "make good" under the confession by inserting the above-quoted expressions as he wrote the long letter to his sweetheart? What figure did the admissions cut in a possible attempt to avoid extradition to New Mexico on a murder charge? We do not say how these various questions, arising from the general evidence, should have been answered. It is not within our province to do so. The question is: How would the jury have resolved them, if we grant, which we really need not grant, that they had weight at all?

[13] We turn now to the evidence bearing more specifically upon the Solomon count. There was really none which pointed toward appellants. The testimony concerning the room in the hotel which was above Solomon's store, and concerning the orifice which was cut in the floor, did not affect appellants. There was nothing shown which connected either of them with the crime through that evidence. Jack Brown was the only person toward whom it pointed, and it pointed toward him most directly. Under the Solomon count it is practically certain that the conviction resulted through the errors of the trial court. In addition to the weight which the jury was bound to ascribe to the confessions in considering that count, under the erroneous instructions of the judge, there is yet the incorrect attitude which he adopted toward the refusal of Brown to testify. Under the rulings made in that behalf, what inferences did the jury draw against appellants? It is practically certain that they drew some inferences under the court's direction, considering all the circumstances surrounding the attempt to examine Brown, the length of the examination and the nature of the questions propounded to him being especially noteworthy. We do not regard the general evidence above stated, as applying to both the Solomon and the Tarter counts, as sufficient to put into operation the saving grace of section 4½ of article 6, when considering the former count.

[14] We now come to a more specific consideration of the Tarter count, under which was presented evidence against appellants of a more damaging character than that produced under either the Solomon count or the Fares count. The room in which appellants lived and in which the officers found the nitroglycerine and burglars' tools was occupied by appellants at the time when the Tarter burglary was committed. The entry into the Tarter premises was effected by means of a skylight in the roof over the place, and this roof was accessible through a window of a toilet in the hotel in which appellants had their room. The Tarter place was a jewelry store, and the owner, when on the witness stand, described certain watches and many articles of adornment which were taken from his stock by the burglars. Similar articles of jewelry were found by the officers in the room occupied by appellants at the time when the nitroglycerine and burglars' tools were located, and several watches were at that time taken from the person of Black, for it was then that he was arrested and searched. Tarter was put on the witness stand for the purpose of identifying the various articles of jewelry and watches. He said, as to one of the watches, that it was identical with one which had been taken. In the same manner he referred to a watch chain with a penknife attached. He said of a certain belt buckle that—

"It looks just exactly as those we have in stock, or did have in stock."

He testified concerning another belt buckle that—

"This is just like the one, as near as I can remember, as the one we missed from the store."

He said of some cuff buttons that they were "just the same exactly" as some he had in stock before the burglary and missed afterward. He also said that certain studs were identical with some he had lost. Tarter visited the jail after France's arrest and had a conversation with that individual. This event was also after the confessions had been signed, and we have for that reason excluded the conversation from our consideration. During its progress, however, France took from his person a belt buckle and handed it to Tarter, by whom it was retained. This buckle was introduced in evidence, and was positively identified by Tarter, by means of certain marks upon it, as one which had been taken by the burglars.

Without reviewing this array of undisputed evidence in detail, it appears to us that its character was such that the jury could not have done otherwise than convict appellants upon the Tarter count. We think that result would have been attained if the errors of the court had not been committed. We think appellants would have been convicted on the Tarter count if the jury had not considered the confessions, and if they had drawn no inferences against appellants because of Jack Brown's refusal to testify. It is true that Tarter did not identify completely the stolen property, except in the instance of the belt buckle surrendered by France, but his very general identification, relating as it did, to so many articles, must necessarily have convinced the jury that the property was that which was taken from his store. It is improbable that appellants could have been in possession of so many articles exactly similar to those taken from Tarter's place of business unless they were a part of those actually so taken. It is true, also, that the possession of stolen property is not alone evidence of guilt, but we do not pause to cite authority to the effect that such possession, when attended by corroborating circumstances, is weighty evidence of guilt. Those corroborating circumstances are here present, as the above recital will witness, and they are themselves of considerable weight. We are of the opinion that the Tarter conviction must stand, despite the errors of the trial court.

[15] In closing, we feel impelled to direct the attention of district attorneys and trial judges to the frequent occasion which is thrust upon us to save judgments of conviction by means of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. It seems evident that the prosecutors of the state, and possibly that the trial judges, are conducting criminal cases with an eye to the saving grace of the section. It should be manifest that such a course is improper. In the performance of their respective duties incident to trials, the existence of the section is of no concern to those officers. That part of the organic law of the state is of interest, so far as its application is concerned, if we except proceedings on motion for a new trial (see People v. Tomsky, 20 Cal. App. 672, 130 P. 184) only to the courts of review. District attorneys and trial judges should conduct the trial of criminal cases exactly as if the section did not exist. Such a course, if faithfully and diligently pursued, will lessen the number of appeals, will shorten the time necessary for the consideration of appeals which are taken, will lessen the number of retrials by superior courts, and will conduce to the general dispatch of business in both trial and appellate courts.

The judgment and order under the first and third counts of the information are reversed. The judgment and order under the second count are affirmed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

GREAT WESTERN POWER CO. OF CALIFORNIA v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 11431.)

1. Master and servant ⟸386(1)—Award of Industrial Accident Commission held properly arrived at by using gross daily wages as basis.

In proceedings for annulment of award of Industrial Accident Commission, rate of contribution held properly arrived at by using gross daily wages as basis of award, when it appeared deceased had turned all of his wages into common family fund, and amount of fund used for purposes other than support of dependents was deducted.

2. Master and servant ⟸386(1)—Amount drawn from bank account of father and employee, and used in purchase of equipment for ranch, held immaterial considerations in arriving at award.

The amounts drawn from common bank account of father and son to purchase equipment for ranch held immaterial and insufficient, in fixing compensation for son's death, to show that son's earnings were devoted to purposes other than support of himself and family, where subsequent to such expenditure son had left ranch and obtained employment at wages in which he was injured.

3. Master and servant ⟸386(1)—Award of Industrial Accident Commission must be based on loss of support.

Award of Industrial Accident Commission under Workmen's Compensation Act must be based upon loss of support defendants were receiving from employee at time of injury, regardless of how long support has been continuing, and not upon what he has contributed in any given time of employment.

4. Master and servant ⟸417(4)—Objection to award of Industrial Accident Commission not considered for first time on writ of review.

Objection to award of Industrial Accident Commission, based on employee's wages, that certain allowances were not made for personal expenses cannot, in view of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 64(c), be considered on writ of review, when not made to commission in petition for rehearing.

5. Master and servant ⟹388—Award of Industrial Accident Commission not disturbed because including allowance for grandfather.

Award of Industrial Accident Commission to father of deceased employee for use of family under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14(c), will not be disturbed because including allowances for grandfather, though no special finding as to his dependency was made, where commissioner found that grandfather was a member of decedent's family, and actually supported out of family's common fund.

6. Master and servant ⟹398—Provision of Compensation Act removing limitation of time held to apply in case of death of employee.

Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11 (a), removing limitation of time for instituting proceeding for compensation, where application has been filed with Industrial Accident Commission for any portion of benefits, held to apply in case of death of employee, as well as in case of his injury, in view of Const. art. 20 § 21, and section 1 of the act, vesting the commission with broad powers, and section 17 (c), providing for but one cause of action for each transaction within the act.

7. Master and servant ⟹398—Industrial Accident Commission may exercise jurisdiction of whole subject-matter in controversy, though claims not filed in time.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 11 (a), when claim for any portion of benefits under act has reached point where it is necessary to submit matter to Industrial Accident Commission, such commission may exercise jurisdiction of whole subject-matter of the controversy, including further claims of all other persons presented within life of continuing jurisdiction, though not filed within time required for presenting original claim.

8. Master and servant ⟹417(5)—Court without power to disturb award, unless unreasonable.

In view of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67b, court is without power to disturb award of Industrial Accident Commission, unless it is unreasonable.

9. Master and servant ⟹386(1)—Award for death held not unreasonable.

Award by Industrial Accident Commission of $4,946.80 for death of employee earning $5.81 per day, whose annual contributions to dependents at time of injury was $1,615.60, held not unreasonable; dependents, being father, mother, and grandfather, also nine brothers and sisters, each under 18 years of age.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by James Savercool, on behalf of himself and wife and minor children, for compensation for the death of Lorin L. Savercool, opposed by the Great Western Power Company of California, employer. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employer brings certiorari. Award affirmed.

Cooley & Gallagher and W. H. Spaulding, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Acc. Commission.

WASTE, J. Petitioner is here seeking an annulment of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. Lorin Savercool, a minor 20 years of age, while in the petitioner's employ, received injuries which resulted in his death. A claim was filed by his father, James Savercool, with the Industrial Accident Commission, on behalf of himself, his wife, and minor children, for a death benefit under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831), in which the applicant alleged himself and his family to have been partially dependent on the deceased employee for support. After a lengthy hearing, the commission found the annual contribution of the minor to the support of the family during the year previous to his death amounted to $1,366.66. Assuming that sum to be the employee's "average annual earnings," it allowed three times the amount as a death benefit, and made an award in the sum of $4,099.98, which it directed to be paid to James Savercool, "in his own right to be used for the support of all the dependents." On certiorari to this court the award was annulled for the reasons stated in the opinion, and the cause was remanded to the Industrial Accident Commission for further proceedings in accordance with our decision. Great Western Power Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 191 Cal. 724, 218 P. 1009. On the going down of the remittitur no new testimony was taken, but, after proceedings had for the purpose, in which the petitioner was at all times represented, a new award was made on the same evidence that was presented in the former proceeding here.

It is unnecessary to make a full restatement of the facts involved, for they will be found in the former opinion (supra). The petitioner contends that, in making the second award, which is larger in amount than the first, the commission has exceeded its jurisdiction in a number of specified particulars, and that it has placed an erroneous construction upon our former decision in the case and upon the opinion of the court in Spreckels Sugar Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 256, 199 P. 8. In the former proceeding the respondent commission fixed the death benefit for partial dependency upon the amount it found the deceased employee actually contributed to the support of his father's family during the year preceding his death. On the theory that the decedent's employment was seasonal, it being customary for him to work at wages during the summer months, and to perform services about his father's farm and in other ventures during the winter months, the commission went fully into the employee's activities over a period of one year and more in order to determine his annual contribution to the dependents. We were of the opinion, therefore, that it adopted an erroneous method in arriving at the amount of the annual contribution devoted by the decedent to the support of his partial dependents, which the law requires as the basis of an allowance of a death benefit. It did not determine as the basis of the award the "rate of contribution existing as of the date of the injury." It is that rate which the commission must determine from all the facts in such a case, and, when it has determined it, it is three times the amount of the annual contribution, according to that rate, which the law says shall be the amount of the death benefit. Spreckels Sugar Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra; Great Western Power Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra; Market St. R. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 193 Cal. 178, 182, 224 P. 95; Workmen's Compensation Act, § 9. After a somewhat critical discussion of the reasoning of the commission, and of the evidence on which it based its finding, we indicated the facts which, in our opinion, afforded a plain, simple, and, in the light of the Spreckels Case, the only logical and legal basis on which to compute the annual amount devoted by the decedent to the support of the dependents. For some time before his (the employee's) injury, the rate of compensation for his services in the mill of petitioner was 74 cents per hour. All of his wages, other than a small deduction for hospital dues and for supplies obtained from petitioner's commissary by the Savercool family, were paid by checks. These he gave to his mother for deposit in the joint bank account of his father and himself. The whole amount, according to the evidence, was in fact turned into the common family fund, which, as has been related, was used for the support of the family and the upkeep of the different ranches, and in whatever small business affairs the father and son were from time to time engaged in. We made no immediate application to the facts of the case of the rule to be followed, leaving that to be done by the commission, in the light of the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act and the established rules of procedure and interpretation.

In response to the present writ of review the respondent commission asserts that it has endeavored to closely follow the rule in the Spreckels Case, reaffirmed in our former opinion. It found that the employee earned $459.41 during the period between July 1 and September 17, 1920, the date of his injury, a period of 79 days, or an average of $5.81 per day (we disregard fractions of a cent), for employment 7 days a week. It multiplied the daily wage by 365, the number of days in a year; the result, $2,122.47, being the anticipated earnings of the minor at that rate for the year following had he not received the injuries resulting in his death. From the result thus obtained the commission deducted $360 for the estimated cost of the employee's own support, and the sum of $146.87, the cost of support of a sister of the employee, who was not dependent upon him for any part of her support. The net result, or the sum of $1,615.60, the commission found to be the annual amount devoted by the employee to the support of his dependents. Applying the rule of the Compensation Act (supra), it fixed the award at three times the annual rate of contribution thus determined; the full amount of the death benefit, with $100 added for burial expenses, being $4,946.80.

[1] Petitioner complains that the commission used a gross daily wage as of the date of the injury as the basis of its award, and not the rate of devotion to the support of the family on that date. That is not exactly so. The evidence showed that the employee turned all his wages into the common family fund. Consequently, the rate of contribution was the same as the rate of the daily wage, and it was only necessary to make the proper deductions from the anticipated gross earnings in order to arrive at the amount of the annual contribution according to the rate. The commission did that by deducting an amount charged to the personal support of the employee, and to the nondependent sister.

[2] Petitioner charges that the commission was in error in not taking notice of the amounts withdrawn from the common bank account of the father and the employee and used in the purchase of stock or equipment and on ranch upkeep and improvement. For the reasons so plainly stated by Mr. Justice Olney in Spreckels v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra, and in view of the evidence in the case, those matters had no connection with the rate of contribution by the employee at the time of his injury, and were an immaterial consideration in arriving at that rate. The commission found that the decedent left the family ranch during 1920, and started working for wages, thereby making a change in conditions, which existed at the time of his injury, and that the evidence was insufficient to establish the fact that any of his earnings, at the time of his injury, were used for any purpose other than the support of himself and his family.

[3] It is next urged that the commission assumed a year-round employment of the decedent at the same rate, while the evidence shows that his employment for wages had been, up to the time of his death, only seasonal. In a sense, in a very large number of cases, employment in industry is irregular, and in many it is seasonal. But, the "theory of the compensation act as to death cases is that the dependents of the employee killed through some hazard of his employment shall be compensated for the loss of the support they were receiving from him at the time of his injury. This necessarily means that the death benefit must be computed on the rate of contribution at that time. It is the rate which is the measure of the loss, not the gross amount which the decedent has happened to pay through any past year, or through any other period of time." Spreckels Sugar Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra. Under this theory, and we are satisfied that it is the correct one, and according to the evidence, the loss of the support the family of the decedent was receiving from him at the time of the injury was measured by his daily wage of $5.81½, or $2,122.47½ per year, less the cost of his own support, and other proper deductions, regardless of how long that support had been continuing; and compensation for the loss must be upon that basis, and not upon the basis of what the employee has actually contributed in a seasonal, or any given time of employment.

[4] Complaint is made by petitioner that no allowance was made by the commission in fixing the amount of the contribution to the dependents, for hospital dues, and certain small personal expenditures by the employee at the petitioner's commissary, which were deducted from the employee's wages in issuing his pay checks. The findings are silent on the subject, but the claim of the petitioner cannot be considered in this proceeding on the writ of review, for the reason that it was not made to the commission in the petition for rehearing filed by petitioner in the proceeding below. Workmen's Compensation Act, § 64 (c).

[5] Finally, petitioner contends that the respondent commission exceeded its jurisdiction in including in its award an allowance for William W. Savercool, the decedent's grandfather. Two contentions are made: First, that the grandfather was not a dependent; and, second, that his claim was barred because not presented in time. The evidence shows that the grandfather was, at the time of the employee's death, 76 years old, and was incapacitated for labor. He lived alone on a small ranch, and was furnished with his groceries and supplies by his son, the applicant, James Savercool, and his grandson, the deceased employee. In return for this support he appears to have done a little work around the ranch, increasingly less as he grew older, until it amounted to but very little. The commission found that he was a member of the family of the decedent, and actually supported out of the common fund, upon substantially the same basis as the other partial dependents. There is evidence in the record which supports the finding. We therefore deem it unnecessary to discuss the family relations and the situation of the parties, from which petitioner would have us form an opinion different from that held by the respondent. It made no special finding as to the extent of the grandfather's dependency, it is true, but set apart the entire death benefit to James Savercool, the father, for the use of the family, under the discretion granted to it by the Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14 (c).

The more serious problem is that presented by the contention of the petitioner that any claim for compensation by the grandfather is barred by the limitation of time prescribed by the Workmen's Compensation Act (section 11 [a]), which provides that, unless compensation is paid, or an agreement for its payment made within the time limited in the section for the institution of proceedings for its collection, the right to institute such proceedings shall be barred. Proceedings for the collection of a death benefit, in cases like the one at bar, must be commenced within one year from the date of death. William W. Savercool the grandfather, was not originally a party claimant in the proceeding before the commission. The original application for compensation for the death of the employee was filed December 28, 1920, by James and Lillian Savercool, father and mother of the decedent. Among the other allegations it was therein stated that "Wm. W. Savercool, grandfather, age 73," was one of the dependents; the others being the father and mother, and nine brothers and sisters under 18 years of age. After proceedings had, an award made and set aside, the matter came on for rehearing on June 29, 1922. At that time applicant, James Savercool, requested that William W. Savercool, the grandfather, be joined as a party applicant in the proceeding. Over the objections of petitioner, first, that the request "came late," and second, that the grandfather "was not a member of the household," the order was made. William W. Savercool was not present at the hearing; no appearance was made for him, other than a waiver of notice and a consent that the hearing proceed, which was entered by the applicant, James Savercool. Thereafter the commission made its first award, in which it held that the application of the grandfather was barred because not presented in time. When that award was annulled, and the proceedings remanded, the petitioner objected to the inclusion of the grandfather in the action on the ground that he had never requested any relief in the premises. Thereupon, apparently at the behest of the commission, William W. Savercool filed written appearance, and requested that an award be entered in his favor for such amount as he should be entitled to "by reason of the circumstances involved in this matter." Formal objection to the grandfather being included in the proceedings was made by petitioner, and, we may assume, overruled, for subsequently the respondent made new findings, in which it decided that the claim of the grandfather was filed within time.

[6, 7] In support of its finding that the claim of William W. Savercool was filed within time, which is in effect a finding that the applicant instituted a proceeding for the collection of a death benefit within the time limited by the Workmen's Compensation Act, the respondent invokes the application of the proviso, found in section 11(a), supra, which declares that the filing of an application with the commission for any portion of the benefits prescribed by the Workmen's Compensation Act shall render section 11 inoperative as to all further claims of any person or persons for compensation arising from the same transaction, and that the right to present such further claims shall be governed by the provisions of section 20 (d) and section 65 (b) of the act. The two latter sections provide that the commission shall have continuing jurisdiction over all its orders, decisions, and awards made and entered under the provisions of sections 6 to 31, inclusive, of the Workmen's Compensation Act. No order was made in the matter of bringing William W. Savercool into the proceeding as an applicant until more than 1½ years after the death of the employee. If he was not properly before the commission before that time, either actually or so constructively as to be subject to its jurisdiction, he was not brought in by either of his belated appearances. The respondent's position, then, is that, under the saving terms of the proviso in section 11(a), supra, the grandfather was so constructively before the commission that it had jurisdiction to determine his right to claim compensation. While there is some force in the contention of the petitioner that the proviso removing the limitation of time for instituting proceedings for compensation should be held to relate only to claims for injury, we are of the view that it should be given a more generous interpretation. By both constitutional enactment (article 20, § 21), and legislative decree (Workmen's Compensation Act, § 1), the Industrial Accident Commission is vested with wide powers, to the end that the administration of legislation, enacted to create and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation, "shall accomplish substantial justice in all cases expeditiously, inexpensively, and without incumbrance of any character." The Workmen's Compensation Act provides (section 17c) that there shall be but one cause of action for each transaction coming within the provisions of the act. All claims brought for medical expense, disability payments, death benefits, burial expense, liens, or any other matter arising out of such transaction, may, in the discretion of the commission, be joined in the same proceeding at any time. Going one step further, we see no reason why the Legislature may not have intended to provide, in the proviso to section 11(a), that, when a claim for any portion of the benefits prescribed by the act has reached the point where it is necessary or expedient to submit the matter to the decision of the Industrial Accident Commission, the whole subject-matter of the controversy, including the further claims of the applicant, or of any and all other persons, should be thereby submitted to the jurisdiction of the commission for a complete determination, provided, of course, that all claims relating to the transaction be presented within the life of the continuing jurisdiction of the commission. That, we conclude, was the legislative intent, and the effect of the proviso added to section 11 (a). From this conclusion it results that the respondent did not exceed its jurisdiction in adding William W. Savercool as a party claimant in the proceeding.

[8, 9] Considerable discussion has been evoked in this case as to the fairness of an award of a death benefit predicated upon a rigid adherence to the rule laid down in Spreckels Sugar Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra. Rigid adherence to any rule, in such cases, may, in some instances, and doubtless will, work a hardship. In some cases the hardship will fall on the employer; in others it will be visited on the dependents of the employee. Such a consideration is not one that may be addressed to this court unless we can say the award is unreasonable. Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67 (b). While in this case the present award is considerably greater than the first one, which was determined by an erroneous method, we are unable to say that it is so large in amount as to be unreasonable.

The award is affirmed.

In re BASSETT'S ESTATE.

MANION et al. v. BRYSON. (L. A. 8275.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1925.)

1. Wills ⇐215—Trial court had jurisdiction to determine whether decedent died intestate, and without leaving any last will or testament.

In proceedings to revoke probate of a will and to probate a destroyed holographic will later executed, trial court had jurisdiction to determine whether decedent died intestate, without leaving any last will or testament.

2. Wills ⇐183—Later will revokes earlier will so far as inconsistent.

A later will containing provisions inconsistent with an earlier will revokes such earlier will so far as inconsistent therewith, in view of Civ. Code, § 1296.

3. Wills ⇐183—Later will held to revoke earlier will, where inconsistent therewith.

Where wills made disposition of all of testatrix's property, but to different beneficiaries, they were inconsistent to that extent, and later revoked the earlier.

4. Wills ⊂306—Due execution of later will, containing express revocatory clause, destroyed animo revocandi, may be sufficiently proved by one witness.

Where a later will containing an express revocatory clause is destroyed by testator animo revocandi, its due execution may be sufficiently proved by one witness so as to render effective such revocatory clause.

5. Wills ⊂306—Inconsistency of later will might be proven by testimony of one witness to work revocation of earlier will.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1296, 1297, relating to revocation of wills, inconsistency of later holographic will, subsequently destroyed animo revocandi with earlier will, might be sufficiently proven by testimony of one witness to work a revocation of the earlier will.

6. Wills ⊂306—Dispositive provisions of later will inconsistent with those of former will might be proven by testimony of one witness.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1296, 1297, relating to revocation of wills, dispositive provisions of later holographic will, destroyed animo revocandi, and inconsistent with those of a former will, might be proven by testimony of one witness for purpose of working revocation of such earlier will.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Perry Wood, Judge.

Proceedings by Hattie B. Manion and another to contest the will of Kate W. Bassett, deceased, opposed by Frank Bryson, administrator c. t. a. From a judgment revoking probate of the will, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Minnis, Jr., of Long Beach, for appellant.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. The decedent, Kate W. Bassett, died on the 11th day of November, 1923, in the county of Los Angeles, being a resident of said county and leaving estate therein. Shortly thereafter a will bearing date December 11, 1912, presumably an attested will, was duly admitted to probate, and letters of administration with the will annexed issued to Frank Bryson, public administrator of Los Angeles county. By said will the testatrix left her estate and property to one Nancy Willis. Within a year after the admission to probate of said will, Hattie B. Manion and Emma A. Jones, sisters of the decedent, instituted this proceeding to contest said will, to revoke the probate thereof, and to probate a destroyed holographic will bearing date July 20, 1922, executed by the decedent as required by law, under the terms of which she devised all of her estate to her sister, Hattie B. Manion. The contestants alleged in their petition and their opposition to probate that said holographic will was the last will and testament of said decedent; prayed that said holographic will be admitted to probate; that the former order admitting the prior will to probate be annulled and vacated; and that the letters of administration granted thereon be set aside. Probate of the holographic will was denied on the ground that it had been destroyed before the death of said decedent animo revocandi, and that there was but one witness to prove its contents. The earlier will, upon which letters of administration with the will annexed had been issued, however, was adjudged not to be the last will and testament of said decedent, and the order admitting it to probate was thereupon vacated and set aside, and said letters vacated and annulled, the decedent being adjudged to have died intestate; that is to say, the court, in effect, held that, though two witnesses were necessary to establish the contents of the holographic will before it might be admitted to probate, nevertheless its contents could be established by the testimony of a single witness in order to work a revocation of an earlier will by virtue of its provisions being inconsistent therewith.

Frank Bryson, the public administrator and the administrator with the earlier will annexed, prosecutes this appeal from said order and judgment, and urges two points in support of a reversal thereof. We quote:

[1] "Point I. The judgment amounts to a denial of due process of law to appellant as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and of the state of California, because it is beside the issues in the case as presented by the pleadings."

Under this point appellant contends, in substance, that the petition of contestants merely alleged that the holographic will was duly executed by said decedent and had never been destroyed or revoked by her, and that it was her last will and testament; that this was the only ground of contest in the case. "The only issue, therefore, in the case was whether said writing was the last will and testament of the deceased, and this issue only could have properly passed into judgment. This was the only controversy between the adversary parties before the court, and was therefore the only controversy of which the court had jurisdiction. * * * Manifestly, the only issue tried by the court and concerning which the parties offered evidence or about which they had an opportunity to be heard was whether said document of July 20, 1922 [the holographic will], was the last will and testament of Kate W. Bassett." It is then contended that the court exceeded its jurisdiction when it further found that the decedent "died intestate and without leaving any last will or testament." And, further, it is contended that, as a consequence, appellant has not had an opportunity to be heard on the issue whether or not the execution of the holographic will, containing provisions inconsistent with the prior will, served to revoke said prior will.

In reply to this point the respondents urge that "much of the argument of counsel for appellant is, apparently, due to a failure to consider respondents' opposition to probate and contest of will. On page 4 of appellant's opening brief he has confused the petition for probate of will and the opposition to probate and contest of will. In their petition for probate of will respondents are affirmatively seeking to have the document dated July 20, 1922, admitted to probate as an holographic will and letters of administration with the will annexed issued to petitioner Hattie B. Manion. In their opposition to probate and contest of will contestants pray that the probate of the will previously admitted to probate and under which appellant was appointed administrator with the will annexed be vacated and set aside, and that it be adjudged and decreed that said will was not the last will and testament of said Kate W. Bassett, deceased. They then pray affirmatively as they pray in their petition that the holographic will set out in their opposition to probate and contest of will be adjudged to be the last will of said deceased, and that said Hattie B. Manion be appointed administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of said deceased. * * * "His [appellant's] conclusion that the only issue in the case was whether said writing was the last will and testament of the deceased and that this issue only could have properly passed into judgment, if valid at all, would be valid only on the theory that the only pleading before the court was respondents' petition. Obviously, the issue before the court on the hearing of respondents' petition for probate of will was whether the writing referred to was the last will and testament of said deceased. When, however, the court was considering the opposition to probate and contest of will, the issue was not merely whether the instrument set out in the second paragraph of contestants' opposition to probate and contest of will was in fact a will, but whether such an instrument had been executed, and whether it was so inconsistent with the prior will, previously admitted to probate, as to, as a matter of law, revoke said will."

We are of the opinion that the trial court had jurisdiction to determine whether or not "Kate W. Bassett died intestate and without leaving any last will or testament," and we will consider under "Point II" the correctness of said finding. The claim of a want of due process is therefore without merit.

[2, 3] "Point II. The document of July 20, 1922, if written and signed by Kate W. Bassett, would not revoke the will of Kate W. Bassett, previously probated."

The appellant discusses In re Johnston's Estate, 188 Cal. 336, 206 P. 628, wherein the court held, in effect, that the contents of a will destroyed animo revocandi, and which contained an express revoking clause, might be proved by less evidence for the purpose of showing a revocation of an earlier will than that required for its admission to probate. It is contended, however, that said case "is not in point, because it dealt with an instrument expressly revoking a previous will." It is urged that "manifestly, a distinction exists between a will or instrument which contains a revoking clause and one which does not. In the former, the intent of the testator to revoke the former will is definitely expressed and instantly executed, whereas, in the latter, the intention at most is a matter of inference and remains executory, because the intentions expressed in the inconsistent will may or may not become effective or executed. Thus, if you execute an express revocation, your intention to revoke the previous will becomes effective instantly, but, if you execute an inconsistent will, your intentions as therein expressed may or may not become effective. Their effectiveness depends entirely on the proof or probate of the inconsistent will."

Respondents in reply cite Estate of Thompson, 185 Cal. 763, 198 P. 795, and Estate of Johnston, supra, and contend that "in the two cases cited, the later will contained an express revoking clause. It does not seem, however, that the rule would be different if the revoking clause was implied rather than expressed." It is well settled that a later will containing provisions inconsistent with an earlier will has the effect of revoking said earlier will so far as inconsistent therewith. Civ. Code, § 1296; Estate of Iburg (Cal. Sup.) 238 P. 74. The wills in the instant case made disposition of all of testatrix's property but to different beneficiaries—they are therefore inconsistent to that extent, and the later revokes the earlier. In other words, the later will contains "provisions wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will," and therefore revokes it.

The inquiry then reduces itself to this: Does the principle enunciated in Estate of Thompson, supra, and Estate of Johnston, supra, extend to a case where the later will does not include an express revocation of all other wills, but revokes them merely because inconsistent therewith? An examination of Estate of Johnston, supra, will suffice for our present purpose. In that case the testator during his lifetime had executed two wills. The later will contained an express revocation of all former wills. Said later will was destroyed by the testator animo revocandi. On a contest of the probate of the earlier will the question arose whether or not it was necessary to prove the due execution of the later will by two witnesses for the purpose of working a revocation of the earlier will, or whether or not the testimony of one witness would suffice for this purpose. In determining this question the court declared:

"This question has, however, been recently set at rest by the decision of this court in the case of the Estate of Thompson, supra [185 Cal. 763, 198 P. 795], for, while in that case the court was divided upon the question as to whether evidence less than that required under section 1339 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the proof of a lost or destroyed, but unrevoked, will, namely, that 'of two credible witnesses,' could be permitted to establish and give effect to a revoking clause in such will, the court was in agreement in holding that the due execution of a will which was either proved or presumed to have been destroyed animo revocandi might be proved so as to give effect to its revoking clause by one witness, or, in other words, by the same amount and quality of evidence generally required and held sufficient for the proof of any fact under section 1844 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the prevailing opinion of the court in Estate of Thompson, supra, Mr. Justice Wilbur thus stated the rule: 'If the will of 1916 had been revoked by cancellation or otherwise, the evidence of one witness to the contents of the will of 1916 would be sufficient to establish that it contained a revoking clause, for section 1297 of the Civil Code declares that the revocation of a revoking will does not revive the first will "unless it appears by the terms of such revocation that it was the intention to revive or give effect to the first will." No doubt can be entertained that where the second testamentary act is revoked, evidence of the contents of the revoked will may be considered to determine the effect of such revocation upon an earlier will still in existence.' In the dissenting opinion in the same case, Mr. Justice Olney states: 'The leading opinion admits that if the will containing the revocation clause is in turn revoked, the revocation is still effective, the instrument cannot be probated, and, if destroyed, two witnesses as to its contents are not required for the purpose of proving the revocation.' * * *

"From the foregoing discussion we conclude that the evidence of the witness Blakely was sufficient, if believed by the trial court, to establish the fact as found by it that the will of the decedent dated April 25, 1918, had been duly executed by him so as to render effective its revoking clause to the extent of revoking all former wills by him made, and that said revoking clause remained in full force and effect as to former wills of the decedent although said later will had been presumptively destroyed by the testator with the intention of revoking same."

[4] In other words, where a later will containing an express revocatory clause is destroyed by the testator animo revocandi, its due execution may be sufficiently proved by one witness so as to render effective said revocatory clause. No reason suggests itself why a different principle should be applied to the instant case where the later will, destroyed by the testatrix animo revocandi, revoked the former will because of its provisions being "wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will." Merely because it may become necessary in a particular case to prove the entire contents of the later will in order to reveal the inconsistency of the two wills does not, in our opinion, call for the application of a different principle.

Section 1296, Civil Code, reads:

"A prior will is not revoked by a subsequent will, unless the latter contains an express revocation, or provisions wholly inconsistent with the terms of the former will; but in other cases the prior will remains effectual so far as consistent with the provisions of the subsequent will."

Section 1297, Civil Code, declares:

"If, after making a will, the testator duly makes and executes a second will, the destruction, cancellation, or revocation of such second will does not revive the first will, unless it appears by the terms of such revocation that it was the intention to revive and give effect to the first will, or unless, after such destruction, cancellation, or revocation, the first will is duly republished."

[5] It becomes apparent that section 1296, Civil Code, provides two methods by which a prior will may be revoked by a subsequent will, one by an express revocation, and the other where the subsequent will contains provisions wholly inconsistent with the earlier will. Section 1297 then goes on to state that the destruction, cancellation, or revocation of a later will does not revive an earlier will, unless such intention appears by the terms of the revocation, or unless the first will is duly republished. This section announces a rule applicable as well to a case where the later will, destroyed animo revocandi, revoked the earlier will by virtue of its inconsistent provisions as to a case where the later will contained an express revocation of all former wills; that is to say, section 1297 provides, in effect, that, if the later will revokes the earlier will by either method prescribed in the preceding section, then the destruction of said later will does not thereby revive the earlier one. Either method of revocation specified in section 1296 may be said, therefore, to take effect eo instanti without regard to the time of the testator's death. Either method of revocation provided for in section 1296 having the same effect, and the destruction of the later will not reviving the former will, we are of the view that the principle enunciated in the Estate of Johnston, supra, is applicable to the instant case, and the inconsistency of the later holographic will, destroyed animo revocandi, with the earlier will may be properly and sufficiently proven by the testimony of one witness for the purpose of working a revocation of the earlier will.

Though perhaps not necessary to that decision, we adopt, as controlling here, what was said by the court in Estate of Thompson, supra. We quote:

"* * * It is true that the authorities draw a distinction between a will which operated to revoke a former will because inconsistent therewith and a will that contains a revoking clause. This is pointed out in Blackett v. Ziegler, 153 Iowa, 344, 133 N. W. 901, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 291, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 115. That case holds that the latter operates eo instanti and that the former only operates in case the will is in effect at the time of death. The court quotes with approval the following from Page on Wills, section 273:

"'In the United States, in the absence of a statute on this subject, the decisions are by no means uniform. The better line of authority made a distinction between the cases where the later will contained an express revocation clause, and where it was merely inconsistent with the earlier will. There seems to have been material distinction, and on good ground, between the state of a former will after a second one merely inconsistent with it, and its state after a second one with a declaration expressly revoking it. In the first case, the only chance for the second to operate in revocation of the first, according to the prevalent theories of the courts, was by its coming to a head as an active will, which it could do only by surviving its author. Being the last expression of the decedent, and at the same time practically inconsistent with the prior one, the intent to repeal the first by it was to be implied. In case, however, of its being recalled by the testator in his lifetime, it could not, on the theory referred to, be taken to have had the effect to do away with its predecessor. Being cut off before having its disposition of property awakened into life, it could have no affirmative operation through its dispositions upon the estate. Where such distinction is recognized, the destruction of a later will inconsistent with an earlier will, but containing no clause of express revocation, revives the first will. Where the second will contains a clause of revocation, it is held in many jurisdictions in the United States, in accordance with the distinctions already given, that the destruction of the second will does not revive the first will.'

"In California, however, this distinction between a revocation by implication and an express revocation cannot well be drawn, for section 1296 of our Civil Code expressly provides that the will is revoked by a subsequent will containing provisions inconsistent with the previous will as well as by a will containing an express clause of revocation, and section 1297 declares the effect of the destruction of the revoking will. If the execution of an inconsistent will operates as a revocation as well as and with equal force as a will containing an express revoking clause, as seems to be declared by section 1296, it would seem to follow, if we are to adopt the view that a lost revoking will may be proved as such by one witness, that the whole of an inconsistent lost will, containing no revoking clause, could be proven by one witness to establish a revocation of an earlier will."

[6] It follows that the dispositive provisions of a later will inconsistent with those of a former will may be proven by the testimony of one witness for the purpose of working a revocation of said earlier will.

The judgment appealed from is hereby affirmed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (L. A. 8496.)

1. Corporations ⊜517—Complaint held sufficiently verified.

That president of corporation plaintiff stated by deposition that "he had read the foregoing complaint, and knew the contents thereof, and that the facts stated therein are true," while not in precise form of language of Code Civ. Proc. § 446, conformed substantially thereto, and was sufficient to verify complaint, in compliance with section 527, requiring the complaint to be verified in order to form a basis for issue of preliminary injunction.

2. Prohibition ⊜28 — Whether complaint was verified held immaterial, where restraining order supplanted by preliminary injunction.

On application to enjoin enforcement of an injunction pendente lite, allegation that the court was without authority to issue restraining order, as complaint was insufficiently verified, held no longer available, where the restraining order was supplanted by a preliminary injunction, based on a verified complaint.

3. Injunction ⊜145—Statutory time for filing affidavits on hearing of order for injunction pendente lite held not to apply on continuance of hearing.

Provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 527, requiring plaintiff receiving a temporary ex parte restraining order, and applying for a preliminary injunction upon notice, to serve his affidavits two days prior to the date first set for hearing, held not to apply to an affidavit filed at date of continuance of hearing.

4. Prohibition ⊜28 — Objection to affidavit, filed at continuance of hearing for injunction pendente lite, not considered on application for writ of prohibition.

That trial court considered affidavits filed at date set for continuance of hearing of motion for injunction pendente lite, containing matter part of the original showing, which plaintiffs should have served two days prior to the date first fixed for hearing, was simply error in the exercise of acquired jurisdiction of trial court, which might be corrected upon appeal, but would not be considered upon application to restrain enforcement of injunction.

In Bank.

Prohibition by the City of Los Angeles and another against the Superior Court of Los Angeles County and another to enjoin enforcement of an order. Writ denied.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Chas. B. MacCoy, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for petitioner City of Los Angeles.

Charles J. Kelly, of Los Angeles, for petitioner Eddie.

Charles H. Mattingley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioners herein apply for a writ of prohibition whereby they seek to prevent the respondent superior court of the county of Los Angeles and Hon. F. C. Valentine, one of the judges thereof, from taking any further proceedings in connection with or in the matter of the enforcement of a certain injunction pendente lite issued by said court through the said judge thereof in a certain action entitled Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Corporation, Plaintiff, v. The City of Los Angeles and E. C. Eddie, Defendants, commenced on August 14, 1924, and since pending in said court. The petition sets forth in substance that in the complaint in said action the plaintiff prayed for and was accorded a temporary restraining order, and also prayed for an injunction pendente lite and for a permanent injunction restraining the defendants from doing the acts and things set forth and complained of in said complaint. At the time of issuing said temporary restraining order the said court also issued an order to show cause on the 22d day of August, 1924, in said court, why said temporary restraining order should not be made permanent. The said temporary restraining order and order to show cause were each issued upon the complaint in said action alone, and no affidavits in support of said application for said orders or either of them or of their issuance were presented at the time of the making and issuance thereof, but that on the 19th day of August, 1924, there were served and filed certain affidavits on behalf of said plaintiff and in support of its application for an injunction. On the 22d day of August, 1924, at the hour set for the hearing upon said order to show cause, the defendants in said action served upon the plaintiff and filed in said court their respective demurrers, answers, and counter affidavits in opposition to the plaintiff's said application for an injunction. The plaintiff thereupon requested that its application for an injunction pendente lite be continued to a later date, because of the fact that the counter affidavits of the defendants, which were voluminous, had just been served. The court granted said request, and the hearing upon the plaintiff's application for an injunction was accordingly continued until the 27th day of August, 1924. When said matter came up for hearing in said court on August 27, 1924, the plaintiff served upon the defendants certain further and additional affidavits in support of its said application and in reply, in part, at least, to the counter affidavits which had theretofore been filed by said defendants. When said matter was called for hearing on said last-named day, the defendants objected to the consideration by the court of the plaintiff's said last-mentioned affidavits upon the ground that said affidavits had not been served at least two days prior to such hearing, and also moved to strike said last mentioned affidavits from the files. The defendants also objected to the consideration of said application upon the ground that the plaintiff's complaint had not been verified, as required by statute. The defendants further moved to dismiss and vacate the temporary restraining order and order to show cause upon the ground last stated. The court overruled these several objections of the defendants, and denied their said motions based thereon, and proceeded to hear said matter and to consider all of the affidavits presented therein, and to thereupon order an injunction pendente lite to issue in said cause; and such injunction pendente lite was thereupon issued and is being enforced, and is threatened to be continued in force against the petitioners herein, wherefore they seek this writ. Upon the return to an alternative writ issued herein the plaintiff in said action and the respondent herein has presented an answer and return embracing the entire record and all of the pleadings, motions, and affidavits of the respective parties thereto and the rulings of the court made therein. We are thus placed in a position to fully consider the merits of the application for this writ and the response and opposition thereto.

[1, 2] The first contention of the petitioner herein is that the said court in which said action was pending acquired no jurisdiction to issue or enforce a temporary or other restraining order therein, for the reason that the plaintiff's complaint therein was not verified, as required by the statute. The verification of said complaint was attempted to be made by one H. W. Hawley, who, after deposing therein that he was the president of said corporation plaintiff, proceeded to state that "he has read the foregoing complaint, and knows the contents thereof and that the facts stated therein are true." While this verification does not in precise form or verbiage conform to the language of section 446 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it does substantially conform to the interpretation placed upon that section in the cases of Newman v. Bird, 60 Cal. 372, 375, and Lassen v. Board of Dental Examiners, 24 Cal. App. 767, 770, 142 P. 505. It will therefore be held sufficient to constitute said complaint a verified complaint in compliance with section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure requiring the complaint to be verified in order to form a basis for the issuance of a preliminary injunction. This point, however, is no longer available to the petitioner herein, for the reason that, even though the temporary restraining order issued by the court was void, because based upon an inadequately verified complaint without affidavits, said temporary restraining order has fulfilled its function and been supplanted by the preliminary injunction issued herein on August 29, 1924, and which was based in part, at least, upon the plaintiff's verified complaint and upon the affidavits served and filed on behalf of the plaintiff on August 19, 1924.

[3] The sole question herein is, therefore, as to the power and jurisdiction of said court to order and issue this latter injunction. A further statement of the facts as disclosed by the record herein will be required in order to a proper determination of this question. Following the order of the court made on August 14, 1924, fixing the date of August 22, 1924, for the hearing upon the plaintiff's application for a preliminary injunction, the plaintiff, on August 19, 1924, filed a supporting affidavit of one H. W. Hawley, president of the plaintiff corporation, purporting to supplement the averments of its complaint as to why the defendants should be enjoined, pending the action, from doing the acts complained of. The plaintiff, having also filed its points and authorities in support of its application at the time of filing its complaint, had thus fully complied with the requirements of the provisions of section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the issuance of temporary restraining orders ex parte; and the court, in fixing the date of August 22, 1924, for the hearing upon the plaintiff's application for an injunction pendente lite, had also acted within the authority granted it by said section. The matter was therefore regularly before the court for hearing upon said last-named day, and the court had jurisdiction to then hear and determine the plaintiff's said application for an injunction pendente lite, or, under certain conditions, also provided for in said section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to continue the hearing thereon to a later date. These conditions are embodied in the further terms of said section, which provide that "the defendant, however, shall be entitled as of course to one continuance for a reasonable period if he desires it to enable him to meet the application for the preliminary injunction." In this case the defendants did not request or desire such continuance, but in response to the order to show cause, and at the time fixed for the hearing thereon, presented, served, and filed affidavits in opposition to the plaintiff's application for a preliminary injunction. Not having, however, served or filed such affidavits two days prior to said hearing, the further provision of said section of the Code came into play, which entitled the applicant for the preliminary injunction to a continuance of said hearing in order to enable plaintiff to respond to the defendants' said counter affidavits. The trial court had, therefore, jurisdiction to grant the plaintiff's request for such continuance, and hence to make its order fixing August 27, 1924, as the date for hearing the plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction; and, having such power, it would also seem clear that under the intendments of said section of the Code it had also power to continue in force the temporary restraining order theretofore issued by it ex parte, to the end that whatever preliminary injunction it might conclude to issue might not be ineffectual. When the matter of the issuance of such preliminary injunction came on for hearing upon August 27, 1924, the plaintiff presented and served and offered for filing its further affidavits in opposition to the counter showing which the defendants had proffered upon the date set for the previous hearing, whereupon the defendants made the several objections to the receipt or consideration thereof and to the hearing itself which are above set forth and which form the basis of its present application for a writ of prohibition. The trial court overruled these objections, and proceeded to hear and consider the matter upon the plaintiff's said verified complaint and upon all of the affidavits then before it. That it did so properly upon the basis of the plaintiff's verified complaint we have already above determined. That it also did so properly upon the basis of its order continuing the matter of said hearing from the date first fixed for such hearing we have also above determined. As to the defendants' objection to such hearing upon the date last set therefor, based upon the fact that the plaintiff had not presented, served, and filed its counter affidavits to the defendants' showing two days before said last-named date of hearing, we find nothing in the statute which so requires. The provision in section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires the plaintiff receiving a temporary ex parte restraining order and applying for a preliminary injunction upon notice to serve his affidavits two days prior to the date first set for hearing upon said application, has reference only to such hearing, and the only penalty imposed by said section upon his failure to so serve his said affidavits is the dissolution of the temporary restraining order. When the provisions of the statute have been satisfied, and the trial court has acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine the plaintiff's application for a preliminary injunction upon the day first appointed for such hearing or to continue such hearing to a later date, there is no provision in the statute nor is there any authority to which we have been cited which declares that the court shall lose its jurisdiction over the subject-matter of such hearing for the reasons which are urged by the petitioners herein. The case of Green v. City of Los Angeles, 65 Cal. App. 237, 223 P. 582, has no application to the facts of this case or to the order or orders of the trial court which form the subject of assault in this proceeding.

[4] It is, however, contended by the petitioners herein that the affidavits which the plaintiff finally filed upon August 27, 1924, were not in fact counter affidavits to the showing in opposition to the granting of said preliminary injunction presented, served, and filed by the defendant upon the previous date, but were part of the original showing which the plaintiff should have served and filed two days prior to the date first fixed for such hearing, and hence that such affidavits should not have been considered by the trial court in determining to issue such preliminary injunction. An examination of such affidavits does not bear out this latter construction, since some considerable portions thereof at least consist in statements in rebuttal of the defendants' said counter showing; and, even if it were true that some portions of the plaintiff's said affidavits consisted of matter which should have been earlier presented, and if it also be true that the trial court considered such portions thereof in concluding to grant the preliminary injunction, its action in so doing would be simply error in the exercise of its acquired jurisdiction which might be corrected upon appeal, but which cannot be considered upon this application.

The application for a writ of prohibition is denied.

ROBERTS v. SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK et al. (L. A. 7909.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1925.)

1. Principal and surety ⟸59—Building contract and bond to be read together to determine scope of surety's undertaking.

Where building contract by reference was made a part of contractor's bond, two instruments must be read together in order to determine scope of surety's undertaking.

2. Principal and surety ⟸59—Surety's liability not extended by implication beyond express terms of his contract.

Surety's liability is not to be extended by implication beyond express terms of his contract, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2819, 2836, 2840.

3. Principal and surety ⟸99 — Any change made in requirements of undertaking in matters of substance, without consent of surety, extinguishes his liability.

When surety's undertaking is to assure performance of an existing contract, if any change is made in its requirements in matters of substance without consent of surety, his liability is extinguished.

4. Principal and surety ⟸100(1)—Rule that any change in matters of substance without consent of surety extinguishes his liability applies to building contracts.

Rule that any change made in existing contract in matters of substance, without consent of surety, extinguishes his liability, applies to building contracts as well as to ordinary transactions.

5. Principal and surety ⟸59—Bond may incorporate by reference other contracts; bond and contract read together when construed.

A bond may incorporate by reference, expressly made thereto, other contracts, in which case bond and contract should be read together and construed fairly and reasonably as a whole according to intention of parties, in view of Civ. Code, § 2837.

6. Principal and surety ⟸100(4)—Alterations made in building contract binding on surety, unless so extensive as to amount to a departure from original contract.

Under building contract authorizing owner to make changes from the contract plans or specifications without voiding the contract, alterations and changes made pursuant to such agreement are binding on contractor's surety, unless so extensive and material as to amount to a departure from the original contract rather than a permissible modification of its details.

7. Principal and surety ⟸100(4) — Surety equally bound with contractor to turn over building free from liens, if changes made are within scope of contract.

Where building contract is referred to in bond, and it provides that contractor shall faithfully keep its covenants and agreements and turn over building free and clear of liens accruing by reason of work described in contract or any modification thereof, surety must be held to have agreed that it will be equally bound in case changes authorized by building contract are made.

8. Principal and surety ⟸100(4)—Surety held to have subscribed to provision authorizing owner to make alterations in plans and specifications of building.

Where building contract provides that owner may make alterations in plans, materials, or workmanship without invalidating contract, and that, if such alterations involve increased or diminished expense or require additional time to complete the building, a proper addition to or reduction of the contract price shall be made, and a reasonable amount of time added, such provision is one of the covenants to which surety will be held to have subscribed and bound itself.

9. Principal and surety ⟸100(4)—Surety not discharged from liability on contractor's bond by failure of owner and contractor to agree on value of extra work, materials, and delays.

Where building contract authorized alterations and changes during construction, and bond was conditioned on performance of contract or any modification thereof, failure of owner and contractor to agree in advance on value of extra work and materials, and to provide in writing for delays as required by the contract, did not of itself work an absolute release of surety from its liability on bond.

10. Principal and surety ⟸100(1)—Surety on contractor's bond not released from liability by failure of owner and contractor to comply with contract.

Failure of owner and contractor to comply with building contract, providing that no work should be considered as extra unless a separate estimate in writing therefor should be submitted by contractor to supervising architect, and his signature obtained before its commencement, held not to release surety on contractor's bond from liability, where it did not appear that it was prejudiced by failure to obtain agreement in advance.

11. Contracts ⟸210—Contractor held to have waived any right to claim an extension on account of being required to do extra work.

Under building contract providing that, should contractor be delayed in completion of the work by default of owner or architect, time fixed for completion should be extended, but that no allowance should be made unless a claim therefor was presented in writing to architect within 24 hours, failure of contractor to invoke benefit of such clause for delays occasioned by owner's request for extra work waived any right to subsequently claim an extension.

12. Contracts ⟸287(2) — Architect's certificate on matter in dispute conclusive on parties, where he acted in good faith.

Where building contract provided that any dispute arising thereunder should be settled by architect, and his determination should be final and conclusive, his certificate, duly made on a dispute respecting extent and value of extras furnished at request of owner and contractor's claim of an additional allowance of time to complete work, was conclusive on the parties, where he acted in good faith, and in exercise of a reasonable judgment, and as an impartial arbitrator.

13. Contracts ⟸287(2)—Certificate of architect conclusive on parties to building contract, in absence of fraud or gross mistake amounting to fraud.

Where parties to building contract by its terms authorize architect as arbitrator to determine and certify facts material to a proceeding under the contract, certificate of architect duly made, that fact exists, is conclusive on the parties with respect to thing to be done to which such fact relates, or as to which, under the proceeding, it is to affect the rights of the parties, and can be impeached only for fraud or for gross mistake amounting to fraud.

14. Mechanics' liens ⟸315—Surety held obligated to pay lienholders in full, provided their claims did not exceed penal sum of the bond.

Under bond given by surety to secure payment for labor and materials, and conditioned that contractor should pay all claims against him for such labor or materials, and expressly inuring to benefit of persons who performed labor or furnished material, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, giving such persons a right of action on the bond, held that judgment in their favor against surety was proper where their claims did not exceed penal sum of the bond, notwithstanding that there remained in hands of owner more than enough of contract price due contractor to fully pay and discharge the liens.

WASTE, J. This is a companion appeal to that already considered by the court in Roberts v. Spires et al. (Cal. Sup.) 232 P.

708. It is therefore unnecessary to restate the facts set forth in that opinion. The lien claimants in the case were awarded personal judgments against Roberts, the contractor, and the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, his surety upon the materialmen's bond, for the full amounts of their respective claims, aggregating $40,791.41, which were adjudged to be liens upon the property of the owner. The judgment directed that the owner pay this sum of $40,791.41 to the lienholders out of the unpaid balance of the contract price due Roberts, amounting to $52,295.56, and apply the balance of $11,504.15 toward the payment of her judgment in the sum of $36,211.35 for damages against Roberts, caused by his delay in completing the building, and that she have and recover of and from the contractor and his surety the unpaid balance of her damages, amounting to $24,707.20, plus certain costs.

Mrs. Spires appealed from that portion of the judgment which required her to pay the lien claimants in full before deducting the whole amount of her judgment for damages from the amount due the contractor. That judgment was affirmed. Roberts v. Spires, supra.

The United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, as surety on the contractor's bonds, appealed from the judgment upon the ground that the court erred (1) in awarding to the owner, and against it, any damages caused by the delay of the contractor in completing the building, and (2) in decreeing that the laborers and materialmen have direct judgments against the surety for the respective amounts of their claims, notwithstanding such claims were found to be a lien upon the owner's property, when there remained in the hands of the owner more than enough of the contract price due to the contractor to pay and discharge all of such liens. The surety company, by an amendment to its answer to the cross-complaint of the owner, Mrs. Spires, who sought to recover damages caused by the delay of the contractor in completing the building, took the position that it had been released from all liability to the owner, for the reason that during the progress of the work material provisions of the contract were disregarded and set at naught, in that extra labor and materials were ordered and furnished by the contractor without the knowledge or consent of the surety company, and that no extension of time to be granted to the contractor for completing the work in consequence of such extra work and materials was ever established, as required by the contract. It also alleged that a substantial part of such extra work and materials was ordered and performed without any agreement having been reached between the owner and the contractor as to the amount to be paid therefor, and that the actual value of such extra labor and material was in excess of the sum of $11,000. It was also claimed that delays in the construction of the building, due to and caused by such extra and additional work, exceeded one hundred and twenty days. Roberts, the contractor, in his answer to the cross-complaint of the owner, also alleged that he was delayed in the completion of his contract by extra and additional work required and ordered by the owner, but that the provisions of the contract invoked by appellant were waived by the owner and himself.

At the trial Roberts and appellant each sought to introduce evidence of the delay in the completion of the building, resulting from and necessitated by the performance of extra and additional work, beyond the time originally required by the contract. The owner objected, and the court sustained the objection. The contractor is not here on appeal, and we need consider the ruling of the court only in its effect on the cause of the surety. As to it, the objection to the introduction of the evidence was twofold: First, that the contractor and the owner had waived certain of the contract requirements; and, second, that the condition of the undertaking given by the surety company constituted an assent in advance to a departure from the terms of the building agreement, for the reason that the bond, by its terms, guaranteed the provisions of the contract, "or any modification thereof." Both views were adopted by the trial court. It construed the contract together with the bond, and held that the surety for the contractor must be deemed to have assented to a provision in the contract that, should the owner at any time during the progress of the work request any alterations, deviations, additions, or omissions from the contract, she should be at liberty to make such change or changes without in any way affecting or making void its terms. As a result of the court's view, the judgment against the appellant surety company followed.

[1] The faithful performance bond executed by the appellant refers to the contract between Mrs. Spires, as owner, and Roberts, as contractor, and briefly describes the work to be done to complete the building in accordance with the plans and specifications "referred to in said contract, to which contract reference is" had. The contract by reference having been made a part of the bond, the two instruments must be read together in order to determine the scope of appellant's undertaking. Smith v. Molleson, 148 N. Y. 241, 246, 42 N. E. 669, 671. In consideration of the letting of the contract by Mrs. Spires to Roberts, appellant is, by the terms of the bond, held and firmly bound unto the owner in the sum of $47,500, or 25 per cent. of the contract price. The condition of the obligation is that, if the contractor shall well and faithfully keep and perform all of the covenants and agreements of the contract by him to be kept and performed, and shall turn over and deliver the structure according to the contract, free from all liens that may be filed or asserted by any and all persons who perform labor upon, or furnish materials to be used in, the work described in the contract, or in any modification thereof, and shall save and hold harmless the owner from any and all loss or damage arising out of the failure of the contractor to fulfill his contract, then the obligation to be void; otherwise to remain in full force and effect. There is a provision in the contract that, should the owner at any time during the progress of the work require any alteration, deviation, addition to, or omission from, the contract, plans or specifications, she should have the right and power to make such change or changes, and the same should "in no way injuriously affect or make void the contract," but the difference for work omitted should be deducted from the amount of the contract by a fair and reasonable valuation, and for additional work required, the amount, based upon the market value of labor and material, should be agreed upon before commencing such additions, which agreement should state also the extension of time, if any, which was to be granted the contractor by reason thereof.

The trial court found that, during the progress of the work, labor and material, in addition to that required by the contract, plans and specifications, were ordered by the owner and furnished by the contractor, a large portion of which was ordered and furnished without any agreement being entered into establishing the amount thereof before the additional work was commenced, and without any agreement fixing the extension of time which should be granted the contractor by reason of such extra construction. These findings furnish the basis for the first contention made by the appellant, which is that no judgment should have been awarded against it for the default of the contractor in not completing the building on time, for the reason, it contends, that without its consent the original obligation of its principal, the contractor, was altered in a material respect, whereby it was exonerated from all liability. It relies upon the rule of strictissimi juris, relating to the obligation of sureties, found in sections 2819 and 2840 of the Civil Code.

[2-4] No principle of law is perhaps better settled than that the liability of a surety is not to be extended by implication beyond the express terms of his contract. Civ. Code, § 2836. It is also the law that, when the undertaking is to assure the performance of an existing contract, if any change is made in its requirements in matters of substance without the consent of the surety, his liability is extinguished. United States v. Freel, 186 U. S. 309, 316, 22 S. Ct. 875, 46 L. Ed. 1177. The rule applies to building contracts, as to ordinary transactions, and in Wolf v. Ætna Indemnity Co., 163 Cal. 597, 605, 126 P. 470, 473, this court said:

"It may be conceded that material changes in the plans and specifications not expressly authorized by the contract, or material changes authorized by the contract, made by the parties without following a particular method prescribed therefor by the contract, made without the knowledge or consent of the surety, would operate to discharge the surety on the bond of the contractor."

See, also, Tally v. Parsons, 131 Cal. 516, 63 P. 833. The authority most strongly relied on by the appellant is the decision of this court in First Congregational Church of Christ v. Lowrey, 175 Cal. 124, 165 P. 440. The contract between the owner and the contractor in that case made provision for alterations, deviations, additions, or omissions in the work to be done, and provided that the reasonable value should be added to or deducted from the contract price, "provided, however, that the character and valuation of any or all of said changes, omissions, or extra work should be agreed upon and fixed in writing, signed by the owner and the said contractor prior to the commencement of the work of making such alterations, deviations additions or omissions." The contractor abandoned his contract, and the owner brought an action against him and his sureties to recover the amount of damages which it alleged it sustained by reason of the failure to complete the contract. The trial court found that certain alterations and omissions were made and agreed to between the owner and the contractor, amounting to $577.25. The character and value of these changes and extra work were agreed upon by the owner and contractor, but were not agreed upon and fixed in writing prior to the commencement of the work, or at any time; but the court found that none of the alterations, deviations, or omissions was detrimental to the interest of the surety, and did not materially alter the terms or conditions of the contract or bond. Judgment was entered for the owner, and the surety appealed. This court held that the alterations, changes, and omissions were material, and that the case was controlled by section 2819 of the Civil Code, which provides that a guarantor "is exonerated * * * if by any act of the creditor, without the consent of the guarantor, the original obligation of the principal is altered in any respect," and by section 2840 of the same Code, which applies the rule to sureties. The court said (page 126 [165 P. 441]):

"Our decisions construing these sections uniformly hold that if there has been such a change in the contract in any (material) respect, the inquiry there ends, and the guarantor is exonerated, and that it is not a subject of inquiry whether the alteration has or has not been to his injury."

Our present view is that the decision in First Congregational Church of Christ v. Lowrey, supra, is correct as a general statement of an abstract proposition of law, but that it cannot be properly held to be decisive of the present controversy. The decision fails to take into consideration other well-established principles of law that have a material bearing on the liability of sureties undertaking to guarantee the performance of contracts for the erection of buildings, wherein provision is made for modifications or for changes as the work progresses, and entirely fails to note the distinction between material changes in the contract or in the work to be performed, and mere departures from the terms of the contract relating to the method of procedure or performance in the manner of carrying out the contract. For these reasons we do not consider the opinion a final authority on the question now here. It was for that reason also that we were impelled to grant a rehearing in this case following our first decision, in which we rested our conclusion primarily on the Lowrey Case. The contentions now advanced by the respondents were not considered or referred to in the earlier decision.

[5] Our Civil Code, § 2837, provides that, in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship, the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts. In Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs Co., 138 Cal. 724, 730, 72 P. 352, 354, this court said:

"While it is true that a surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract, yet in interpreting the terms of a contract of suretyship, the same rules are to be observed as in the case of other contracts. Such construction does not mean that words are to be distorted out of their natural meaning, or that, by implication, something can be read into the contract that it will not reasonably bear; but it means that the contract shall be fairly construed with a view to effect the object for which it was given, and to accomplish the purpose for which it was designed. The old rule of strictissimi juris applies only to the extent, that no implication shall be indulged in to impose a burden not clearly inferable from the language of the contract, but does not apply so as to hold that the contract shall not be reasonably interpreted as other contracts are."

A bond may incorporate, by reference expressly made thereto, other contracts, in which case the bond and the contract should be read together and construed fairly and reasonably as a whole according to the intention of the parties. Callan v. Empire State Surety Co., 20 Cal. App. 483, 486, 129 P. 978, 981; Smith v. Molleson, supra. Therefore, in interpreting the language of the undertaking for the purpose of gathering its scope, or the measure of the liability of the sureties, we must do so by treating or viewing the contract and the undertaking as completing an indivisible contract. In other words, we must, in order to ascertain the nature and extent of the liability to which the sureties have bound themselves, examine the language of the undertaking by the light of the agreement; faithful performance of the terms of which it guarantees (W. P. Fuller & Co. v. Alturas School District, 28 Cal. App. 609, 612, 153 P. 743), or, as was said by this court, the extent of the surety's liability must be gathered from the language used when read in the light of the circumstances attending the transaction (Hollenbeck-Bush, etc., Co. v. Amweg, 177 Cal. 159, 162, 170 P. 148).

[6-8] The trial court here found that it was not true the additional work was ordered or performed without the knowledge or consent of the appellant, but that it had notice and knowledge of the changes and alterations by reason of the provisions in the contract and undertaking, which amounted "to advance consent of said surety to the said changes and alterations." This finding is based on the provision of the contract, supra, that, should the owner at any time during the progress of the work require any alteration, deviation, addition to, or omission from the contract, plans, or specifications, she should have the right and power to make such change or changes and the same should in no way injuriously affect or make void the contract. The court also found that the provision in the contract requiring the value of extra labor and material and the extension of time, if any, to be granted, to be reduced to writing before the work was done or materials furnished, was waived by the owner, the contractor and the architect. Provisions in building contracts similar in language and in effect have been frequently construed by the courts. The rule seems to be thoroughly well established that where alterations and changes are made pursuant to such agreement they are binding upon the surety unless they are so extensive and material as to amount to a departure from the original contract rather than a permissible modification of its details. Equitable Surety Co. v. McMillan, 234 U. S. 448, 457, 34 S. Ct. 803, 58 L. Ed. 1394. It appears to be equally well established that, where a building contract is referred to in the bond, and one of its provisions is that the contractor shall well and faithfully keep its covenants and agreements and turn over the building free and clear of liens accruing by reason of the work described in the contract or any modification thereof, the surety must be held to have agreed that it will be equally bound in case changes are made within the scope of the provisions of the contract referred to. People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard, 136 Cal. 55, 61, 68 P. 576. Where the contract provides that the owner may make or require to be made any alterations, additions, omissions, or substitutions in the plans, materials, or workmanship he may desire without invalidating the contract, and further provides that, if such alterations and deviations from the plans and specifications involve increased or diminished expense and require additional time to complete the building, a proper addition to or reduction of the contract price shall be made, and a reasonable amount of time be added for the completion of the building, such provision is one of the covenants to which a surety company will be held to have subscribed and bound itself. Dunne Investment Co. v. Empire State Surety Co., 27 Cal. App. 208, 219, 150 P. 405, 411; City of Kennett v. Katz Const. Co., 273 Mo. 279, 202 S. W. 558, 563; Hiller v. Daman, 183 Mo. App. 315, 166 S. W. 869.

[9] There is no express requirement in the contract here under consideration that the surety for the contractor should be consulted, or its express consent obtained, for the making of any alterations or modifications or changes in the plans or specifications or in the contract for the building. It agreed in advance to the making of such changes, with the proviso inserted that the cost thereof, and any delay occasioned the contractor thereby, should be fixed and determined before any extra work was done. The first question that presents itself, then, in this case is, Did the failure of the owner and the contractor to agree upon these matters, as required by the contract, of itself work a release of the surety on the contractor's bond? We are of opinion that it did not. Callan v. Empire State Surety Co., supra. The appellant stood as guarantor for the faithful performance of the building contract, or any modification thereof. It consented in advance to the making of alterations, deviations, additions, or omissions during the construction, with the understanding that the same should in no way injuriously affect or make void the contract. We are not now dealing with an alteration of the contract for the performance of which the appellant became surety. About the most that can be said is that we are considering a departure from or a violation by the parties of certain provisions relating to the method of procedure during the performance of the contract. Smith v. Molleson, supra; Hustace v. Davis, 23 Haw. 606. In this last case it was said (page 612):

"Courts have properly drawn a distinction between changes in the contract or in the work to be performed, and a departure from the terms of the contract relating to the method of procedure or performance in the manner of carrying out the contract. As to the latter, deviations will not result in the release of the surety unless they tend to prejudice his rights."

The rule seems to be quite concisely stated in Martin v. Whites, 128 Mo. App. 117, 106 S. W. 608, where, in discussing the rule that the liability of a surety is strictissimi juris, and that an alteration or change in the terms of the contract by the principal parties without the consent of the surety will operate to release him, the court said (page 123 [106 S. W. 609]):

"There is a marked distinction, however, between a case where the identity of the surety's contract has been destroyed without his consent and a case where there has been merely an immaterial deviation in performance from its terms without any implied or express agreement between the parties adding to or deducting from the original terms. The principle above referred to is entirely without influence under the circumstances mentioned, when there has been a mere permissive deviation in acts and omissions with respect to the performance of the contract. Now, in such cases, the matter of the surety's liability or nonliability turns upon the question as to whether or not the deviations by the owner or obligee are material to the surety's risk. The sum and substance of the entire adjudicated law upon this subject is, we believe, that whenever a creditor does an act, whereby injury or loss or liability to loss or increase of risk accrues to the surety without his assent, the surety is entitled, by reason thereof, to be discharged. In accord with this doctrine, it has frequently been adjudged in building cases that in the matter of acts and omissions with respect to the performance of the contract assured, mere immaterial variations and insubstantial deviations which do not, in any manner, prejudice the right or encroach upon the liability of the surety, will be insufficient to operate a discharge."

See, also, School District v. United States F. & G. Co., 96 Kan. 499, 152 P. 668, 670.

An interesting note on the subject we are now considering is to be found in 16 Ann. Cas. 348, wherein the writer declares that the reason for the above rule is based upon the doctrine of prior consent by the surety. It is held that the stipulations permitting alterations constitute consent in advance on the part of the surety to such alterations as are within the terms of the stipulations. It has become a common practice, the writer continues, for the parties to a working contract, when stipulating for alterations, to provide that such changes shall be made only on written agreement of the parties, or that the parties shall agree upon the cost thereof before they shall be made. When a material alteration is made without the observance of such formalities, the question arises whether the sureties are discharged. The authorities are not agreed on the subject. In some jurisdictions it is held that a failure to observe such formalities will discharge the surety. A contrary doctrine is adhered to in other jurisdictions, where it is held that such formalities are solely for the benefit of the owners and contractors, and may be waived by them without releasing the surety. The authorities holding the divergent views on the subject are collated in the note mentioned. We therefore deem it unnecessary to cite them here. We are of the view, notwithstanding anything in the former decision of the court, that we are in accord with the better rule, and the weight of authority, in holding that the failure of the owner and the contractor in this case to agree in advance on the value of extra work and materials, and to provide in writing for delays, as required by the contract, did not, in and of itself, work an absolute release of the appellant from its liability on the contractor's bond. See Siegel v. Hechler, 181 Cal. 187, 190, 183 P. 664.

[10] The conclusion we have reached brings us to a consideration of the question whether or not the failure of the owner and the contractor to observe the formalities relating to extra work and materials resulted in such extensive and material alterations as to amount to a departure from the original building contract, rather than a permissible modification of its details. The building contract provides that no work should be considered as extra unless a separate estimate in writing therefor should be submitted by the contractor to the supervising architect, and his signature obtained thereto before its commencement. According to the evidence, Roberts, the contractor, was content in almost every case to accept the oral direction of the owner's architect, or her building superintendent, in the matter of changes, alterations, or omissions, and in regard to extra work and materials. Such waiver of the written agreement concerning those matters did not in any way change the liability of the surety. As a practical matter, it appears from the evidence and the findings that appellant was not prejudiced by the failure, in some instances, to obtain the agreement in advance. The contractor was allowed and received a fair and reasonable compensation for all items of extra work. It is not contended, as we understand the record, that the cost to the owner, or the burden placed on the contractor, was any greater or any less by reason of the failure to observe the formalities concerning cost and delays, if any, than it would have been had those matters been reduced to writing. Consequently the liability of the surety was just the same as though all the formalities had been strictly observed. Grafton v. Hinkley, 111 Wis. 46, 86 N. W. 859, 863.

[11] There is a further clause in the contract that—

"Should the contractor be obstructed or delayed in the prosecution or completion of work by the act, neglect, delay, or default of the owner, or the architect, * * * then the time herein fixed for the completion of the work shall be extended for a period equivalent to the time lost by reason of any or all of the causes aforesaid; but no such allowance shall be made unless a claim therefor is presented in writing to the architect within 24 hours of the occurrence of such delay. The duration of such extension shall be certified to by the architect, and his decision shall be final."

In the absence of such a clause in the contract, the contractor could no doubt have claimed an extension for delays, if there were any, occasioned by the act of the owner in ordering extra work. Ward v. Haren, 139 Mo. App. 8, 119 S. W. 446, 447. The requirements for extra work were acts of the owner. The failure of the contractor to invoke the benefit of the clause of the contract, in case any delay was occasioned by such act of the owner, operated to waive any right to subsequently claim an extension on account of his being required to do such extra work. Hiller v. Daman, 183 Mo. App. 315, 166 S. W. 869; Wagner Co. v. Cawker, 112 Wis. 532, 88 N. W. 599; Curry v. Olmstead, 26 R. I. 462, 59 A. 392; Ward v. Haren, supra. In Wagner v. Cawker, supra, the contractor sued on his contract. The owners, just as in this case, counterclaimed for damages for delay. In reply, the contractor alleged the delay was occasioned by the owners and their architects, by other contractors, and by changes and alterations made in the building. No claim for such delays was presented, as required by a clause in the contract like the one here. The court held that compliance with the delay clause was a condition precedent to the right of the contractor to claim an extension of time for the completion of the building. It being admitted that the work was not completed within the time limited by the contract, the owners were held entitled to damages for the delay.

[12, 13] Another clause of the contract has a material bearing on the rights of the parties to this controversy. It is provided therein that, should any dispute or controversy arise respecting the true construction or meaning of any of the provisions of the contract, plans, or specifications, or as to what is extra work outside of the contract, or as to any payment to be made thereunder, or any matter or thing to be done or performed thereunder, by either the owner or the contractor, or as to any omission, failure, or neglect on the part of either the owner or contractor, such controversy or dispute shall be determined and decided by the architect, and his determination or decision thereupon shall be final and conclusive. On completion of the building, a controversy arose between the owner and the contractor respecting the extent and value of extras furnished at the request of the owner, and the claim of the contractor that, by reason of his having been compelled to do the extra work, he was entitled to an allowance of additional time, or an extension of the period within which he had contracted to complete the contract. All the matters were referred to the architect for the purpose of procuring a ruling and certificate from him as to the actual facts. The architect filed such a certificate, in which he certified the facts and his conclusions in detail and at length concerning the matters referred to him. The question of the effect of such a certificate, under the provisions of a contract like the one here, has been considered by this court in a number of cases. It is now well settled that, where the parties to a building contract, by its terms, authorize the architect, as arbiter, to determine and certify facts material to a proceeding under the contract, the certificate of the architect, duly made, that the fact exists, is conclusive upon the parties with respect to the thing to be done, to which such fact relates, or as to which, under the proceeding, it is to affect the rights of the parties. Such certificate can be impeached only for fraud or for gross mistake amounting to fraud. American-Hawaiian Eng. Co. v. Butler, 165 Cal. 497, 513, 133 P. 280, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 44; Connell v. Higgins, 170 Cal. 541, 552, 150 P. 769. In this case the trial court found that the architect acted in good faith, and in the exercise of a fair and reasonable judgment, and as an impartial arbitrator between the owner and the contractor.

In his certificate the architect certified all items of extra work and their reasonable value. Many items claimed by the contractor were found to be included in the original contract. No serious complaint is made here concerning the determination of the architect on those matters. He further found, however, and certified that, beyond one extension of 30 days, which appears to have been given, the contractor was not delayed in the completion of the building by performance of any extras, or by any act, neglect, delay, or default of the owner or the architect, or any other contractor employed by the owner on the work, and also that he was not entitled to have his claim for an extension of time allowed by reason of any alterations, deviations from, additions to, or omissions in, the contract. In view of the binding force of the architect's unimpeached certificate, we conclude that it was not error for the trial court to exclude the evidence by which the appellant sought to show that the delay in the completion of the building resulted from, and was necessitated by, the performance of extra and additional work.

[14] The second point made by appellant on this appeal is that the court should not have entered a decree giving the materialmen and laborers direct judgments against it for the full amounts of their claims, when there remained in the hands of the owner more than enough of the contract price due the contractor to fully pay and discharge the liens. So far as the relation of the lien claimants to the owner was concerned, there being a valid contract, they could only enforce their claims against the land on which the building was situated, and a personal judgment against the owner would have been erroneous. Builders' Supply Depot v. O'Connor, 150 Cal. 265, 267, 88 P. 982, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 909, 119 Am. St. Rep. 193, 11 Ann. Cas. 712; Pacific Portland Cement Co. v. Hopkins, 174 Cal. 251, 256, 162 P. 1016. Roberts, the contractor, was personally responsible to the lien claimants, and appellant stood for him. Hammond Lumber Co. v. Willis, 171 Cal. 565, 568, 153 P. 947. The bond given by appellant to secure the payment for labor and materials is conditioned that the contractor shall pay, or cause to be paid, all claims against him for such labor or materials, and is expressly made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor upon or furnish materials to be used in the work described in the contract between Roberts and Mrs. Spires, or any modification thereof. By section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and by the express stipulation in the bond, such persons are given a right of action to recover upon the bond against the contractor and his surety, or either of them, in any suit brought to foreclose liens which may be filed by such persons upon the property of the owner, or in a separate suit brought upon the bond. The claimants may recover in such action, or actions, the value of such labor done or materials furnished, not exceeding, however, in the aggregate the amount of the bond, which in this case was one-half of the contract price for the erection of the building. The obligation of the appellant is therefore to pay the lienholders in full, provided their claims do not exceed the penal sum of the bond, $95,000. Roystone Co. v. Darling, 171 Cal. 526, 543, 154 P. 15. The direct judgment aginst appellant and in favor of the lien cliamants in the aggregate sum of $40,791.41 was therefore proper.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Application for Writ of Supersedeas.

PER CURIAM. In its application for a writ of supersedeas, pending the final determination of this action on appeal, the petitioner admits that, if the judgment as rendered by the trial court is affirmed in toto, no prejudice will be suffered by it. The court has this day handed down its judgment affirming the judgment of the trial court as rendered.

For that reason the writ is denied.

In re BARTON'S ESTATE.

BLAKE et al. v. CLARK et al.

1. Wills ⊂=423—Findings of jurisdictional facts, supporting order and admitting will to probate, are final adjudications upon those facts for all subsequent stages of administration.

In proceeding for probate of will, heirs of deceased legatee held properly precluded from proving, at time of filing administrator's petition for distribution, that at time of testator's death he was a resident of Rhode Island, since fact of residence was determined when will was admitted to probate, and findings of jurisdictional facts supporting order of court admitting will to probate are final adjudications upon those facts for all subsequent stages of administration.

2. Wills ⊂=423—Failure to appear and introduce evidence for purpose of opposing order admitting will to probate held to preclude objection, after adjudication as to residence, that testator was resident of another state.

Though heirs of deceased legatee could not, in proceeding for probate of will, have prevented admission of will to probate, if requisite jurisdictional facts existed, their failure to appear and introduce evidence for purpose of opposing an order admitting will to probate, based upon ground that testator was resident of state, held to preclude them from asserting after adjudication as to residence that testator was resident of another state.

3. Descent and distribution ⊂=5—Distribution of personal property is governed by law of testator's domicile, unless a general or special law where property is situated provides that law of domicile shall not govern.

Civ. Code, § 946, construed to mean that distribution of personal property is governed by law of testator's domicile, unless a general or special law where the property is situated provides that the law of the domicile shall not govern.

4. Evidence ⊂=80(1)—Law of foreign state is presumed to be same as law of California.

In proceeding for probate of will, held, in absence of evidence to contrary, law of Rhode Island upon question of whether legacies lapse upon death of legatee will be presumed to be similar to law of California. Civ. Code, § 1343.

5. Wills ⊂=436—Operation and effect of wills with respect to bequests of personal property are controlled by the law of testator's domicile.

Operation and effect of wills with respect to bequests of personal property are controlled by the law of the testator's domicile.

6. Wills ⊂=487(1)—Evidence of circumstances surrounding execution of will for purpose of showing that testator intended law of Rhode Island to apply held properly excluded.

In proceeding for probate of will, evidence of circumstances surrounding execution of will for purpose of showing that testator intended the law of Rhode Island to apply held properly excluded; Civ. Code, § 1343, preventing lapsing of legacy of deceased legatee only when will provides for disposition of property in the event legatee predeceases testator.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

Proceeding by Albert Clark and another, administrators with will annexed, for probate of will of Percy R. Barton, deceased. From a decree of the superior court, directing distribution, Raymond H. Blake and another, heirs of a deceased legatee, appeal. Affirmed.

Jos. G. Pfanstiel and Laurence H. Smith, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Hamilton & Lindley and Eugene Daney, all of San Diego, for respondents.

LENNON, J. Petition for the probate of the will of Percy R. Barton, deceased, was presented to the superior court of San Diego county. In admitting the will to probate, the court found, among other things, that Percy R. Barton died September 2, 1922, in San Diego county; that he was a resident of San Diego county at the time of his death; that he left property in said county; and that the document presented was executed as required by law. Administration proceeded without interruption until the filing of the administrator's petition for distribution, when appellants appeared and interposed written objections to the distribution of certain personal property to the residuary legatee. The residuary legatee filed a demurrer to, and moved to dismiss, appellants' objections, and the court sustained the demurrer, and granted the motion to dismiss, "without leave to amend or refile said pleading." A final decree was then entered distributing the property in accordance with the administrator's petition. From this decree the present appeal is taken, and particularly from that part thereof which decrees that appellants are not entitled to receive any portion of decedent's personal property.

The point of contention has its origin in the second paragraph of the will, which reads:

"I give and bequeath two hundred and fifty-five shares of the capital stock of the National City Bank, of the city of New York, state of New York, also ten thousand dollars in cash, to Charles E. Blake, of Barrington, Rhode Island, his heirs and assigns forever."

The legatee named in the above quoted paragraph of the will died prior to the death of the testator, Percy R. Barton, and appellants are the heirs of said legatee, Charles E. Blake. For the purposes of this appeal it is conceded that the testator was domiciled in the state of Rhode Island at the time he executed the will; that a considerable part of the personal property, bequeathed as mentioned in the above paragraph, was situtated in the state of Rhode Island at the time of the testator's death, and that, according to the law of Rhode Island, the heirs of Charles E. Blake, that is to say, the appellants herein, would be entitled to receive the bequests, whereas, under the California law (Civ. Code, § 1343) the bequests would lapse by reason of the fact that Charles E. Blake predeceased the testator, and the property would become part of the residue.

[1] In the written objections to the petition for distribution, it was alleged, and appellants contend, that they should have been accorded the opportunity of proving that, at the time of his death, the testator was a resident of the state of Rhode Island and not of California. This contention cannot be sustained, because the fact of residence was determined by the court when it admitted the will to probate. It has been repeatedly held that—

"The procedure of this state contemplates in the administration of the estates of deceased persons a series of different proceedings, each of which is, as to the matters embraced within its purview, separate. And an adjudication as to each step in this series is intended to be final in its nature, and not subject to review in a subsequent stage of the administration of the estate. * * * Each can be attacked directly by appeal, or by some motion authorized by law for the purpose, or, perhaps, by bill in equity, but an attack made in a different proceeding in the same estate would clearly be collateral." Estate of Davis, 151 Cal. 318, 86 P. 183, 90 P. 711, 121 Am. St. Rep. 105; Irwin v. Scriber, 18 Cal. 499; Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 73 P. 1070, 74 P. 441; Estate of Parsons (Cal. Sup.) 237 P. 744.

Appellants seek to distinguish these cases upon the ground that attempt is not being made to attack the probate of the will, but merely to raise the question of the residence of the testator at the time of his death for the purpose of ascertaining the construction to be given the will. However, the fact of residence was a jurisdictional fact upon which the order of the court admitting the will to probate was made and based. Unless set aside upon direct appeal, findings of jurisdictional facts supporting such an order are final adjudications upon those facts for all subsequent stages of the administration proceedings, and are as conclusive as the order admitting the will to probate. Estate of Relph, 185 Cal. 605, 198 P. 639.

Appellants also point to the fact that they could not have successfully objected to the admission of the will to probate for the reason that, even though decedent was not a resident of this state, the court was warranted in admitting the will to probate in San Diego county upon the ground that decedent died in that county, leaving estate therein. Code Civ. Proc. § 1294, subd. 2. It is therefore urged that this is appellants' first opportunity to present evidence concerning the testator's residence. While it is true that appellants could not have prevented the admission of the will to probate in San Diego county if the requisite jurisdictional facts existed, nevertheless, appellants were privileged to appear and introduce evidence for the purpose of opposing an order admitting the will to probate based upon the ground that the testator was a resident of the county of San Diego and state of California. Having failed to do so, the adjudication as to residence, made after due notice and hearing of evidence, is conclusive upon them in the present proceeding.

Then, so appellants contend, notwithstanding that it must be regarded as an established fact that the testator was a resident of California at the time of his death, the law of Rhode Island governs and controls the disposition of that portion of the personal property, described in the paragraph above quoted, which is physically within the state of Rhode Island.

[2] In answer to this contention it may be stated that, where a testator leaves personal property situated in a state other than that of his domicile at the time of his death, it is a clearly established general rule that the disposition of such property is governed by the law of the state of domicile. This is so, not because the law of the state of domicile operates of its own force in the state where the personal property is situtated, but because, as a matter of comity, the latter state adopts, as part of its own law, the law of the state of the domicile of the testator, and permits it to govern the property in certain particulars. The operation of this general rule of law is explained in Whitney v. Dodge, 105 Cal. 192, 38 P. 636, as follows:

"Of course, the law of any one state or nation does not ex proprio vigore extend beyond its own territory; and any state would have the rightful power to provide that the rule above stated should not prevail within its jurisdiction. But the rule is part of the general law of every state in which it has not been abrogated either by express legislative language or the enactment of statutes which work such abrogation by necessary implication. In the absence of such abrogation the rule is not to be considered as imposed by foreign power upon the state in which it is invoked, but as part of the law of such state."

This rule is embodied in section 946 of the Civil Code which provides:

"If there is no law to the contrary, in the place where personal property is situated, it is deemed to follow the person of its owner, and is governed by the law of his domicile."

[3] Appellants seek to construe this section to mean that, since the law of Rhode Island concerning the lapsing of legacies is contrary to the California law, the California law does not govern. However, such is clearly not the import of the language above quoted, and is not the construction which has heretofore been accorded it in this state. To construe this section as appellants suggest, namely, that no law of the domicile of the owner is applicable to personal property if there is a contrary law in the place where the property is situated, would be an unwarranted interpretation of its language. The obvious meaning of the statute is that personal property is governed by the law of the domicile of its owner, unless a general or specific law where the property is situated provides that the law of the domicile shall not govern. Thus, in Estate of Lathrop, 165 Cal. 243, 131 P. 752, the court had under consideration an attempted disposition of personal property situated in California which was valid in the state of the testator's domicile but void in California, because in violation of section 1313 of the Civil Code. The court declined to apply the law of the domicile, because there is a positive law in California (Civ. Code, § 1285) to the effect that the law of the domicile of the owner shall not operate when the facts come within the provisions of section 1313 of the Civil Code.

[4] Applying section 946, Civil Code, to the present situation, the important point is, not whether the law of Rhode Island concerning the lapsing of legacies is contrary to the California law, but whether there is any law of Rhode Island to the effect that the law of the domicile of the testator concerning lapsed legacies shall not apply to personal property situated within the state of Rhode Island. In the absence of evidence, it must be presumed that the law of Rhode Island upon this point is similar to the law of California, and, according to the California law, the law of the domicile of the testator controls. Estate of Apple, 66 Cal. 432, 6 P. 7; Collins v. Maude, 144 Cal. 294, 77 P. 945; Whitney v. Dodge, supra; Estate of Lathrop, supra. See, also, Estate of Randall, 230 P. 445.

[5] It is urged by appellants that, even if the law of the domicile does control, it is the domicile at the time of the execution of the will, and not that at the time of death. This suggestion is based upon the argument that the intent of the testator should be considered, and that it is reasonable to assume that the expression of testamentary intent was influenced by the law in existence at the place where the will was made.

It is unnecessary to discuss what law would be applied if the question of the construction or interpretation of the will were before the court, for no such point is here presented. Suffice it to say that it has been expressly held in this state, in Estate of Sutro, 139 Cal. 87, 72 P. 827, that section 1343 of the Civil Code, concerning the lapsing of legacies, "contains nothing which aids, or was intended to aid, in the construction of a will; it provides that a legacy given in apt words, and leaving no room for the play of interpretation, shall lapse if the legatee dies before the testator." In other words, section 1343, Civil Code, does not attempt to provide a method of arriving at the testator's intent, but establishes a positive law for the disposition of property. Likewise, the Rhode Island law pleaded by appellants does not purport to interpret the language of the will. Both statutes are rules of substantive law concerning the transfer of property of a decedent upon the happening of an event beyond the decedent's control. As in the case of other laws concerning the operation and effect of wills and as in the case of laws governing the validity and revocation of wills, it is the law of the domicile at the time of death that applies, at least, in the case of bequests of personal property. In Alexander on Wills, vol. 1, p. 345, the law is stated as follows:

"If a testator, subsequent to making a testamentary disposition of personal property, removes to a different state, or country, and becomes domiciled there, in the event of his death his will is controlled, as to personalty, by the laws of his last domicile. Should different laws prevail and the will fail to comply with the requirements of the law of the last domicile of the testator, such change of domicile would, in effect, be a revocation of the bequests, since the personal property could not pass under the instrument," citing In re Coburn's Will, 9 Misc. Rep. 437, 30 N. Y. S. 383; Irwin's Appeal, 33 Conn. 128; Matter of Braithwaite, 19 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 113.

See, also, Estate of Patterson, 64 Cal. App. 643, 222 P. 374.

[6] Finally, appellants point to the fact that section 1343, Civil Code, provides that a legacy shall not lapse, if "an intention appears to substitute some other in his place," and contend that they should have been permitted to introduce evidence of the circumstances surrounding the execution of the will for the purpose of showing that the testator intended the law of Rhode Island to apply. However, the "intention" mentioned is not the intention of the testator as to whether or not section 1343 shall apply to his will, for section 1343 applies, regardless of the testator's wishes. The application of the section results in the lapse of the legacy, unless the testator prevents the lapse by inserting a provision for the disposition of the property in the event that the legatee predeceases him. As stated in Estate of Sutro, supra, "Under the Code, the only way in which he could have made such intention appear—'clearly', or at all—would have been by an express substitution of some other person" to take the place of Charles

E. Blake in the event of his death. The intention of the testator expressed in the will was to make a testamentary disposition to Charles E. Blake—nothing more or less. It follows that the decree must be, and it is hereby affirmed.

SILVERMAN v. THOMPSON, Superior Judge. (L. A. 8538.)

Exceptions, bill of ⊂=42—Plaintiff held to have waived objection to settlement of bill of exceptions, because of belated service.

Plaintiff waived any objection to settlement of bill of exceptions, because of its service subsequent to time allowed by law, where he not only acknowledged service and receipt of copy of proposed bill, but subsequently and without any reservation of his right of objection, procured from trial court an order extending time within which he might prepare and serve proposed amendment to bill.

In Bank.

Application by Herman Silverman for writ of mandate to be directed to Ira F. Thompson, Judge of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, to compel settlement of a bill of exceptions. Writ granted.

James, Pace & Smith, Paul E. Younkin, and Troy Pace, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The petition shows that on January 18, 1922, an action entitled M. Levinson v. Herman Silverman was filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county, wherein the plaintiff sought to recover $5,150, with interest, as a balance alleged to be due the plaintiff under a contract assigned to him; that judgment was entered for the plaintiff on May 5, 1924, for $6,768.92; that notice of entry of judgment was served on the attorney for the defendant May 7, 1924; that on May 15, 1924, the defendant served on the plaintiff and filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial; that on June 25, 1924, the plaintiff was served with notice by the defendant that said motion for new trial would be heard on July 3, 1924; that said motion was heard on the date noticed therefor and that the court, on July 5, 1924, in the absence of the parties and their counsel, made its order denying said motion for new trial and that the clerk entered the order on July 9, 1924, nunc pro tunc as of July 5, 1924; that no notice of the trial court's disposition of the motion was ever served on defendant or his counsel; that on August 6, 1924, the defendant made a substitution of attorneys; that on said latter date defendant served on the plaintiff a notice of appeal to the Supreme Court; that on October 20, 1924, the defendant served on plaintiff a draft of a proposed bill of exceptions; that plaintiff's counsel acknowledged service and receipt of a copy on the original thereof without any objection or reservation of a right to object to the settlement of said proposed bill of exceptions by reason of delay in the service thereof; that on October 24, 1924, the plaintiff served and filed in the Supreme Court a notice of motion to dismiss the appeal of defendant; that said notice contained several grounds upon which the motion was to be made, none, however, being on the ground that said bill of exceptions had not been seasonably presented or proposed; that on October 29, 1924, during pendency of the motion to dismiss the appeal, the plaintiff applied to the trial court for an order extending time within which the plaintiff might prepare, serve, and file amendments to said bill of exceptions—here, likewise, no reservation being made by the plaintiff of a right to object to any tardiness in the service of said bill of exceptions; that on November 6, 1924, plaintiff's motion to dismiss the appeal was denied by the Supreme Court; that on November 14, 1924, the plaintiff served and filed his objections to the settlement, allowance, and certification of the proposed bill of exceptions, specifying that said bill of exceptions had not been presented within the time or in the manner provided by law, and that it had not been served or presented within 10 days after notice of the trial court's decision denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, nor within 10 days after the determination by the trial court of defendant's motion for a new trial; that simultaneous with the serving and filing of said objections the plaintiff served and filed his proposed amendments to said bill of exceptions "without waiving such objections to the settlement"; that on November 20, 1924, a response was filed by defendant to said objections; that upon this latter occasion the defendant left with the clerk for the judge of the superior court the proposed bill of exceptions with the proposed amendments thereto, requesting that the judge fix a day for the hearing and settlement thereof; that on December 2, 1924, the matter of the settlement was heard and submitted; that on January 20, 1925, the trial court sustained plaintiff's objections to said proposed bill of exceptions and dismissed the proceedings. The defendant and appellant thereupon made application to this court for the issuance of a writ of mandate to compel said trial judge to settle and certify said bill of exceptions.

Petitioner admits that his proposed bill of exceptions was served on the plaintiff after the expiration of the time allowed therefor, but contends that the latter, by virtue of his conduct in the matter, has waived any objection thereto on that ground. We quote:

"The proposed draft of the bill of exceptions was served upon the plaintiff in the action after the expiration of the time allowed therefor, that is on the 20th day of October, 1924. But service of the proposed bill of exceptions was accepted by plaintiff and a written acknowledgment of receipt of copy of the proposed bill was indorsed and signed upon the original of such draft of the bill, without any objection and without any reservation of right to object to the settlement thereof. Thereafter on the 29th day of October, 1924, and within the 10-day period allowed the adverse party within which to prepare and serve amendments to the proposed bill, the plaintiff without making any objections to the time of serving the proposed bill of exceptions and without reserving any right to make such objections, made application to the court for an order extending plaintiff's time within which to prepare, serve, and file amendments to the proposed bill, filed affidavit in support of such application, and upon such affidavit an order was entered by the presiding judge extending such time by 20 days. * * *

"The motion in this court to dismiss the appeal, so referred to in the affidavit, was based upon the grounds that notice of appeal had not been taken in time, and did not involve at all the question as to whether bill of exceptions had been proposed within time. Apparently affiant had at that time no thought of objecting to the settlement of bill of exceptions as for delay else some statement to that effect would have been contained in the affidavit.

"The rule is well established that delay in the presentation of bill of exceptions may be waived by the adverse party. 2d Cal. Jur. 'Appeal and Error,' § 292; Title Ins. & Tr. Co. v. Cal. Dev. Co., 171 Cal. 173, 152 P. 542; Kramm v. Railway Co., 22 Cal. App. 737, 136 P. 523; Howell v. Pedersen, 41 Cal. App. 45, 181 P. 674; Mulcahy v. Young, 58 Cal. App. 382, 208 P. 321.

"This court has held that the objection to the settlement of a bill of exceptions on account of its being served too late should be made when the party objecting is first required to speak in relation to it; that the objection should be made at the earliest opportunity. And in that connection makes use of this language: 'The party or attorney who seeks to avail himself of a technicality not affecting a substantial right must himself be held to a prompt, consistent, and, exact assertion of such technical right.' Hicks v. Masten, 101 Cal. 651, 654, 36 P. 130, 131.

"It appears from the authorities cited and from an equitable application of the rule, that the plaintiff in the instant case 'was first required to speak' if he desired to object to settlement of the proposed bill as for delay, when the bill was presented to him for acceptance of service, and again, when the application was filed for an extension of time in which to propose amendments to the bill. Upon neither of these occasions was the objection made, and petitioner earnestly contends that a waiver of the right to object was completely made."

In reply respondent contends that—

"Section 650, C. C. P., grants to the respondent 10 days after service of the proposed bill of exceptions within which to propose and serve amendments thereto. Neither this section nor any other section of the code under this subdivision mentions the matter of filing or presenting objections to a proposed bill of exceptions; however, the courts have, in no uncertain terms, laid down the rule regarding the filing or presenting the objections to a proposed bill of excetions.

"As heretofore mentioned, section 650, C. C. P., does not grant time to present objections to a proposed bill of exceptions, but merely grants time for presenting amendments thereto; therefore, we submit that M. Levinson, the respondent in said appeal, should have filed his objections to said proposed bill of exceptions at the time of the filing of the amendments.

"In the case of Hicks v. Masten, 101 Cal. 651-654, 36 P. 130, 131, this court held that objections to the settlement of a proposed bill of exceptions 'should be made [by the person objecting] at the earliest opportunity, or, at least, when the party is first required to speak in relation to it.'

"The holding in the case of Hicks v. Masten, supra, is sustained in the case of Bollinger v. Bollinger, 153 Cal. 190, 94 P. 770.

"Applying the rule laid down by this court in the two cases just mentioned, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff, M. Levinson, to file his objection to the proposed bill of exceptions at the 'earliest opportunity, or, at least, when' he was 'first required to speak in relation to' the proposed bill of exceptions; and the first time that the plaintiff, M. Levinson, was required to speak regarding the defendant's proposed bill of exceptions was when he proposed amendments thereto. The objections to the proposed bill of exceptions accompanied the amendments.

"We submit that the granting of 20 days additional time to file proposed amendments clearly carries with it the right to said additional time to file the objections, for, as heretofore mentioned, the objections should accompany the proposed amendments, as the filing of amendments is the only step which section 650, C. C. P., prescribes for a respondent."

We have reached the conclusion that the plaintiff, M. Levinson, by his conduct waived any objection he might have had to the settlement of the bill because of its service subsequent to the time allowed therefor by law. Not only did he acknowledge service and receipt of a copy of the proposed bill but, subsequently, and without any reservation of his right of objection, he procured from the trial court an order extending the time within which he might prepare and serve proposed amendments to said bill. Under these circumstances which we hold constitute a waiver of said objection, the trial court should have settled and certified the petitioner's bill of exceptions.

The general rule is thus stated in 2 Cal. Juris. p. 562, § 292:

"The rule is well established that delay in the presentation of a bill of exceptions may be waived by the adverse party. As the reason for this rule, it has been said that jurisdiction of the subject-matter does not depend on prompt service of a bill of exceptions, as it does in the case of a notice of intention to move for a new trial. In fact, where the adverse party desires to avail himself of the objection that a bill of exceptions was not presented in time, he must interpose it in the trial court, or he cannot do so on appeal.

"Waiver of delay may be found in participation in proceedings for settlement without raising an objection as to the time of presentation, or in a stipulation for an extension of time (citing in support of the latter part of this statement the case of Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. R. Co., 22 Cal. App. 737 [136 P. 523], hereinafter quoted from). * * * No waiver can be found, however, in the acceptance of service or in a stipulation for a hearing if the party expressly reserves the right to object to the delay."

The text cites Howell v. Pedersen, 41 Cal. App. 45, 181 P. 674, from which we later quote.

Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 146, p. 728, states, after examining many California cases, that—

"The results of the foregoing examination of the practice where it is claimed that the statement was not proposed in time may be recapitulated as follows: The party must reserve his objection on account of the delay before proposing amendments to the statement. If he does not, he waives the objection, and cannot afterward raise it in any form. The objection when so reserved is to be urged when the statement is presented for settlement as a reason why it should not be settled. * * *"

In Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. R. Co., supra, at page 744 (136 P. 523), the court, in excess of its jurisdiction, granted several extensions of time, aggregating more than 30 days, within which defendant might prepare and serve its proposed bill of exceptions. The day preceding that on which the time granted by the last order of the court would expire, the plaintiff's attorney stipulated that the defendant might have an additional period within which to prepare and serve its proposed bill. The court subsequently gave an additional four-day extension and defendant within this latter period served its proposed bill of exceptions. Counsel for plaintiff thereafter acknowledged by letter the receipt of a copy of the proposed bill and inclosed a draft of a stipulation extending her time for proposing amendments thereto. This stipulation was signed by defendant's counsel. Subsequently the plaintiff procured an additional 30-day extension from the court within which to prepare and serve her proposed amendments. Later, on the appeal, the plaintiff contended that the bill was not prepared and served within the time required by law. The court declared:

"It is necessarily to be conceded that the court was without power to extend the time for more than 30 days beyond that allowed by law without the consent of the plaintiff. * * * It follows that the several orders made by the court extending the time after the first order was made were void because in excess of the authority of the court. But we think that the stipulation entered into by the attorneys for the plaintiff on the 10th day of November, and after the orders referred to were made by the court, should be held to operate as an acquiescence in and virtually a consent by said attorneys to all the orders theretofore made by the court. * * *

'The allowance by the court of the four days' more time after the bill had been completed within which to serve it upon the attorneys for the plaintiff in Los Angeles without the consent of the latter was clearly in excess of the power of the court; but, as has been shown, the attorneys for the plaintiff not only accepted the bill but requested of and secured from the defendant a stipulation granting to them 30 days within which to prepare and serve their proposed amendments. Thus, we think, the plaintiff waived any right she might otherwise have had to object to the bill on the ground that it was not served within time, and should be held to be estopped from objecting to the allowance and settlement of the bill on that ground. The acceptance of the proposed bill by the plaintiff was, in our judgment, tantamount to the giving of her consent to the order of the court allowing the four days' additional time referred to."

Howell v. Pedersen, 41 Cal. App. 45, 48, 181 P. 674, 675, declares, in part:

"Appellants next contend that the defendants waived their objections to the delay of the plaintiffs in serving their proposed bill of exceptions by requesting and receiving from plaintiffs additional time within which to propose amendments to such bill. It is asserted by appellants that the stipulation requested by defendants extending such time reserved no objection to the time within which the proposed bill of exceptions was served, and that therefore that objection was waived. An examination of the stipulation relied upon discloses that the stipulation provided that the defendants and respondents should have until the 30th day of April 1918, within which to propose any amendments or make any objections to the proposed bill of exceptions. If this language is not sufficiently broad to reserve the right now asserted by defendants and respondents, it is nevertheless true that an intention to waive is an essential element to effect a waiver. * * * The defendants, clearly, never intended to waive their objections and plaintiffs had no reason to believe that they did, for upon the admission of service of the bill, the defendants added the words: 'But objections on account of not being prepared and served on time are preserved for presentation when the bill of exceptions is presented for settlement.' And the stipulation setting the matter down for hearing, which is signed by the attorneys for both parties, concludes with the words: 'This stipulation is made with the understanding that said defendant does not waive, and does hereby expressly reserve, any and all objections that he may have on account of plaintiffs' proposed bill of exceptions in the above-entitled action not having been prepared and served within the time allowed by law.' Under these facts, it is manifest that there was never any intention to waive this objection, and such objection was not waived either in terms or by implication."

As to the waiver of an objection, see, also, Mulcahy v. Young, 58 Cal. App. 382, 208 P. 321, and cases cited therein.

In the early case of Cottle v. Leitch, 43 Cal. 320, 322, the court, in effect, held that proposing amendments to a statement on motion for a new trial is not a waiver of the objection that the statement was not filed in time, if such objection is reserved, and no particular form of reservation is required. Though in the instant case the objection was expressly reserved at the time the proposed amendments were served, no such reservation was made when an order extending time for the service of said proposed amendments was procured from the court. In our view the absence of such a reservation when the extension of time was procured constituted a waiver of the objection.

As already indicated, the plaintiff did not pursue the course suggested by Hicks v. Masten, supra, where it is declared:

"Objections of this character should be made at the earliest opportunity, or, at least, when the party is first required to speak in relation to it. * * * The party or attorney who seeks to avail himself of a technicality not affecting a substantial right must himself be held to a prompt, consistent, and exact assertion of such technical right."

SACRAMENTO & SAN JOAQUIN DRAINAGE DIST. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR COLUSA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 11491.)

1. Prohibition ⊂=26—Denials that drainage district was public agency held to raise no issue.

When petition by drainage district for writ of prohibition specifically set forth the facts as to its organization as a public agency, with appropriate references to statutes providing for its formation, denials that it was a public agency, or ever was created or existed as such, amounted simply to demurrers to sufficiency of petition, and presented no issue of fact.

2. Pleading ⊂=125—Allegation that judgment of court of general jurisdiction was duly made and entered mere surplusage.

Code of Civ. Proc. § 456, has no application to pleading judgments of a court of general jurisdiction, and therefore the averment that such judgment was duly given and made was mere surplusage, and denial of such averment presented no issue of fact.

3. Pleading ⊂=8(9)—Plea of denial of due process of law held mere conclusion.

On application for prohibition against a suit to enjoin drainage district assessment which had been declared valid by judgment of superior court, plea that such judgment denied due process of law and equal protection of the laws in violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, § 1, held to present no issue of fact; being mere legal conclusion.

4. Judgment ⊂=486(1)—Apparently valid judgment of superior court not subject to collateral attack.

A judgment of the superior court validating drainage district assessment under St. 1919, p. 1092, when appearing on its face to be valid, is not subject to collateral attack.

5. Drains ⊂=81—Legislative intent to limit jurisdiction of proceedings affecting drainage district assessments to superior court of county in which validation proceeding instituted.

St. 1919, p. 1092, §§ 4, 12, 32, gives the superior court for county, in which proceedings to validate assessment by drainage district existing under St. 1911, Extra Sess. p. 117, are required to be had, exclusive jurisdiction, and deprives superior court of that or any other county of jurisdiction to thereafter entertain any proceedings purporting to involve validity of assessment or bond issue.

6. Constitutional law ⊂=56—Legislature has power to regulate jurisdiction and procedure of superior courts.

Although superior courts constitute system of state courts exercising judicial power of the state under Const. art. 6, § 1, and their jurisdiction, as defined by section 5, cannot be trenched upon, lessened, or limited by Legislature, the Legislature possesses some regulative power with relation to their jurisdiction and procedure.

7. Constitutional law ⊂=56—Venue ⊂=3—Superior court of county within drainage district may be given exclusive jurisdiction over validity of assessments.

St. 1919, p. 1092, § 32, giving exclusive jurisdiction to superior court of county containing largest area of land included within drainage district to determine validity of assessment or bond issue, held not violative of Const. art. 6, § 5, requiring all actions affecting real estate to be brought in county in which land is situated and not invalid as trenching on constitutional jurisdiction of superior courts.

In Bank.

Prohibition by the Sacramento & San Joaquin Drainage District against the Superior Court in and for the County of Colusa, Ernest Weyand, Judge thereof, Percy King, Judge presiding therein, and another. Writ granted.

Stephen W. Downey, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, amici curiæ.

J. W. Dorsey, Chas. S. Wheeler, Jr., and R. M. F. Soto, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein applied for a writ of prohibition whereby it seeks to have the respondent superior court in and for the county of Colusa, the judges thereof, and one Byron de la Beckwith restrained from taking any further proceedings in a certain action pending in said court entitled Byron de la Beckwith, also known as B. D. Beckwith, Plaintiff, v. The Reclamation Board of the State of California et al., Defendant, and decreeing that all proceedings theretofore taken by said court are null and void. The facts set forth in the application may be briefly stated to be these: The petitioner herein is a drainage district created and for several years past existing under and by virtue of an act of the Legislature adopted in the year 1911 (Stats. 1911, Extra Sess., p. 117) and known as the Reclamation Board Act and the acts amendatory thereto, and by which original and amended acts the management and control of which drainage district was vested in the reclamation board of the state of California. That said drainage district embraces lands within several central and contiguous counties of the state of California, among which are the counties of Colusa, Sutter, and Butte. That thereafter, and on November 6, 1917, the said reclamation board adopted a certain drainage and reclamation project known and designated as "Sutter-Butte By Pass Project No. 6," and which embraced in its proposed expenditures for reclamation and drainage purposes the several counties above named and others, and embraced the lands of the respondent Beckwith herein. That thereafter, and pursuant to the carrying forward of said project, and on September 17, 1920, the said reclamation board passed a certain resolution and order for the levy of an assessment upon the lands within said district amounting to the total sum of $8,155,988.70, said assessment to be known as "Sutter-Butte By Pass Assessment No. 6," and that thereafter, and in the course of making said assessment, said board appointed certain assessors for the purpose of making and placing the same upon all of the lands within said district, and which assessors did make said assessment, and in so doing prepared separate lists of the lands so assessed in each of the counties wherein such lands were situated, which said assessment lists were by the secretary of said reclamation board forwarded to and filed with the treasurers respectively of each county in which the lands affected thereby were situated, and which said lists remained open for public inspection for the period of 30 days. That thereafter said board duly appointed a time and place for the purpose of hearing objections to said assessment, of which due notice was given in each of the said counties affected thereby, and at which time and place such objections were heard and acted upon, and that thereafter, and on March 25, 1921, said board duly passed and adopted its order and resolution approving and equalizing said assessment, and whereby the same was finally approved, fixed, apportioned, and equalized so as to amount to the sum of $8,144,327.33. That thereupon the said board determined that in its judgment it would be for the best interests of the owners of land within said district affected by said assessment to issue bonds in said amount for the purpose of obtaining money for the payment of the cost of the work and other expenditures for which said assessment had been levied. That pursuant thereto, and acting under and in accordance with the terms and provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the issuance and sale of bonds of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district based upon assessments levied by the reclamation board upon land in said district," approved May 27, 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 1092), and known as the Bonding Act, the said reclamation board commenced a judicial proceeding in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Sutter, which is the county within which the largest acreage of land affected by said assessment is situate, for the validation of said assessment as provided in said act. That thereafter said judicial proceeding was prosecuted as provided in said bonding Act, with the result that on the 5th day of April, 1922, a judgment was duly given, made, and entered in said proceeding approving and validating said assessment. That thereafter an appeal from said judgment was taken by certain parties to said proceeding to the Supreme Court of the state of California, and was heard therein, and that said court upon such hearing and on August 22, 1923, by its decision duly given and made, affirmed said judgment, validating said assessment and the whole thereof. That thereafter certain parties to said judicial proceeding procured a writ of error to issue for a review of such judgment by the United States Supreme Court, and that thereafter the said United States Supreme Court by its order and judgment duly given and made dismissed said writ of error. That subsequent to the date of said judgment, and on or about the 25th day of April, 1922, the said reclamation board directed and procured the filing of the assessment lists aforesaid in the offices of the county treasurers of said respective counties, the lands within which were affected thereby, whereupon collections upon said assessment amounting to more than $127,641.95 were paid over to said county treasurers by landholders within their respective counties. Thereafter, and on September 22, 1922, and pursuant to the provisions of said Bonding Act, the reclamation board, by its orders duly given and made, called and held a bond election within that portion of said drainage district affected by said assessment to determine whether the money required to pay the cost of the works and expenditures for which said assessment had been provided should be raised by calls to be made upon such assessment, or whether bonds of said drainage district should be issued in an amount equal to the amount thereof then remaining unpaid. That at said election the majority of the votes cast were in favor of the issuance of said bonds. That thereafter the interest which said bonds were to bear was fixed by said board at 5½ per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and said bonds bearing such rate of interest were prepared and executed in accordance with said Bonding Act and the order of said board, and were, on the 9th day of January, 1923, deposited with the treasurer of the state of California as in said act provided, and in the aggregate amount of $8,028,147.75. That within 10 days after said bonds had been so delivered the said reclamation board, in pursuance of its order duly given and made, commenced an action in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Sutter against the lands and all persons owning the same or interested therein within that portion of said drainage district affected by said assessment or the issuance of said bonds to have it determined that said bonds were and are a legal obligation upon said drainage district. That thereafter such proceedings were had in said action that on the 27th day of November, 1923, a judgment was duly given and made therein, decreeing that said bonds were in all respects valid. That thereafter certain of said bonds were canceled pursuant to the terms of a certain act of the Legislature amending section 34 of the aforesaid Reclamation Board Act, adopted in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 640), leaving duly executed and uncanceled bonds of such issue in the state treasury in the total sum of $7,133,000. That thereafter, and on the 23d day of December, 1924, the said reclamation board, in accordance with law, directed the state treasurer to offer said bonds and the whole remaining amount thereof for sale. That thereafter, and pursuant to said direction and order of said board, the state treasurer duly published notice that at the time designated therein he would offer said bonds for sale, and would sell the same. That on the 24th day of January, 1925, Byron De La Beckwith, also known as B. D. Beckwith, one of the respondents herein, commenced an action in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Colusa against the said reclamation board and the members thereof, and also against the said state treasurer, entitled in the caption of the complaint therein a "Complaint to quiet title and for injunction." That said plaintiff in said complaint in substance alleged himself to be the owner of certain real property in the said county of Colusa and within the territorial limits of said drainage district, and that said reclamation board claims to have some legal title or interest therein arising out of the facts above set forth herein relating to the creation, levy, and imposition of the assessment or assessments hereinabove referred to upon and affecting the lands within said district, and specifically the said lands of the plaintiff therein, and that said board had further caused to be executed and issued and were about to sell said bonds in an amount to cover the unpaid portion of said assessment or assessments, and that said assessment or assessments and the said bonds had been purported to be validated by the judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Sutter as hereinabove set forth, and that said bonds were offered for sale, and that thereby a cloud would be cast upon the title of the said plaintiff to his aforesaid lands. That the said claim of the said reclamation board to have or impose the lien of said assessment upon the plaintiff's said lands is without foundation in either law or equity, and that all of the acts and things done by said board looking to the imposition of such lien upon the plaintiff's said lands are illegal and void, and in contravention of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and without due process of law. Wherefore the said plaintiff prayed that his title be quieted against the aforesaid claims of said reclamation board, and that an injunction issue against the said state treasurer preventing his or any sale of said bonds, and that all proceedings leading up to the validation of said assessment or of said bonds and to the sale thereof be declared null and void, and for general relief. Thereupon and after the said institution of said action the present proceeding for the procurement of a writ of prohibition against said plaintiff and said superior court of Colusa county and the judges thereof, preventing any further proceedings in said action and nullifying such proceedings as had theretofore been taken or had therein, was commenced in this court, and has been brought on to hearing and to the point of a determination herein.

[1-3] The respondents herein filed separate answers to said petition, which are, however, identical in form. Their first denials were that the petitioner is or ever was a public agency or mandatory, or was ever created or ever existed as such under or by virtue of the laws of California or of the so-called Reclamation Board Act. These denials amount simply to demurrers to the sufficiency of paragraph 1 of said petition wherein the facts of the organization of the petitioner as such public agency are specifically set forth with appropriate reference to the several statutes providing for its formation, and thus present no issue of fact. The respondents' second denials consist in admissions that there is of record the judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Sutter referred to in paragraph 1 of said petition and also attached thereto as an exhibit, but denies that said judgment was ever duly given, made, or entered, and alleges that said judgment denies to the respondent Beckwith due process of law and also the equal protection of the laws in violation of section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. These denials also present no issues of fact. The judgment referred to, the existence of which the respondents admit, is in form a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction. This being so, section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application to the pleading of said judgment. Weller v. Dickinson, 93 Cal. 108, 28 P. 854; Clark v. Nordholt, 121 Cal. 26, 53 P. 400; Ashton v. Heydenfeldt, 124 Cal. 14, 56 P. 624; S. F. & F. L. Co. v. Hartung, 138 Cal. 223, 71 P. 337. It was therefore sufficient in said petition to aver the making and entry of such judgment. The averment therein that such judgment was duly given and made was mere surplusage, and hence the denial of such averment, the making and entry of such judgment being admitted, would present no issue of fact. The same principles of pleading apply as to the judgment of this court affirming the aforesaid judgment of the superior court of the county of Sutter, and hence the respondents' denials that our said judgment was duly given and made present no issue of fact. Neither is any issue of fact presented by the respondents' remaining averment that by either or both of said judgments the respondent Beckwith has been denied due process of law and also the equal protection of the laws. Such averments or denials present but the pleaders' legal conclusions.

It is the contention of the petitioner herein that pursuant to the acts of the Legislature hereinabove referred to and to the proceedings taken and had thereunder, which are in their substance and sequence above set forth, and particularly of the judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Sutter, and of the affirmance thereof by this court and by the Supreme Court of the United States, and of the language of the act of the Legislature providing for the procurement of such judgment and declaring the effect and finality thereof, the said superior court of the county of Colusa has no jurisdiction to entertain or proceed with said action pending therein, nor had the plaintiff therein any further right to commence, prosecute, or maintain such action, and hence that the writ sought herein should issue. In order to ascertain and properly determine the basis of this contention a more extended reference to the legislative acts in question and to the administrative and judicial proceedings taken thereunder and to the past conclusions and determinations of this court thereon must be made. With respect to the validity of the several and successive acts of the Legislature beginning with the act of 1911, known as the Reclamation Board Act, and the acts amendatory and supplementary thereto, continuing down to and including the so-called Bonding Act, this court has consistently upheld the validity of such legislation in so far as it has relation to the inception and carrying forward of the work of reclamation and flood control within the several counties and portions of the state of California affected by the provisions of said acts. It will not be necessary to refer more particularly to said legislation in its relation to the preliminary stages of reclamation and flood control within said drainage district rendering necessary and leading up to the creation and levy of the assessment in question, nor to refer to or restate the effect of the earlier decisions with relation to the validity of said legislation. We may, for the sake of brevity, come immediately to the act of the Legislature adopted in the year 1919, and known as the Bonding Act. Said act is entitled:

"An act to authorize the issuance and sale of bonds of the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district based upon assessments levied by the reclamation board upon lands in said district."

By section 1 of said act reference is made to the preceding acts of the Legislature providing for the creation of the reclamation board and defining its powers with relation to the work of reclamation and flood control and the expense thereof within said drainage district and to the creation and levy of an assessment or assessments upon the lands included within said district for the purpose of paying for such work and expenditures. Section 2 of said act provides:

"Whenever any assessment levied by the reclamation board upon lands within the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district has been completed and all of the hearings before the reclamation board in regard thereto have been heard and the reclamation board is ready to make its order approving such assessment as finally fixed, as directed by section 13 of said reclamation board act, the reclamation board may at the time of making said order finally approving the assessment, and in and by such order and as a part thereof, also determine that in its judgment it would be for the best interests of the owners of land in the Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district affected by said assessment to issue bonds for the purpose of obtaining money to pay the cost of the works or other expenses for which such assessment was levied; and if the reclamation board shall so determine in and by its said order, then the subsequent proceedings in and about the matter of such assessment and the collection thereof and all other proceedings for the raising of money to be used for the purposes for which said assessment was levied, shall be as in this act provided, notwithstanding any provision or provisions in regard thereto in said reclamation board act contained."

Section 4 of said act provides:

"If the reclamation board shall in its order approving such assessment as finally fixed determine that in its judgment bonds should be issued as aforesaid, said board shall thereupon and within ten days after the passage of its said order commence a judicial proceeding for the validation of said assessment, which judicial proceeding shall be commenced, prosecuted and determined as hereinafter in sections five to thirteen, inclusive, of this act provided. During said period of ten days no action or proceeding shall in such case be commenced by any party other than said reclamation board to contest or in any manner question or interfere with the validity of said assessment, nor shall any action be commenced to have the assessment upon any land modified or annulled as provided in section thirteen of the said reclamation board act; nor shall any such action or proceeding of any kind be commenced by any party other than the reclamation board at any time thereafter; provided, the reclamation board shall itself within said period of ten days have commenced said judicial proceeding to validate said assessment as herein provided."

Section 5 of said act provides:

"Within said period of ten days after the passage by the reclamation board of its order approving said assessment as finally fixed by said board, the reclamation board shall commence in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county within which the largest acreage of land affected by said assessment is situate, a proceeding to validate said assessment, which proceeding shall be commenced by filing a copy of the assessment lists for said assessment, together with a copy of said order of the reclamation board approving said assessment as finally fixed by said board, both duly attested by the certificate of the secretary or assistant secretary of the reclamation board, in the office of the county clerk and ex officio clerk of the superior court in and for the county in which said proceeding is commenced. Thereupon the reclamation board shall notify the governor of the commencement of such proceeding and thereupon it shall be the duty of the governor to designate three judges of the superior court in the state of California, from counties or cities and counties wholly outside the said Sacramento and San Joaquin drainage district, and it shall be the duty of said three judges to sit in bank in said proceeding so commenced. Upon the filing of said assessment lists it shall be the duty of said county clerk to fix a time not less than thirty nor more than forty days from the date of such filing when objections will be heard to the said assessment lists, and thereupon it shall be the duty of said clerk to give notice of the time and place of such hearing by publishing a notice for once a week for four weeks in a newspaper of general circulation published in each county in said drainage district wherein any lands affected by said assessment are situated, and if in the case of any such county no newspaper be published in the county, or if for any reason such notice cannot be published therein, then such notice shall be published in a newspaper of general circulation published in an adjoining county. Affidavits showing such publications shall, prior to such hearing, be filed with said county clerk."

Section 7 of said act provides:

"At any time before the day for such hearing fixed in the notice published by said county clerk, any person interested in any land upon which any charge has been assessed in and by said assessment, may file in said proceeding written objections to said assessment, stating in detail the grounds therefor, which said statement shall be verified by the affidavit of such person or of some other person who is familiar with the facts."

Section 8 of said act provides:

"At said hearing or any adjournment thereof, the said court shall hear such evidence as may be offered touching the correctness or validity of such assessment or the manner of its apportionment and as expeditiously as possible shall determine and pass upon all such written objections filed in said proceeding, and shall make and enter its judgment approving said assessment or annulling, modifying or amending the same or any part thereof. Such judgment shall refer to the assessment apportioned to each county separately and it shall be sufficient to refer to the portions of said assessment which are affected thereby. The decision of a majority of said court shall be final and conclusive, and no motion for a new trial of said proceeding shall be allowed, and no appeal from the judgment given and made by said court shall be had."

Section 10 of said act provides:

"Thereupon and thereafter said assessment lists, unless annulled by the judgment in said judicial proceeding, embracing any modifications made by said judgment shall be conclusive evidence that said assessment has been apportioned according to the benefits that will accrue to each tract of land in such drainage district by reason of the expenditure of the sums of money to be raised thereby."

It is conceded herein that the procedure provided for in the foregoing sections of the said Bonding Act were regularly followed, and that pursuant thereto a judgment and decree of the superior court in and for the county of Sutter was made and entered purporting to validate said assessment as levied and apportioned under said preceding acts of the Legislature, and upon which and the validity thereof the bonds provided for in said Bonding Act were to be issued and sold. The question as to the nature and validity of the proceeding which resulted in said judgment of the superior court of the county of Sutter was first presented to this court in the case of Athearn v. Nicol, 187 Cal. 86, 200 P. 942, wherein this court was asked to prohibit the court and the judges who were proposing to sit therein from entertaining or taking action in said proceeding upon various grounds. In denying said writ this court decided that the said proceeding was a judicial proceeding over which the said superior court had been properly given jurisdiction, and that the provisions of the act of 1919, above quoted, relating to the sitting of several superior court judges therein for the purpose of determining the issues presented in such proceeding, were valid, and that such judges, when so sitting in said court under the provisions of said act, were sitting and acting as judges of the superior court of the state of California, and not as a special board for the purpose of determining such issue. The writ was therefore denied. The next case wherein the question arose as to the nature, validity, or effect of the aforesaid proceeding was that entitled, "In the Matter of a Proceeding to Validate Sutter-Butte By-Pass Assessment No. 6 of the Sacramento & San Joaquin Drainage District," 190 Cal. 532, 213 P. 974. The questions discussed therein arose upon a motion to dismiss an appeal taken to this court from the judgment of the superior court of the county of Sutter in the said proceeding pending before it. In denying said motion this court held that the proceeding so pending in said court and from the judgment in which said appeal had been taken was a judicial proceeding which had all of the characteristics of a suit in equity to quiet title to land; and that as such the parties thereto could not by legislative enactment be denied their constitutional right of appeal. The next case wherein the similar questions more broadly arose for discussion and determination was that arising upon the hearing on its merits of said appeal, and is found reported under the same title in 191 Cal. 650, 218 P. 27, wherein this court had before it the whole subject of the interpretation to be given to the foregoing sections of the Bonding Act, and of the nature, validity, and effect of the judgment which had been rendered and entered by the superior court in and for the county of Sutter in conformity therewith. In affirming said judgment this court approved what it had tentatively determined in its decision upon the motion to dismiss said appeal, to the effect that this proceeding was in the nature of an action to quiet title to each and every parcel of the lands affected by said assessment, whether located within the county in which said proceeding was pending or not, if within said drainage district; and that being such it was in the nature of a proceeding in rem, wherein the constitutional requirement of due process of law was subserved and satisfied by the giving of the notices of the pendency of such proceeding required by the statute authorizing the same, citing the long line of cases in this and other jurisdictions sustaining such procedure. The sufficiency of the notices given in the course of such proceeding was also considered and upheld by this court, as were also a number of other objections to the sufficiency of said proceeding which are sought to be re-presented to this court in the instant case. As the result of a very thorough and exhaustive consideration of the merits of said appeal and the issues presented thereon, the judgment therein was affirmed. Not content to rest upon the affirmance of said judgment, certain of the parties affected thereby sought a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States for the purpose of having reviewed therein the decision of this court; but that supreme tribunal, on December 15, 1924, dismissed said writ of error, and this gave finality to the aforesaid decision of this court affirming said judgment upon appeal. Thus, in our opinion, it has been finally determined, first, that the assessment created by the successive acts and orders of the reclamation board affecting the lands, not only of the respondent Beckwith herein, but of all other landowners within said drainage district covered by said assessment and by the lien or liens imposed thereby, is and that each and all of said liens are valid and subsisting liens upon said properties respectively; second, that the bonds provided to be voted for, issued, and sold under the terms and provisions of said Bonding Act, and depending for their validity upon the validation of said assessment, are valid and subsisting bonds, for the redemption of which all of the lands within said district which remain subject to the lien and payment of such assessment stand pledged are valid and enforceable bonds; third, that the proceeding instituted in the superior court in and for the county of Sutter, and in which was rendered and entered the judgment which was affirmed by this court upon appeal, was essentially in the nature of an action to quiet title affecting each and all of the lands and landowners within said drainage district; that, being such, the procedure for obtaining jurisdiction over each and all of such landowners and their aforesaid properties and over all persons interested therein or claiming title thereto was sufficient to confer such jurisdiction upon said court so as to satisfy the constitutional requirement as to "due process of law."

[4] As to the several objections which the respondents make to the sufficiency and validity of the proceeding in the superior court of the state of California which resulted in the judgment above referred to, such as the objection that the judicial tribunal in which said proceeding was conducted was a special tribunal and was not the superior court, and also that the said tribunal, whether or not the superior court, had no jurisdiction over the lands of the respondent Beckwith for the reason that no portion of said lands lies within the territorial limits of the county of Sutter, and also the several objections made to the validity of the Reclamation Board Act and the various acts amendatory thereto based upon the sufficiency of the titles of said acts or the nature of said amendments, these questions have, we think, been concluded by the decisions of this court against the respondents' several contentions heretofore handed down, and to which reference has hereinbefore been made. The judgment of the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Sutter, which is in precise form attached to the petition herein as an exhibit, and which in such form the respondents herein admit to have been given and made, appears on the face thereof to be a valid judgment of said court. Being such, it cannot successfully be made the subject of collateral attack. Mulford v. Estudillo, 23 Cal. 94; Hill v. City Cab & T. Co., 79 Cal. 188, 21 P. 728; Dunn v. Dunn, 114 Cal. 210, 46 P. 5; Crew v. Pratt, 119 Cal. 139, 51 P. 38; Brush v. Smith, 141 Cal. 466, 75 P. 55; Emery v. Kipp, 154 Cal. 83, 97 P. 17, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983, 129 Am. St. Rep. 141, 16 Ann. Cas. 792; Estate of McNeil, 155 Cal. 333, 100 P. 1086; Williams v. Lane, 158 Cal. 39, 109 P. 873; Crouch v. Miller & Co., 169 Cal. 341, 146 P. 880; Crouch v. Shafer, 177 Cal. 154, 169 P. 1019; Seaboard Nat. Bank v. Ackerman, 16 Cal. App. 55, 116 P. 91; Eccleston v. Roseberg, 53 Cal. App. 14, 199 P. 859. The several objections which the respondents have undertaken to set forth in their answers herein and which they urge upon the argument and in their briefs herein constitute a collateral attack upon said judgment, which under the foregoing authorities they, or either or any of them, are not permitted to make herein.

The foregoing conclusions as to the nature and finality of the judgment of the superior court in and for the county of Sutter with relation to the parties and the issues involved in that proceeding bring us to the final and only question involved in the instant proceeding, which is as to the effect of such determination upon the action now pending in the superior court in and for the county of Colusa, the past proceedings wherein we are asked to annul and the future proceedings wherein and the maintenance whereof we are asked to prohibit. This question involves a determination of the validity, effect, and application of the provisions of the Bonding Act relative to the institution and maintenance of actions involving the validity of said assessment or of such bonds. Section 4 of the Bonding Act, after providing for the institution by the reclamation board of an action for the validation of said assessment and of the issuance of such bonds within the period of ten days after the determination of such board to issue such bonds, proceeds to provide that—

"During said period of ten days no action or proceeding shall in such case be commenced by any party other than said reclamation board to contest or in any manner question or interfere with the validity of said assessment, nor shall any action be commenced to have the assessment upon any land modified or annulled as provided in section thirteen of the said reclamation board act; nor shall any such action or proceeding of any kind be commenced by any party other than the reclamation board at any time thereafter; provided, the reclamation board shall itself within said period of ten days have commenced said judicial proceedings to validate said assessment as herein provided."

Section 12 of the Bonding Act contains the provision that, "excepting in the said judicial proceeding herein provided for, no action or defense shall ever be maintained attacking the said assessment in any respect," while section 32 of said Bonding Act provides, in part, that—

"Any action or proceeding commenced by any party other than the reclamation board to contest or in any manner interfere with the validity or disposition of said bonds must be tried in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county within which the largest acreage of land affected by said assessment or the issuance of said bonds is situated, and no such action or proceeding shall be commenced by any party other than the reclamation board until the expiration of ten days after such bonds have been so executed and delivered to the state treasurer, nor unless the action in this section provided for shall not have been commenced by the reclamation board within said period of ten days."

[5] It is the contention of the petitioner herein that the effect to be given by this court to the foregoing provisions of the Bonding Act is that it was the intent of the Legislature to render the jurisdiction of the superior court in and for the county wherein the proceedings provided for in said Bonding Act for the validation of said assessment and of such bond issue were to be and were in fact instituted and determined, exclusive as to such determination, and to deprive the superior court of said or any other county within said drainage district or elsewhere of jurisdiction to thereafter entertain or determine any other action or proceeding involving the issue as to the validity of said assessment or of such bond issue. Such was doubtless the legislative intent, as evinced by the clear and unmistakable terms of the provisions of the Bonding Act, above quoted, and it remains for us to determine whether such legislative intent can be given effect through the issuance of the writ prayed for herein.

[6] The superior courts of the state of California, while located and functioning in the several counties of the state, are not local or county courts, but constitute a system of state courts, being vested with and exercising the judicial power of the state under the express terms of section 1 of article 6 of the state Constitution. The jurisdiction of the system of state courts thus established is defined by section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, and it is conceded by the petitioner herein that the constitutional jurisdiction and powers of the superior court as thus defined can in no wise be trenched upon, lessened, or limited by the Legislature. While this is undoubtedly true, it does not follow that the legislative department of the state government possesses no regulative power with relation to the jurisdiction of the superior courts of the state or to the method and procedure in and means of which the constitutional powers of these courts are to be exercised. On the contrary, it has been decided by this court in a long and consistent line of cases that "the mere procedure by which jurisdiction [of said courts] is to be exercised may be prescribed by the Legislature," and that the statutory regulation thereof will be upheld, unless "such regulations should be found to substantially impair the constitutional powers of the courts, or practically defeat their exercise." Ex parte Harker, 49 Cal. 465. The principle announced in the foregoing decision has been frequently approved and applied to cases involving the constitutional power of superior courts "in all cases in equity." In the case of Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 21, 81 P. 225, a writ of prohibition was issued by this court restraining the superior court of the county of Yolo from assuming jurisdiction to enjoin the board of supervisors of that county from proceeding to determine certain matters of fact relating to reclaimed lands within a reclamation district which had been confided by the Legislature to the exclusive jurisdiction of said board. In the case of United Railroads v. Superior Court, 170 Cal. 755, 151 P. 129, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 199, a writ of prohibition was issued by this court prohibiting the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco from proceeding in attempted violation of the provisions of sections 525 to 533, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure, defining and limiting the powers of superior courts in the matter of provisional remedies by way of injunction. In that case the objection to the issuance of the writ of prohibition was based upon the contention "that inasmuch as the state Constitution of 1879 confers on the superior court 'original jurisdiction in all cases in equity,' and that as independent of statute, by virtue of such grant, such court would have the power, incident to the exercise of that jurisdiction, to make such an order as that proposed, the Legislature had no authority to thus limit the power of the superior court." In disposing of this contention this court said:

"We are not strongly impressed by the argument made in support of this claim. We are aware of the fact that by our Constitution very many limitations have been imposed upon the legislative department, but we are satisfied that there is nothing therein that expressly or impliedly prevents the Legislature from enacting such regulations as to the exercise by the superior court of its 'original jurisdiction in all cases in equity' as those pertinent to the matter before us," —and the court proceeded to show that from the earliest period in our state history similar regulations and limitations of the powers of courts in the exercise of their equity jurisdiction had been enacted and had been consistently upheld. In the Matter of Reclamation District 1500 v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 672, 154 P. 845, the question was brought more immediately home in its application to the situation presented in the instant proceeding. In that case this court issued a writ of prohibition preventing the superior court in and for the county of Sutter from entertaining an application for an injunction restraining said reclamation district from proceeding with the construction of certain levees in accordance with an act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 130), the basis for the issuance of such prohibitory writ being the declared validity of section 3423 of the Civil Code denying to courts of equity the power to enjoin the execution of a public statute. It may be said incidentally at this point in the course of our decision that the petitioner herein urges that the foregoing case has direct application to the instant case, for the reason that the pending action in the superior court of the county of Colusa is in effect one to impede and prevent the execution of the public statutes above referred to relating to the imposition and collection of the assessment levied thereunder upon the lands within said drainage district. We do not, however, see fit to place our decision herein upon that ground. Before proceeding to a discussion of the immediate issue herein upon which our conclusion will be predicated, it will be instructive to refer to certain other classes of cases wherein writs of prohibition have issued preventing the further exercise of jurisdiction by superior courts over cases originally within their jurisdiction. In the case of Modoc, etc., Land Co. v. Superior Court, 128 Cal. 255, 60 P. 848, it was held that a writ of prohibition should issue to prevent the superior court from further entertaining an action wherein the summons had not been issued within one year and served and returned within three years, as required by section 581 (now 581a) of the Code of Civil Procedure, said section expressly providing that "the court is deprived of jurisdiction to take any other action than to dismiss the case." In the case of Davis v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 691, 195 P. 390, a writ of prohibition was issued by this court preventing the superior court from further entertaining proceedings in an action wherein section 581b had not been complied with. In referring to said section of the Code this court stated that its provisions were addressed, not only to the parties, but to the court; and this court proceeded to say (page 696 [195 P. 393]):

"In view of the fact that the superior court was then, and ever since has been, without power or jurisdiction to proceed further in the action, as we have shown, but nevertheless proposes to do so, and that further proceedings of any kind, except to again dismiss the action, would be void, we are disposed to grant the writ, rather than put the parties to further vexation and useless expense by further attempts to prosecute it. The question is largely one of discretion, and we deem it the better policy to terminate the proceedings forthwith."

[7] The case of Dungan v. Superior Court, 149 Cal. 98, 84 P. 767, 117 Am. St. Rep. 49, presents a close analogy to the instant proceeding. The superior court is by the express terms of the Constitution given jurisdiction "of all matters of probate." Const., art. 6, § 5. The Code of Civil Procedure, § 1294, subd. 3, provides that, when a decedent dies out of the state, not being a resident thereof, proceedings for the probate of his estate may be had "in the county in which any part of the estate may be." Section 1295 of said Code provides that where the estate of such decedent "is in more than one county * * * the superior court of that county in which application is first made, for letters testamentary or of administration, has exclusive jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate." In the above case proceedings had been commenced and were pending in the county of Tulare for the probate of the estate of such a decedent, leaving estate a portion of which was in Tulare county. Thereafter the public administrator of Fresno county commenced proceedings for the probate of said estate in that county, wherein also a portion of the decedent's estate was situated. Thereupon an application for a writ of prohibition was made to this court, in which it was sought to prohibit the superior court of Fresno county from taking or exercising jurisdiction over the said estate or the property thereof situate in Fresno county. The writ was granted in a decision by this court fully reviewing the authorities, holding that, when jurisdiction has attached in the superior court of a particular county, and when the statute declares that such jurisdiction when so attached is exclusive, any other superior court attempting to take or exercise jurisdiction in the same matter is acting without and in excess of its power, citing Estate of Damke, 133 Cal. 430, 65 P. 889; Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 73 P. 1070, 74 P. 441; Estate of Griffith, 84 Cal. 107, 23 P. 528, 24 P. 381; Estate of Worthington, 4 Ohio Dec. 381. The court further held that the writ should issue notwithstanding the fact that applicants might have a remedy by appeal. It may be proper at this point in the dicussion to take note of the respondents' contention that, under the express terms of section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, "all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to, or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate, shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, affected by such action or actions, is situated"; that, since no part of the property of the respondent Beckwith, which is involved in the action which he has commenced in the county of Colusa, is situated in the county of Sutter, the superior court of the latter county could not be given by statute jurisdiction of such property without trenching upon the jurisdiction of the superior court of the county of Colusa. That this is altogether too narrow an interpretation of the above-quoted constitutional provision was made plain by this court in its recent decision in Re Sutter By-Pass Assessment No. 6, supra, wherein (page 670 [218 P. 35]) it was held that the foregoing provision of the Constitution was susceptible of application to actions and proceedings of the nature of that involved in that case; and that a drainage district, even though the lands embraced therein consists of several and separate parcels of land which extend over and into two or more counties, is in its very nature a single entity, and must be considered as a unit as to the lands embraced within the boundaries of such district, citing State v. Elliott, 32 Ind. App. 605, 70 N. E. 397; Denton v. Thompson, 136 Ind. 446, 35 N. E. 264; and that, conceding that this is a suit in equity to quiet title to land situate in the several counties embraced within such district, jurisdiction is given by the Constitution to the superior court in and for the county of Sutter, in which the greater part of the land affected is situated. It may be further instructive to take note of the fact that proceedings for the validation of assessments in irrigation, reclamation, drainage, and other districts of a like character have become increasingly common in acts of the Legislature providing for the formation and functioning of such districts conducting operations which are intended to redound largely to the public welfare, and that such proceedings when fairly conducted with adequate notice and opportunity for a hearing on the part of those persons whose properties are to be affected thereby, have been favored by the courts to the extent of upholding the declared legislative intent that such proceedings, when so conducted and determined, should be binding and conclusive upon those persons and properties over which jurisdiction to so conduct and so determine them had been acquired. Among the many cases so deciding the following may be cited: Reclamation Dist. No. 551 v. Runyan, 117 Cal. 164, 49 P. 131; Reclamation Dist. No. 531 v. McCullah, 124 Cal. 175, 56 P. 887; Matter of Bonds of S. S. J. Irr. Dist., 161 Cal. 345, 119 P. 198; In re Sutter-Butte By-Pass Ass. No. 6, supra.

Bearing in mind the foregoing reasoning and conclusions of this court touching the subject of the power of the Legislature to regulate and control the procedure of superior courts in the course of the exercise of their constitutional jurisdiction and of the extent to which such power may be exercised, we approach the final question in this case, which is as to whether the Legislature by the provisions of the act of 1919, commonly known as the Bonding Act, above quoted, and which purport to confine the jurisdiction of the superior court to hear and determine all questions touching the validity of the assessment upon the lands lying with said drainage district to the proceeding to be instituted thereunder in the county within which the largest area of such lands is located, and to declare that such proceeding shall be exclusive and the determination therein final, and to forbid the institution of any other action or proceeding in any of the other superior courts of the state of California, is to be deemed to have the effect of trenching upon or invading the constitutional powers of such court in actions of the character of that instituted by the respondent Beckwith in the superior court of the county of Colusa. We are inclined to the opinion that it does not. The proceeding in the matter of the validation of Sutter-Butte by-pass assessment No. 6, commenced and prosecuted to judgment in the county of Sutter, which judgment has become final upon its affirmance by this court, and doubly so by the dismissal of a writ of error by the Supreme Court of the United States, was, as we have seen, a proceeding in the nature of an action to quiet title to all of the lands lying within the boundaries of said drainage district, and hence to the lands of the respondent Beckwith herein lying in the county of Colusa. That proceeding was a proceeding in rem, wherein the constitutional requirement of "due process of law" was fully satisfied by the giving of notice in the form and to the extent required by the statute authorizing such proceeding. The respondent Beckwith was a party to that proceeding, and full jurisdiction was acquired by said court over him and over his said property by virtue of such notice. He has had, therefore, his day in court, and has been accorded the equal protection of the laws. The superior court which has thus gained jurisdiction over him and his said property has also been accorded and has proceeded to exercise all of the jurisdiction which has been given to it by the provisions of the state Constitution above referred to; and it has exhausted such jurisdiction in so far as the said respondent Beckwith and his said property are concerned by its full hearing and final determination of said proceeding and of the issues litigated or litigable therein. Any further attempt on the part of said superior court in whatever county within said drainage district situated could only amount to a resumption of jurisdiction over the same parties, the same properties, and the same issues as to which its jurisdiction thus conferred has already been fully exercised. For the Legislature, therefore, to say that the superior court of the state of California functioning within one county which is embraced within the exterior boundaries of said drainage district shall not have power and jurisdiction over actions or proceedings involving the same persons, properties, and issues as those over which the said superior court, functioning in another of the counties embraced within said drainage district, has been given and exercised full and final jurisdiction, does not in any manner or to any degree trench upon, invade, or limit the constitutional grant of power to such superior court which has already been fully assumed and exercised by it. It may be said in conclusion that the respondents herein other than said respondent Beckwith stand in no better position to urge the objections to the issuance of this writ than does said Beckwith, since he is the only party in interest in the action pending in the superior court of the county of Colusa, the further maintenance of which this writ is sought to prohibit. Whatever other questions are presented or discussed by respective counsel herein are either fully covered by our previous decisions affecting the various phases of this same matter already considered by this court or are deemed sufficiently covered by our foregoing reasoning and conclusion as not to require further consideration.

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

DOMINGUEZ LAND CORPORATION v. DAUGHERTY, State Commissioner of Corporations. (L. A. 8519.)

1. Corporations ⊂⊃99(1)—When issuance and transmutation of stock of corporation into money or property, to become actual capital of corporation, not prohibited, stated.

Const. art. 12, § 11, does not prohibit issuance and transmutation by a commercial corporation, of its stock into money or property which is to become, in whole or in part, the actual capital of the corporation, provided the corporate officials act in good faith, and the property so taken in exchange for such stock possesses a sufficient though undetermined valuable consideration to support the transfer.

2. Corporations ⊂⊃99(1)—Whether transactions of corporations affect relation between their actual and their stock capitalization is generally mixed question of law and of fact.

Whether the transactions of corporations affect the relation between their actual and their stock capitalization is not a mere question of law determinable by an inspection of the organic law, but is generally a mixed question of law and of fact to be determined from a consideration of the facts of each case.

3. Corporations ⊂⊃67—Distribution by corporation of capital assets among stockholders, subsequent to lawful reduction of stock capitalization, is not prohibited by Constitution as matter of law.

Distribution by a capital stock corporation of some portion of its capital assets among its stockholders, subsequent to a lawful reduction of its stock capitalization, pursuant to Civ. Code, §§ 309, 359, is not prohibited by Const. art. 12, § 11, as matter of law.

4. Corporations ⊂⊃61—Legislature may prescribe conditions on which corporations may deal with capital assets and amount and value of stock capitalization.

Legislature held not deprived, by Const. art. 12, § 11, of power properly to prescribe and regulate the terms and conditions upon which corporations may exercise their limited right to deal with their capital assets and with the amount and value of stock capitalization in relation to their capital assets.

5. Corporations ⊂⊃67—Licenses ⊂⊃22—Refusal of corporation commissioner to entertain petition for permission to distribute surplus assets to shareholders, arising from reduction of capitalization, held unauthorized.

Refusal of state corporation commissioner, based on Const. art. 12, § 11, to entertain, file, consider, and determine a petition of a corporation for permission to distribute to shareholders surplus assets arising from a reduction of its capital stock, held unauthorized under Code, §§ 309, 359, and Corporate Securities Act.

In Bank.

Original application for mandamus by the Dominguez Land Corporation, to be directed to Edwin M. Daugherty, as State Commissioner of Corporations, to compel him to assume jurisdiction of petitioner's application for permission to distribute surplus to shareholders. Writ granted.

See, also, 238 P. 703.

James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert W. Harrison, Chief Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein seeks by writ of mandate to compel the respondent as commissioner of corporations of the state of California to file and assume jurisdiction over the petitioner's application for permission to distribute to its shareholders the sum of $415,000 out of its surplus money and property on hand, which surplus has been created by the act of the petitioner corporation in reducing its capital stock from the sum of $2,000,000, divided into 20,000 shares of the par value of $100 each, to the sum of $1,000,000, divided into 20,000 shares of the par value of $50 each, which said reduction in the par valuation of its shares of capital stock had been accomplished under and in pursuance of the provisions of sections 309 and 359 of the Civil Code, and after compliance with the requirements of law as therein provided. The respondent herein has refused to accept for filing the petitioner's said application for permission to so distribute the said amount of its said surplus thus created, or to permit the same to be filed in his office, and has refused to take or exercise jurisdiction over the same, basing his said refusal upon the advice of the Attorney General to the effect that said respondent, in his capacity of commissioner of corporations, has no jurisdiction under the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code, or of any other law, to receive or file or consider or grant any such application; and that in so far as said section of the Civil Code or any other statute of the state of California purports to confer such jurisdiction, it is void as in conflict with section 11 of article 12 of the state Constitution. In basing his refusal to receive, file, or consider the petitioner's said application, the respondent, by his return to the alternative writ issued herein, admits the facts set forth in the petition herein, which affirmatively show that if the petitioner's said application were to be permitted to be filed and considered and the permit applied for therein granted and the distribution of such surplus made as sought, the petitioner would still have sufficient remaining assets to more than equal in value its reduced stock capitalization, and also to largely exceed all of its outstanding obligations. The respondent does not question either the truth of the petitioner's said allegations or its entire good faith in seeking the distribution to its shareholders of its said surplus derived from the aforesaid source. We are not, therefore, in this proceeding confronted with any question involving the exercise of discretion on the part of the respondent in his capacity of commissioner of corporations as to whether, upon the facts stated in the application or to be produced upon a hearing before him thereon, such an application should be granted or denied, the sole question for our determination being as to whether in any case a corporation organized or doing business in and under the laws of the state of California can be permitted to distribute any surplus of its actual capital in the form of money or property on hand, other than earned profits, to its shareholders, in view of the inhibitions, if any, in the section and article of the Constitution upon which the respondent bases his refusal to file or consider the petitioner's said application. Section 11 of article 12 of the state Constitution provides as follows:

"No corporation shall issue stock or bonds, except for money paid, labor done, or property actually received, and all fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness shall be void. The stock and bonded indebtedness of corporations shall not be increased, except in pursuance of general law, nor without the consent of the persons holding the larger amount in value of the stock, at a meeting called for that purpose, giving sixty days' public notice, as may be provided by law."

It is to be observed that the foregoing provision of the Constitution does not in express terms forbid corporations from distributing among their shareholders any surplus money or property of which they may come into possession. If it does so, it does so by indirection under and by virtue of the first clause in the constitutional provision above set forth. The respondent supports his contention that such is its effect by reference to the like earlier provisions in the Constitutions of certain other states from which the said provision in our Constitution of 1879 was obviously taken, and to the debates in the constitutional convention attending the adoption of said provision. He also refers to certain cases decided by the courts of last resort in said other jurisdictions which, as he contends, uphold his interpretation of the terms of our own Constitution. There does not seem to be much doubt that it was the intent of the framers of our said Constitution in adopting said provision to provide that a relation of values when once created between the stock capitalization of a corporation and its actual capital in the form of money or property or both should be maintained to the extent, at least, of requiring good faith on the part of the corporation and its governing officials in the issuance of its stock for a valuable consideration in the form of either money or property; and that a like good faith should be exacted on its part and on the part of its officials with regard to any such increase either in its stock capitalization or in its indebtedness, which would materially disturb the established relation between its capital stock and its actual capital in the form of money or property to the extent of impairing the respective rights of its stockholders and its creditors to have such established relation maintained. But the respondent herein goes to the extent of claiming that the inhibitions of the aforesaid section and article of the state Constitution are absolute, and are to that fullness of extent to be applied to the instant case. To put the respondent's interpretation of said section and article of the Constitution in his own words, he says:

"On its face it relates only to the issuance of stock and bonds, and prohibits such issue except for value received therefor by the corporation. But it has a far deeper significance. It means not only that interests or shares in a corporation shall not be created except for value received by the corporation, that the condition shall not arise of there being issued shares of stock without the corporation receiving value as against such stock so issued, but also that, such interests or shares having been created, and value received by the corporation therefor, that or equivalent value is always to remain with the corporation while those interests or shares are outstanding. It was intended thereby to benefit the corporation by securing to it capital in return for all interests created in its assets and affairs, preventing any one from sharing in those assets unless the corporation had received some valuable consideration for his interest therein. Likewise it was intended thereby to benefit those stockholders who had paid value to the corporation for their shares by preventing the depreciation of the value of their interest in the corporation which would result if others were to be allowed to share in those assets without the corporation receiving value for the interests thus created. And finally it was intended thereby to create a fund for the benefit of creditors of the corporation so that in the course of its life its assets might not be withdrawn by the shareholders, after obligations had been incurred upon the faith of the ownership of those assets, without first taking care of those creditors."

In dealing with the foregoing contention of the respondent herein, we may conveniently do so first from the standpoint of the stockholders of the corporation, in order to determine what their constitutional rights are to have the relation between the actual and the stock capitalization of their corporation rigidly established and inexorably maintained. This subject has been before this court in various forms and in a number of well-considered cases, in which it may be noted this court has quoted and referred to the decisions of the courts of certain of those states from the Constitutions of which the aforesaid provision in our own Constitution was taken. The first case arising after the adoption of the Constitution of 1879 and coming to this court on appeal was Stein v. Howard, 65 Cal. 616, 4 P. 662, wherein a stockholder undertook to enjoin the trustees of the Spring Valley Water Company, a corporation, from issuing and selling 20,000 shares of its capital stock for a price much below the par value of its stock capitalization, and from providing that its stockholders might purchase said stock proportionately to their previous holdings at such reduced price. It was contended that such a transaction fell within the inhibition of section 11 of article 12 of the Constitution, and particularly of the portion thereof above set forth. This court, however, held that the transaction in question did not come within the inhibitions of said section and article of the Constitution. In the case of Garretson v. Pacific Crude Oil Co., 146 Cal. 184, 79 P. 838, the plaintiff, a stockholder of the defendant corporation, brought suit against it and certain other stockholders to have canceled certain issues of corporate stock of a par valuation of $1 per share to the latter named stockholders in payment for certain oil leases of very much less valuation than the par value of said stock. This court held that the transaction was one conducted in good faith on the part of the corporation, and that this being so, and the stock having been issued for a valuable consideration, and having been consummated through proceedings duly had by and entered upon the books of the corporation, the plaintiff could not be heard to complain.

In the case of O'Dea v. Hollywood Cemetery Association, 154 Cal. 55, 97 P. 1, this court, upon the suit of a stockholder, held valid a contract whereby the stock of a corporation was issued for property of less value than the nominal or par value of such corporate stock, upon the ground that, the directors of a corporation having in good faith issued its fully paid-up stock for the purchase of such property, the action of the corporation by its stockholders could not be questioned, nor the validity of the issue assailed on the ground that the consideration received was inadequate. The case of McKee v. Title Insurance Co., 159 Cal. 206 et seq., 113 P. 140, is a leading and instructive authority upon the subject under review. In that case the plaintiff in his capacity as a stockholder of the Wentworth Hotel Company, a corporation, brought suit to have a transaction set aside wherein 275,000 shares of the capital stock of said corporation and also the bonds thereof of the face value of $275,000 had been issued and delivered over for a single consideration of $275,000. The transaction was assailed as in violation of section 11 of article 12 of the Constitution. This court, in upholding said transaction, directed attention to the fact that the case was practically identical as to its facts with the case of Memphis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Dow, 120 U. S. 299, 7 S. Ct. 482, 30 L. Ed. 595, wherein the provisions of the Arkansas Constitution from which the identical provision in our own Constitution had been taken were interpreted. After showing the substantial identity of the two cases, this court approvingly quoted from the cited case the portion of the opinion therein wherein that court said that the constitutional provision in question "does not necessarily indicate a purpose to make the validity of every issue of stock or bonds by a private corporation depend upon the inquiry whether the money, property, or labor actually received therefor was of equal value in the market with the stock or bonds so issued. It is not clear, from the words used, that the framers of that instrument intended to restrict private corporations—at least when acting with the approval of their stockholders—in the exchange of their stock or bonds for money, property, or labor, upon such terms as they deem proper; provided, always, the transaction is a real one, based upon a present consideration, and having reference to legitimate corporate purposes, and is not a mere device to evade the law and accomplish that which is forbidden. * * * There was, consequently, no fictitious increase by appellant of its stock or indebtedness. Under these circumstances it cannot be fairly said that the bonds secured by the mortgage were issued without any consideration, whatever actually received in property."

[1] The foregoing review of the cases above referred to will suffice to show that, in so far as the stockholders of corporations are concerned, the constitutional provision here under review is not to be so rigidly construed as to forbid corporations formed for commercial purposes from issuing their stock for the purchase of property, the valuation of which does not bear an exact equality with the par value of the stock itself, and that so long as the corporation and its officials are acting in good faith in the issuance and transmutation of its stock into money or property which is to become, in whole or in part, the actual capital of the corporation, and so long as such property so taken in exchange for its said stock possesses a sufficient although undetermined valuable consideration to support such transfer, the transaction will not be held to be obnoxious to the said provision in the state Constitution. In the case of California Trona Co. v. Wilkinson, 20 Cal. App. 694, 130 P. 190, the question of the application of section 11 of article 12 of the Constitution to a transaction of a corporation, involving the issuance and transfer of its stock for a consideration less than the par value thereof, but in good faith and without the indicia of fraud, was involved. In a quite exhaustive consideration of the subject, wherein the authorities of this and other jurisdictions having similar constitutional provisions were quite fully reviewed, the consensus of the cases considered was thus stated by the court:

"The purpose of those provisions of the Constitution is, of course, to preserve at all times the property of the corporation and thus protect and maintain the rights of the creditors and stockholders thereof as against any such manipulation or disposal of the capital stock by the owners of a majority of such stock as might result in the serious impairment if not the complete destruction of the rights of such creditors and the minority stockholders and at the same time in advantage to such majority stockholders—a situation which experience shows could easily be brought about if the law were otherwise than as laid down by the provisions of the Constitution above quoted. In other words, the design of said provisions is among other things to prevent the corporate stock of a corporation from being transferred or disposed of by it without a sufficient consideration, either in the form of money, or property or labor performed for it. But by this we are not to be understood as meaning a consideration equal in value with the stock, for we do not think that the constitutional inhibition invoked here requires such a consideration to render valid the issue of stock by a corporation. If there is a consideration of some sort, and the transaction is one intended to redound to the benefit of the corporation in the prosecution of its corporate purposes, then we should say that, so far as are concerned the requirements of the law in that regard, the consideration is sufficient, and, in a sense, adequate, although it may not be equal in value to that of the stock."

Turning now to the question as to the rights of the creditors of commercial corporations to invoke the inhibitions of the said section and article of the Constitution against transactions on the part of corporations of a similar character to those involved in the foregoing cases, we find that a like liberality of interpretation prevails. It will not be necessary to review the considerable number of cases developing this principle, since, in the case of Lucey Co. v. McMullen, 178 Cal. 425, 173 P. 1000, the former decisions of this court upon the subject are fully reviewed, with the result of holding that a corporation was not prohibited by the provisions of section 11 of article 12 of the Constitution from engaging in good faith in a transaction wherein it issues its fully paid-up capital stock for a consideration of undetermined value but less than the par value of said stock, where the transaction was not tinged with fraud or bad faith on the part of those who were parties to it; and that in an action on the part of the creditors of the corporation to have recourse against those taking such stock under such circumstances, no such cause of action existed in the absence of averments and proof showing actual or inferable fraud in the transaction, and that the consideration for the issuance of said stock was not equal to its full actual value at the time of its issuance and transfer. In the quite recent case of Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., 184 Cal. 379, 194 P. 11, 12 A. L. R. 437, the subject was again quite fully considered and the doctrine laid down in Garretson v. Pacific Crude Oil Co., supra, with relation to stockholders of corporations, was given application to suits by creditors assailing similar transactions. When we turn from these parallel lines of decision in this state to the decisions by the courts of other jurisdictions interpreting and applying the provisions of those other state Constitutions which are identical or similar to the like provisions in our own Constitution here under review, we find much confusion if not conflict in the varying views of these courts. This conflict and seeming confusion in these decided cases from different jurisdictions in a large measure disappears when the views expressed by the courts are read in connection with the facts of each individual case. This is well illustrated by the case of Coquard v. St. Louis Cotton Compress Co. (Mo. Sup.) 7 S. W. 176, from which the respondent quotes copiously, and upon which he strongly relies. The facts in that case disclose a transaction which would not have passed muster under the rules of interpretation laid down by our own decisions with respect to the scope and limitations of our constitutional provision, which is identical in language with that of the state of Missouri.

[2] It may be said in this connection, as having an important bearing upon the respondent's contention in the instant case, that the seeming confusion and conflict in these decisions aptly illustrate the proposition that the question as to whether the transaction of corporations affecting the relation between their actual and their stock capitalization is not a mere question of law, to be determined by an inspection of the organic law, but is in most cases a mixed question of law and fact, to be determined after a consideration of the facts of each individual case. Looking to decisions of the courts of other jurisdictions as a whole, there are certain leading cases which stand forth and commend themselves by the fullness and clarity of their reasoning to our approval, and which are in harmony with the decisions of this court upon the immediate matter in hand. Among the earlier of these cases was that of Peoria, etc., R. R. Co. v. Thompson, 103 Ill. 187, wherein the direct question was involved as to whether the provisions of the Illinois Constitution, substantially identical with those of our own organic law in the above respect, should be so construed as to prohibit an issue of the stock and bonds of a railroad corporation at less than their face value, in good faith and for the purpose of procuring money wherewith to carry on the work of constructing the railroad. The court held that such was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution. In the quite recent case of People v. Union, etc., El. Ry. Co., 263 Ill. 32, 105 N. E. 12, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 388, the Supreme Court of that state reaffirmed the doctrine laid down in its earlier decision, and gave it the same application to a suit on behalf of creditors, invoking the constitutional inhibition against similar transactions without an affirmative showing on their part that the stock or bond issue in question was fictitious to the extent of being fraudulent. In so doing the court quoted with approval the language of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Memphis, etc., R. R. Co. v. Dow, supra, interpreting the said provision of the Constitution of Arkansas, and applying the same to the like provision in the Illinois Constitution as follows:

"The prohibition against the issuing of stocks or bonds except for money or property actually received or labor done, and against the fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness, was intended to protect stockholders against spoliation and to guard the public against securities which were absolutely worthless. * * * It is not clear from the words used that the framers of that instrument intended to restrict private corporations—at least when acting with the approval of their stockholders—in the exchange of their stock or bonds for money, property or labor upon such terms as they deem proper, provided, always, the transaction is a real one based upon a present consideration and having reference to legitimate corporate purposes, and is not a mere device to evade the law and accomplish that which is forbidden."

As to the contention of the respondent herein that the creditors of corporations have not only an equal but a superior right to the stockholders thereof to insist upon the strict maintenance of the actual capital of the corporation, without diminution or distribution to any extent whatever among the stockholders, based upon the so-called "trust fund doctrine," that phase of the discussion is quite adequately dealt with in the decision of the District Court of Appeal in the case of Dominguez Land Corporation v. Daugherty, 45 Cal. App. Dec. 884, which has been adopted by this court in its decision of said case upon rehearing this day filed, and to which reference is hereby made. The citations therein made to the decisions of the courts of other jurisdictions touching the right of the creditors of corporations to notice of or to interference with the action of such corporations, in dealing in good faith and without fraud with their capital assets, show that the prevailing trend of authority upon this subject is in accord with the decisions of the courts of this state upon the same subject. The decisions of the courts of other jurisdictions have, however, gone much farther than the decisions of our own courts thus far rendered, touching the interpretation to be given to the section and article of our state Constitution under review, in that they have gone to the full extent of holding that corporations may, when acting in good faith and without fraudulent intent or effect, distribute surplus assets of the corporation among their stockholders, without in so doing, bringing themselves within the inhibitions of the aforesaid constitutional provisions. These authorities are collated and cited by practically all of the leading textwriters upon the powers and duties of corporations, and in which treatises the rule is uniformly stated to the effect that, after an authorized reduction of the capital stock of a corporation regularly effected, a corporation may distribute among its stockholders such amount of its corporate assets over and above the amount of its capital stock as thus reduced as will leave with the corporation an amount of assets equal to its reduced capital stock in addition to the amount of its debts. The most modern and also, perhaps, the most precise statement of this doctrine is that contained in the text of Fletcher's Cyclopedia of Corporations, § 3472, wherein it is stated:

"When the amount of the capital stock of a corporation is lawfully reduced under legislative authority, the corporation is not required to keep the excess of its actual capital over the amount of its nominal capital as reduced, nor has it any right to do so; but the stockholders have the right to have it divided among them, as in the case of a dividend, in proportion to their shares. In making such distribution, however, regard must be had to the present value of the property, and the company, instead of distributing money or property equal in value to the excess of the original nominal capital and the reduced nominal capital, must retain property equal in present value to the reduced nominal capital, after deducting its debts. In other words, the surplus, if any, which a corporation may pay to its stockholders on reducing its capital stock must, in every case, be ascertained, and depends upon the result of an examination into its affairs, and not upon the difference between the original amount of capital stock and the reduced amount. Where a corporation reduces its capital stock, and the surplus which thereby results is invested in the stock of railroad corporations, the stock itself may be distributed. It is not essential that the stock be reduced to cash and distributed in that form. Whenever, by sales of property, or by means of earnings, or otherwise, the corporation comes into possession of funds which are in excess of the amount of its reduced capital stock, it can distribute that amount among the stockholders."

See, also, Morawetz on Corporations, § 443; Cook on Corporations, § 289; Thompson on Corporations, § 3670; 14 Corpus Juris, § 741.

[3] In the light of the decisions of the courts of this state first above referred to, as well as of those of other jurisdictions, defining and limiting the intent of the framers of the aforesaid provisions of our own and of similar Constitutions, with relation to the investment or exchange of corporate capital assets, and in view, also, of the consensus of opinion of the text-writers last above set forth and supported by abundant authority, it is our conclusion that the proposition of a capital stock corporation to distribute some portion of its capital assets among its stockholders, after a reduction of its stock capitalization has been regularly and lawfully accomplished, does not necessarily and of itself constitute a violation of the section and article of our state Constitution under immediate review herein.

[4] From this conclusion it would seem logically and necessarily to follow that the Legislature has not by virtue of the aforesaid provisions of our state Constitution or otherwise, been deprived of power to properly prescribe and regulate the terms and conditions upon which corporations may exercise their aforesaid limited right to deal with their capital assets, and as well with the amount and value of the stock capitalization of such corporations in relation to their capital assets. In the case of Ewing v. Oroville Mining Co., 56 Cal. 649, it was held that the provisions of section 11 of article 12 of the Constitution of 1879, relating to the increase in the capital stock of corporations, was not self-executing, but, on the contrary, provided for the enactment of general laws regulating such increase. Since that early decision the courts of this state have so uniformly and consistently upheld and enforced the provisions of the Civil Code enacted prior to 1917, relating to the terms and method by compliance with which corporations may increase or diminish their capital stock, that we deem it no longer open to question as to the power of the Legislature in that regard, within the limitations of the foregoing provisions of the Constitution as interpreted in those other and later decisions of this court to which reference has above been made.

[5] It may also be said to be beyond question, at least at the instance of this respondent, that the Legislature, being invested with the aforesaid power, may provide for an officer or tribunal invested with judicial or quasi judicial powers to entertain, hear, and determine certain matters relative to the exercise on the part of corporations of the right or privilege of effectuating an increase, diminution, investment, and disposition of their capital stock and also of their actual capital, having due regard to the rights of both their stockholders and their creditors, and to the protection to which each is entitled under the provisions of the state Constitution. The Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 673), from which the respondent herein derives his power and is invested with the duties prescribed therein, or with which he has been invested by other statutes, has been held to be constitutional in so far as it purports to invest the corporation commissioner with power to investigate the affairs and assets and proposed activities of corporations, and thereupon to issue or refuse to issue permits to do business upon a basis which is or is not unfair, unjust, or inequitable, and to issue securities and use methods in disposing of the same according as he shall determine that such transactions are or are not legitimate and lawful. In re Girard, 186 Cal. 718, 200 P. 593. We are brought by the foregoing consideration to the immediate solution before us. In the year 1917 the Legislature adopted certain amendments to section 309 of the Civil Code. Prior thereto said section provided that:

"Sec. 309, subd. 1. The directors of corporations * * * must not make dividends except from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof; * * * nor must they create any debts beyond their subscribed capital stock; * * * nor must they divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock, except as hereinafter provided * * * nor reduce or increase the capital stock except as herein specially provided. * * * Nothing herein prohibits a division and distribution of the capital stock of any corporation which remains after the payment of all its debts, upon its dissolution, or the expiration of its term of existence."

By the amendment to said section, adopted by the Legislature in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 657), it was, in so far as herein applicable, made to read as follows:

"Unless they shall have been first permitted or authorized so to do by the commissioner of corporations, directors of corporations must not make dividends except from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof; nor must they create any debts beyond their subscribed capital stock; nor must they divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock, except as hereinafter provided, nor reduce or increase the capital stock, except as provided in section three hundred fifty-nine of this Code."

Subsequent to the adoption and taking effect of said amendments to section 309 of the Civil Code, the petitioner herein presented and offered for filing with the commissioner of corporations, the respondent herein, its application for permission to distribute to its stockholders $415,000, which it asserted to be a portion of a surplus of its capital assets arising out of the fact that it had theretofore, by regularly conducted proceedings under the provisions of section 359 of the Civil Code as amended in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 127), reduced its stock capitalization from $2,000,000 divided into 20,000 shares of the par value of $100 per share, to $1,000,000, divided into 20,000 shares of the par value of $50 per share. It further alleged that its actual assets and liabilities, as shown by a detailed statement thereof incorporated in its said application, were such that it was possessed of assets in the way of money and property of a total value of $2,875,015; that its total liabilities amounted to $417,344.70; that it had a surplus of assets over its present stock capitalization and its liabilities in excess of $1,000,000, which was no longer necessary or useful in the ordinary business of the corporation, and which should, therefore, be distributed among the stockholders of the corporation. The application was verified, and was otherwise in form and substance such an application as would suffice to give the corporation commissioner jurisdiction to entertain and consider the same. The refusal of the corporation commissioner so to do was based solely upon his contention that he was not permitted so to do because of the inhibitions of section 11 of article 12 of the state Constitution. We are satisfied that for the foregoing reasons the contention of the corporation commissioner in the above respect cannot be upheld; that the transaction which the petitioner, with the permission of the commissioner, proposed to consummate was one which upon the face of its said application and upon the showing made therein did not come within the inhibitions of the Constitution upon which the latter relies, and that it was therefore his duty, under the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act, and of section 309 of the Civil Code, to entertain, file, consider, and determine the petitioner's application.

It is therefore ordered that the writ issue as prayed for.

We concur: WASTE, J.; LAWLOR, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LENNON, J.; SHENK, J.

MYERS, C. J., deeming himself disqualified, does not participate in the foregoing opinion.

1. Corporations ⊜67—Amount by which capital stock was reduced held properly carried in surplus capital account.

Amount by which capital stock of a corporation was reduced, pursuant to Civ. Code, §§ 309, 359, held properly carried in the surplus capital account.

2. Licenses ⊜22—Corporate Securities Act held to authorize commissioner of corporations to make dividends from other than surplus profits.

Corporate Securities Act construed, and held to authorize state commissioner of corporations to permit a corporation to make dividends from other than surplus profits only when the commissioner finds that the distribution of such dividends would still leave the corporation in a sound financial condition, safe for the interest of the creditors as well as of the stockholders.

3. Corporations ⊜60—"Capital stock" of corporation defined; "capital."

The word "capital," applied to corporations, is often used interchangeably with the words "capital stock," and both are frequently used to express the same meaning, to wit, the property and assets of a corporation, but, strictly speaking, the capital stock of a corporation is the money contributed by the corporators to the capital, and is usually represented by shares issued to subscribers to the stock on the initiation of the corporate enterprise; the capital stock being the consideration which Const. art. 12, § 11, requires the corporation to receive in exchange for all issued stock, whether that consideration take the form of money paid, labor done, or property actually received, and includes all subsequent transmutations of the consideration originally given or agreed to be given for the stock.

[Ed. Note—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Capital; Capital Stock.]

4. Corporations ⊜67—Withdrawal or distribution of capital stock in strict sense falls within assumed prohibition of Constitution against withdrawal or distribution of "capital stock."

It is only the capital stock of a corporation, within the strict meaning of that term—that is, the property received in exchange for all issued stock, and not the other capital or assets of the corporation—which may not be withdrawn or divided without violating Const. art. 12, § 11, assuming that such provision prohibits the withdrawal or distribution of any of the capital stock of a corporation.

5. Corporations ⊜152—Statute permitting corporation to make dividends from assets from other than surplus profits held not violative of Constitution.

Civ. Code, § 309, permitting a corporation complying with Corporate Securities Act to make dividends from assets other than surplus profits, if such procedure is authorized by the state commissioner of corporations, held not violative of Const. art. 12, § 11, as applied to assets owing existence to assessments levied and collected upon stock fully paid at par.

6. Corporations ⊜544(2)—Trust fund doctrine is limited to corporate assets, contributed or required to be contributed by stockholders in payment of their stock subscriptions.

Trust fund doctrine is limited to corporate assets, contributed or required to be contributed by the stockholders in payment of their stock subscriptions, and does not apply to assets owing existence to assessments levied and collected upon stock fully paid at par.

7. Corporations ⊜544(2)—Assets to which trust fund doctrine is applicable not chargeable with enforceable trust or equitable lien on behalf of general creditor of corporation, if latter is solvent.

Assets to which trust fund doctrine is applicable are not chargeable with enforceable trust or equitable lien on behalf of general creditor of corporation, if latter is solvent and a going concern.

8. Corporations ⊂544(2)—When court of equity will make property of corporation a trust fund in favor of creditors stated.

It is only when a corporation is dissolved or is insolvent that a trust sub modo arises in favor of creditors, and that a court of equity, at the instance of the proper parties, will make the property of the corporation a trust fund, which in other circumstances is the absolute property of the corporation.

9. Corporations ⊂438—Solvent corporation engaged in business as going concern, holds its property absolutely.

A solvent corporation, engaged in business as going concern, holds its property absolutely.

10. Constitutional law ⊂296(1)—Failure of statute, permitting corporation to distribute assets, to provide for hearing of creditors held not denial of due process of law.

Failure of Civ. Code, § 309, permitting a corporation, on obtaining approval of state corporation commissioner, to distribute assets other than surplus profits, to provide for notice to and hearing of creditors held not denial of due process of law, as applied to a solvent corporation duly reducing its capitalization, with intent to distribute assets owing their existence to assessments levied and collected upon stock fully paid at par.

11. Appeal and error ⊂1078(1)—Ordinarily, appellant, neglecting to present point in brief, is not entitled to consideration of such point.

Ordinarily, appellant, neglecting to present point in brief, is not entitled to a consideration of such point.

12. Mandamus ⊂172—Existence of valid reason against issuance to state corporation commissioner of mandamus to permit corporation to distribute dividends held ground for withholding writ, though such reason not called to court's attention.

The existence of a valid reason against the issuance of mandamus by court of original jurisdiction, at the request of a corporation, against the state corporation commissioner to compel him to permit the corporation to distribute assets other than surplus profits, pursuant to Civ. Code, §§ 309, 359, and Corporate Securities Act held ground for withholding writ, notwithstanding that the commissioner as defendant in the proceeding fails to call such reason to the attention of the court.

13. Constitutional law ⊂80(2)—Ministerial or administrative acts held not "judicial power," within constitutional provision prohibiting delegation of that power.

Ministerial or administrative acts, though involving in some degree exercise of judgment and discretion, are not judicial, within Const. art. 3, prohibiting Legislature from delegating judicial power.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Judicial Power.]

14. Constitutional law ⊂80(2)—Statute held not to confer upon state commissioner of corporations "judicial power."

Civ. Code, § 309, which authorizes the state commissioner of corporations to permit a corporation to make dividends from other than surplus profits, if he determines that the corporation will remain in a safe financial condition after such distributions, confers a ministerial or administrative function and not a judicial power, within Const. art. 3.

15. Constitutional law ⊂62—Legislature may commit to administrative officer power to determine whether facts of particular case bring it within rule or standard previously established by Legislature.

Legislature may commit to administrative officer power to determine whether facts of particular case bring it within rule or standard previously established by Legislature for his governance.

16. Constitutional law ⊂62—Statute conferring power upon commissioner of corporations to permit corporation to distribute other than surplus profits held not void as attempt to delegate legislative power.

Civ. Code, § 309, conferring upon state commissioner of corporations power to permit a corporation to distribute to its shareholders assets other than surplus profits, held not void as an attempt to delegate legislative power to the commissioner, when such section is, as it must be, read in connection with Corporate Securities Act, because the latter act makes the commissioner's determination to grant such permit dependent upon his determination that the distribution of such assets will leave the corporation in a safe financial condition.

In Bank.

Original application for mandamus by the Dominguez Land Corporation, to be directed to Edwin M. Daugherty, as State Commissioner of Corporations, directing him to assume jurisdiction of an application for permission to distribute money to stockholders. Writ granted.

James S. Bennett, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert W. Harrison and H. H. Linney, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

H. L. Carnahan, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

RICHARDS, J. The application for a writ of mandate herein presents a companion case to that of Dominguez Land Corporation v. Daugherty (L. A. No. 8519) 238 P. 697, this day decided; for the reason that while the facts in the two proceedings differ, the same general principles of law are applicable to both. Because of the said differences as to the facts, requiring a somewhat different treatment and application of the legal principles involved in both cases, we have adopted that portion of the opinion of Mr. Presiding Justice Finlayson of the District Court of Appeal which we deem applicable to the case in its present situation, and apposite to it in the presence of our reasoning and conclusions in the other proceeding. It is as follows:

"This is an original proceeding in mandamus to compel respondent, as commissioner of corporations, to assume jurisdiction of a written application by petitioner for permission to distribute to its shareholders the sum of $185,000. This sum does not represent surplus profits. Petitioner made its application to respondent under the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code.

"The petition discloses the following facts: Petitioner was incorporated under the laws of this state in 1912, with a capital stock of $2,000,000, divided into 20,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. Shortly after its organization all of its stock was issued in exchange for property which, according to an appraisement thereafter made, had a value which exceeded by $1,222,187.07 the par value of the stock. Subsequently, the corporation, for the purpose of paying its debts and developing its properties, levied and collected, from time to time, assessments upon the stock so issued by it. On these assessments it collected from its shareholders amounts which aggregated $835,000. Thereafter, by proceedings duly had under section 359 of the Civil Code, petitioner reduced its capital stock to $1,000,000, divided into 20,000 shares of the par value of $50 each, and thereupon transferred $1,000,000 from its capital stock account to its surplus capital account.

[1] "The amount by which the capital stock was thus reduced, $1,000,000, was properly carried in the surplus capital account. It represented a surplus of capital. Roberts v. Roberts-Wicks Co., 184 N. Y. 257, 77 N. E. 13, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1034, 112 Am. St. Rep. 607, 6 Ann. Cas. 213. In New York it has been held that the surplus of capital which is thus left after a reduction of the corporation's capital stock may be distributed in dividends to the stockholders if, after that is done, there shall be left in hand actual capital available for the payment of the corporation's debts exceeding the amount to which the capital stock was reduced. Strong v. Brooklyn, etc., R. R. Co., 93 N. Y. 426. In that case, however, there does not seem to have been any constitutional ground of objection to such distribution of the surplus of capital.

"From an exhibit attached to the petition it may be gathered that, upon prior applications heretofore made to him, respondent has given petitioner permission to distribute to its shareholders $650,000 of the $835,000 collected by it from its shareholders upon assessment. This sum of $650,000 has been distributed by petitioner among its stockholders pursuant to the permission thus received, leaving of the total assessments levied and collected a balance of $185,000 undistributed. On May 24, 1924, in compliance with the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act (commonly known as the Blue Sky Law) and the rules and regulations of the commissioner of corporations, and on payment or tender of the fees allowed in such cases, petitioner presented to respondent its application for leave to distribute this sum of $185,000 to its shareholders in the form of dividends.

"Respondent has filed a general demurrer to the petition. The reason assigned by him for his refusal to accept or file petitioner's application for permission to distribute the $185,000 or to take any action thereon is that section 309 of the Civil Code, in so far as it purports to confer upon the commissioner of corporations jurisdiction to permit or authorize the making of dividends from other than surplus profits, is unconstitutional and void.

"Prior to 1917, section 309 of the Civil Code unconditionally prohibited the making of dividends except from surplus profits arising from the business of the corporation. In that year the section was amended so as to provide, in effect, that the directors of a corporation might make dividends from other than surplus profits upon receiving permission from the commissioner of corporations. The section as thus amended, and in so far as its provisions are germane to the questions here involved, reads: 'Unless they shall have been first permitted or authorized so to do by the commissioner of corporations, directors of corporations must not make dividends except from the surplus profits arising from the business thereof; nor must they create any debts beyond their subscribed capital stock; nor must they divide, withdraw, or pay to the stockholders, or any of them, any part of the capital stock, * * * nor reduce or increase the capital stock, except as provided in section three hundred fifty-nine of this Code.' St. 1917, p. 657.

"The Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), contains the following provisions: 'The word "security" includes: (a) All shares or other interests or rights into which the capital, capital stock, or property of companies or rights of stockholders * * * are divided.' Section 2, subd. 6. 'A "sale" * * * includes * * * any issue of any security by a company; and the word "sell" * * * includes every act by which such sale is made.' Section 2, subd. 7. 'No company shall sell * * * any security of its own issue until it shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a permit authorizing it so to do. * * * In such application the applicant shall set forth * * * an itemized account of its financial condition, the amount and character of its assets and liabilities, a detailed statement of the plan upon which it proposes to transact business, * * * and such additional information concerning the company, its condition and affairs as the commissioner may require.' Section 3. 'Upon the filing of such application, it shall be the duty of the commissioner to examine it and the other papers and documents filed therewith, and he may, if he deems it advisable, make or have made a detailed examination, audit and investigation of the applicant and its affairs. If he finds that the proposed plan of business of the applicant is not unfair, unjust, or inequitable, that it intends to fairly and honestly transact its business, and that the securities that it proposes to issue and the methods to be used by it in issuing or disposing of them are not such as, in his opinion, will work a fraud upon the purchaser thereof, the commissioner shall issue to the applicant a permit authorizing it to issue and dispose of securities. * * *' Section 4. 'The commissioner shall at all times have the power to administer oaths and to make an examination or investigation of the books, records, accounts and other papers and of the business of any company * * * permitted or authorized by him * * * to make dividends.' Section 17.

[2] "It is a reasonable inference from these provisions of the Corporate Securities Act that the Legislature intended that the commissioner of corporations should give his permission to make dividends from other than surplus profits only when he should find that if the dividends were made the corporation would still be left in a sound financial condition—a financial condition that would be safe for the interests of the creditors as well as of the stockholders. And to enable the commissioner to ascertain whether the corporation's financial condition would be left safe and sound the statute gives him power to examine witnesses and to investigate the corporation's books and records.

"Respondent claims that so much of section 309 as purports to confer upon him the power to permit the making of dividends from other than surplus profits conflicts with that part of section 11 of article 12 of our state Constitution which declares that 'no corporation shall issue stocks or bonds except for money paid, labor done or property actually received,' and that 'all fictitious increase of stock or indebtedness shall be void.' It also is suggested that this part of section 309 violates other constitutional guarantees. We shall consider respondent's objections in the order of their presentation:

"In support of his claim that so much of section 309 as grants to the commissioner of corporations power to permit the distribution of other than surplus profits is violative of section 11 of article 12, respondent argues substantially as follows: The design of this constitutional provision is to prevent the issuance of 'watered stock'; to accomplish that end it is the purpose of the Constitution to prohibit the issuance of stock unless the money, property, or labor given in exchange therefor possesses a value corresponding with the face value of the stock or at least equals the reasonable worth of the stock; to prevent this beneficent purpose of the Constitution from being circumvented, and to thwart the accomplishment by indirection of that which cannot be done directly, no part of the consideration received by the corporation for its stock, whatever form that consideration may have taken, should ever be distributed to the stockholders prior to the corporation's dissolution, for, as was said in Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg., etc., Co., 48 Minn. 174, 50 N. W. 1117, 15 L. R. A. 470, 31 Am. St. Rep. 637, 'If the assets of a corporation are given back to stockholders, the result is the same as if the shares had been issued wholly or partly as a bonus. The latter is merely a short cut to the same result.' To this argument the learned counsel who has appeared as amicus curiæ makes a reply, the substance and effect of which, as we understand it, is this: The courts of this and other states have held that the inhibition against the issuance of stock except for money paid, labor done or property actually received is applicable and effective only when the issue is entirely fictitious, i. e., when nothing of value whatever is received or agreed to be received in exchange for the stock; in so holding the courts have practically deprived this constitutional inhibition of all efficacy, or, to employ the language of the amicus curiæ, it has become for all practical purposes 'innocuous'; it follows as a necessary sequence, says amicus curiæ, that there is no constitutional reason why a corporation should be required to maintain any ratio between its assets and the face value of the stock which it has issued in exchange for the money, property or labor received by it.

"It will be recalled that petitioner is not asking permission to distribute to its stockholders any part of the $1,000,000 which it caused to be transferred to its surplus capital account when it reduced its capital stock from $2,000,000 to $1,000,000. From the allegations of the petition it may reasonably be inferred that all of petitioner's capital stock was issued as fully paid stock, and that it was issued for property the value of which equaled, if it did not exceed, the par value of the shares. The stock having thus been paid for in full, the assessments which the corporation thereafter levied and collected from time to time, and which aggregated $835,000, were not made as 'calls.' These assessments, therefore, or rather the sums collected thereon, cannot in any sense be viewed as any part of the consideration which was agreed to be given or paid by the shareholders when they subscribed for their shares of stock. It follows, therefore, that the money which petitioner is now seeking to distribute to its shareholders in the form of dividends—the balance on hand of the total assessments levied and collected—is not and never was any part of the property which the corporation received in exchange for its nominal or share capital of $2,000,000. This sum of $185,000 is, of course, a part of the corporation's general capital; and prior to the amendment of section 309 in 1917 it could not have been distributed as dividends, for the reason that, until then, the interdiction of this code section against the making of dividends from aught but 'surplus profits' was absolute and unconditional. But that was but a statutory, not a constitutional, restraint upon the power of the directors to make dividends.

[3] "The 'capital stock' of a corporation, in the strict sense of the term, consists of the consideration which section 11 of article 12 requires to be received in exchange for all issued stock, whether that consideration take the form of money paid, labor done or property actually received, and it includes all subsequent transmutations of the consideration originally given or agreed to be given for the stock.

[4] " 'The word "capital" applied to corporations is often used interchangeably with the words "capital stock," and both are frequently used to express the same thing—the property and assets of the corporation. Strictly, the capital stock of a corporation is the money contributed by the corporators to the capital, and is usually represented by shares issued to subscribers to the stock on the initiation of the corporate enterprise.' Christensen v. Eno, 106 N. Y. 97, 12 N. E. 648, 60 Am. Rep. 429. It is only the 'capital stock' in this strict sense of the term, and not the other capital or assets of the corporation, which may not be withdrawn or divided without indirectly frustrating the purpose of section 11 of article 12—assuming, without deciding, that the withdrawal or distribution of any of the capital stock would be tantamount to an indirect violation of that provision of our organic law.

[5] "With the possible exception of so much of the corporation's capital as consists of the consideration furnished by the shareholders in exchange for the stock received by them, or is the product of that consideration, the assets of a corporation always could be divided among its shareholders without violating the constitutional inhibition against issuing stock except for money paid, labor done, or property actually received. With this possible exception, there never was aught but a statutory inhibition against dividing, withdrawing, or paying to stockholders any part of the capital stock. This being the case, there is no reason why the Legislature could not amend section 309 so as to permit dividends to be made from so much of the surplus capital as owes its existence to assessments levied and collected upon fully paid stock, even though such surplus capital may not represent 'surplus profits arising from the business' of the corporation.

"We conclude, therefore, that the provision of section 309 which, in effect, permits dividends to be made from other than surplus profits, if authorized by the commissioner of corporations, does not violate section 11 of article 12, in so far at least at it is sought to apply the permissive provisions of that code section to the situation presented by the petition now before us.

"It next is contended by respondent that the method provided for securing the permission of the corporation commissioner to a distribution of assets other than surplus profits lacks the essential element of notice to the creditors of the corporation and a hearing at which they may be present. As we understand respondent's contention, it is presented in two aspects. As a first basis for the contention, it is claimed that it is the purpose of section 11 of article 12 to provide a fund in the nature of a trust fund for the benefit of creditors, and that therefore the Legislature has no power to authorize a distribution of any part of that fund without notice to the creditors and a hearing accorded to them. As a second ground for the claim that provision for such notice and hearing is an indispensable prerequisite, it is argued that under what is commonly known as the 'trust fund doctrine' all the assets of a corporation constitute a trust fund for the benefit of the creditors; and that, therefore, unless a hearing be accorded to creditors, after due notice, none of the assets of the corporation, other than its surplus profits, may be distributed to the stockholders without violating the creditors' constitutional rights. In other words, it is claimed that, as to the creditors of the corporation, the withdrawal of any assets other than surplus profits amounts to a taking of property without due process of law.

"For reasons already stated, the facts of this case furnish no ground for the claim that the money which this petitioner is seeking to distribute among its stockholders is any part of the assets which section 11 of article 12 requires to be received by the corporation. The only assets which, by any stretch of that provision of our organic law, may be said to be within its purview are those which are formed of or are traceable to the consideration given or agreed to be given by the stockholders in exchange for the shares of stock issued to them. But those assets are entirely separate and apart from the fund which petitioner seeks permission to distribute—a fund which had its genesis in assessments levied and collected upon stock which was wholly paid for at its par value.

[6] "Equally without merit is the claim that the trust fund doctrine, so called, entitled the creditors to notice and to a hearing. In the first place, the doctrine commonly known as the 'trust fund doctrine' is, in strictness, limited in its application to those assets which were contributed or should be contributed by the stockholders in payment of their stock subscriptions. That is to say, the doctrine is based upon the idea that, as to creditors without notice of the circumstances under which the stock was subscribed, the corporation is conclusively presumed to have sought credit upon its subscribed capital stock at its par value, either actually paid in or due from stockholders—that unpaid subscriptions are assets to which corporate creditors may look for payment, and that they have the right to insist upon their collection, the same as any other debt due the corporation. But here, as we repeatedly have had occasion to point out, it is not sought to declare a dividend from those assets which represent the consideration contributed or agreed to be contributed by the stockholders in exchange for their shares of stock. The doctrine which respondent probably contends for, if we rightly apprehend his position, is that all the assets of a corporation (other than surplus profits earned in the business) from whatever source derived, must be regarded as a fund pledged for the security of creditors; and that therefore the whole capital of a corporation, that which represents assessments levied and collected as well as that which represents the consideration given or agreed to be given in exchange for stock, constitutes a trust fund held in trust for the corporation's creditors. We do not think that such a doctrine is supported either by reason or by the weight of authority.

[7] "It is uniformly held by the federal courts, and likewise by some state courts, that even those assets to which the so-called trust fund doctrine is applicable are not charged with any enforceable trust or with any equitable lien on behalf of any general creditor of the corporation, if it be a solvent, going concern, and that such creditors have no vested right of any nature whatever in or to the property of such a corporation. McDonald v. Williams, 174 U. S. 397, 19 S. Ct. 743, 43 L. Ed. 1022; Ratcliff v. Clendenin, 232 F. 61, 146 C. C. A. 253; Carlisle v. Ottley, 143 Ga. 797, 85 S. E. 1010, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 573. That this is also the law in this state results inevitably from the reasoning of our Supreme Court in Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., 184 Cal. 367, 194 P. 11, 12 A. L. R. 437, where it is held that fraud, and not the idea of a 'trust,' in any proper sense of that word, is the true basis of the so-called trust-fund doctrine. See also, Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg., etc., Co., supra, where the court says: 'The phrase that "the capital of a corporation constitutes a trust fund for the benefit of creditors" is misleading. Corporate property is not held in trust, in any proper sense of the term. A trust implies two estates or interests—one equitable and one legal, one person, as trustee, holding the legal title, while another, as the cestui que trust, has the beneficial interest. Absolute control and power of disposition are inconsistent with the idea of a trust. The capital of a corporation is its property. It has the whole beneficial interest in it, as well as the legal title. It may use the income and profits of it and sell and dispose of it, the same as a natural person. It is a trustee for its creditors in the same sense and to the same extent as a natural person, but no further.'

"If the doctrine which, for convenience, is commonly referred to as the 'trust-fund doctrine' does not impress with a trust those assets which represent the capital stock contributed or agreed to be contributed by the stockholders of a solvent, going corporation in exchange for their stock, then, a fortiori, does no trust in favor of creditors attach to the other assets of such a corporation, such, for example, as moneys collected on assessments levied on the subscribed capital stock.

[8, 9] "It is only when a corporation is dissolved or is insolvent that a 'trust', sub modo, arises in favor of creditors. Then a court of equity, at the instance of the proper parties, will make those funds trust funds which, in other circumstances, are as much the absolute property of the corporation as any man's property is his. In Wabash, etc., Ry. Co. v. Ham, 114 U. S. 587, 594, 5 S. Ct. 1081, 1084 (29 L. Ed. 235), the court says: 'The property of a corporation is doubtless a trust fund for the payment of its debts, in the sense that when the corporation is lawfully dissolved and all its business wound up, or when it is insolvent, all its creditors are entitled in equity to have their debts paid out of the corporate property before any distribution thereof among the stockholders.' But a solvent corporation, engaged in business as a going concern, holds its property as absolutely as an individual can hold his. Its estate is the same; its interest is the same; its possession is the same. In Hollins v. Brierfield Coal & Iron Co., 150 U. S. 371, 14 S. Ct. 127, 37 L. Ed. 1113, the court, speaking of the theory of the capital of a corporation being a trust fund, said: 'In other words, and that is the idea which underlies all these expressions in reference to "trust" in connection with the property of a corporation, the corporation is an entity, distinct from its stockholders as from its creditors. Solvent, it holds its property as any individual holds his, free from the touch of a creditor who has acquired no lien; free also from the touch of a stockholder who, though equitably interested in, has no legal right to, the property. Becoming insolvent, the equitable interest of the stockholders in the property, together with their conditional liability to the creditors, places the property in a condition of trust, first, for the creditors, and then for the stockholders. Whatever of trust there is arises from the peculiar and diverse equitable rights of the stockholders as against the corporation in its property and their conditional liability to its creditors. It is rather a trust in the administration of the assets after possession by a court of equity than a trust attaching to the property, as such, for the direct benefit of either creditor or stockholder.' (Italics ours.) See, also, Graham v. La Crosse, etc., R. Co., 102 U. S. 148, 26 L. Ed. 106.

"In McDonald v. Williams, supra, it was held that the receiver of a national bank could not recover a dividend paid to a stockholder, not out of the profits but entirely out of the capital, when the stockholder receiving such dividend acted in good faith, believing the same to be paid out of profits, and when the bank, at the time such dividend was declared and paid, was not insolvent, notwithstanding a statutory provision that 'no association, or any member thereof, shall, during the time it shall continue its banking operations, withdraw, or permit to be withdrawn, either in the form of dividends or otherwise, any portion of its capital.' The court said: 'The complainant bases his right to recover in this suit upon the theory that the capital of the corporation was a trust fund for the payment of creditors entitled to a portion thereof, and having been paid in the way of dividends to the shareholders that portion can be recovered back in an action of this kind for the purpose of paying the debts of the corporation. * * * When a corporation is solvent, the theory that its capital is a trust fund upon which there is any lien for the payment of its debts has in fact very little foundation. No general creditor has any lien upon the fund under such circumstances, and the right of the corporation to deal with its property is absolute so long as it does not violate its charter or the law applicable to such corporation.' After referring to and quoting from a number of United States Supreme Court decisions, the court continues: 'These cases, while not involving precisely the same question now before us show there is no well-defined lien of creditors upon the capital of a corporation while the latter is a solvent and going concern, so as to permit creditors to question, at the time, the disposition of the property. The bank being solvent, although it paid its dividends out of capital, did not pay them out of a trust fund. Upon the subsequent insolvency of the bank and the appointment of a receiver, an action could not be brought by the latter to recover the dividends thus paid on the theory that they were paid from a trust fund, and therefore were liable to be recovered back.'

[10] "We conclude, therefore, that since the money which petitioner is seeking permission to distribute is not impressed with any 'trust' in favor of creditors, and since therefore the creditors have no vested right therein, they will not be deprived of any property without due process of law merely because the statute has made no provision for notice to them of petitioner's application for a permit to divide the $185,000 among its stockholders, and that, therefore, notice to and a hearing by the creditors are not indispensable prerequisites under the state of facts presented by this petition.

[11, 12] "One more objection remains to be considered, although it has not been urged by respondent; at least it has not been directly urged by him. The objection is suggested by a reading of the brief filed by amicus curiæ. Anticipating that the point would be raised by respondent, amicus curiæ has presented an argument to refute any claim that the Legislature improperly delegated legislative or judicial powers to the commissioner of corporations when it empowered that officer to permit dividends to be made from assets other than surplus profits. If the matter before us were an appeal from the judgment or order of an inferior court, we might not feel constrained to consider a point not urged by the party upon whom rests the burden to point out error in the judgment or order. Ordinarily, an appellant who has neglected to present a point in his brief may be precluded from insisting that the court consider the matter when deciding the case—though even on an appeal this is not a hard and fast rule. Schubert v. Lowe, 193 Cal. 291, 223 P. 550. But where, as here, we are asked to issue our writ as a court of original jurisdiction, we do not think that the rule should apply. We do not think we should issue our writ in any case if we believe there is good reason why it should not issue, regardless of whether that reason is or is not called to our attention by the defendant in the proceeding. We shall therefore consider the point suggested by the brief of amicus curiæ.

[13, 14] "The power which section 309 confers upon the commissioner of corporations is not a judicial power of a character which may not be delegated. In determining whether the directors of a corporation shall be permitted to make dividends from other than surplus profits the commissioner no doubt exercises some discretion, which in a strict sense is in its nature judicial; but the exercise of purely administrative functions quite often calls for that kind of discretion. What section 309 requires the commissioner to do is, not to adjudicate—unless every exercise of judgment is to be called a judicial act—but to perform a duty of ascertainment—to determine, by an examination of witnesses and the books and records of the corporation and from a consideration of values, whether, if the dividends be made, the corporation will remain in a safe financial condition. This is a ministerial or administrative function. It is well settled that such acts, though involving in some degree an exercise of judgment and discretion, are not so far judicial that the Legislature may not place the power elsewhere than in the courts. See County of Los Angeles v. Spencer, 126 Cal. 670, 59 P. 202, 77 Am. St. Rep. 217, where it was held that the power which the Horticulture Act of 1881 gives to the horticultural commissioners to determine whether any particular place is a nuisance and to abate it is not a judicial power within the meaning of the inhibition of article 3 of the state Constitution.

[15] "A more difficult problem is involved in the question whether there is an improper delegation of legislative power. It is well settled that the Legislature may commit to an administrative officer the power to determine whether the facts of a particular case bring it within a rule or standard previously established by the Legislature for his governance. A familiar illustration is where the Legislature enacts a law prescribing that the rates to be charged by a public utility shall be 'reasonable,' and creates a commission with power to investigate and fix the rates. If, however, no standard by which the officer is to be governed be prescribed by the lawmakers, then there is an attempt to intrust a mere administrative officer with the plenary power of the Legislature, and there will then be no guard against possible arbitrary action. Thus, in State v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 100 Minn. 445, 111 N. W. 289, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 250, the court having before it an act of the Minnesota Legislature which empowered a railroad corporation to increase its capital stock if it secured the approval of the railroad and warehouse commission, held that so much of the act as required the approval of the commission was unconstitutional and void, for the reason that the manner in which and the terms upon which the commission might authorize the increase of stock to be made were entirely committed to the unrestrained judgment of the commission, without any standard having been prescribed by the Legislature to govern the commission in the exercise of its judgment. See, also, People v. C. Klink Packing Co., 214 N. Y. 121, 108 N. E. 278, Ann. Cas. 1916D, p. 1051.

[16] "If section 309 were the only enactment to which we could look to ascertain the exact nature of the power conferred upon the commissioner of corporations in such cases as this, we probably should feel constrained to hold that there had been an attempt to delegate legislative power to the commissioner in violation of the principle that the lawmaking function is assigned exclusively to the Legislature. But section 309 can and should be read in connection with and in the light of the Corporate Securities Act. When so read, we think it clear that the Legislature has prescribed a sufficient standard for the guidance of the commissioner. The leading idea which seems to run through the Corporate Securities Act is that in all cases the commissioner is to consider whether the action which he is asked to sanction—the making of dividends from other than surplus profits, for example—will leave the corporation in a safe financial condition. This, therefore, is the standard prescribed by the Legislature for the guidance of the commissioner, and the one by which he is to be governed in the exercise of his discretion whether to permit dividends to be made from other than surplus profits. We believe it to be a sufficient standard and an adequate guard against arbitrary action. In Iowa L. Ins. Co. v. Eastern Mut. L. Ins. Co., 64 N. J. Law, 340, 45 A. 762, it was held that a statute providing that it shall not be lawful for any life insurance company to contract for reinsurance of its own risks or to reinsure the risks of another company, unless two-thirds in number of the holders of the policies proposed to be reinsured shall assent thereto in writing, and that the contract for such reinsurance shall be utterly invalid and of no force until it shall have been approved by the secretary of state, which he shall do only after due inquiry and upon satisfactory evidence that the interests of the policy holders are fully protected, and that the proper consent has been given, is not unconstitutional as attempting to delegate to the secretary of state a legislative power, since it merely requires him to enforce a prescribed rule upon ascertaining, by an examination of values and mathematical relations, whether a safe financial situation exists, and whether a certain document has been properly signed.

"What section 309 and the Corporate Securities Act call upon the commissioner to do is, not to legislate by laying down a new rule, but to enforce a prescribed rule, the rule of safe financial condition. Legislative power was exercised when the Legislature, through the Corporate Securities Act and section 309, declared, in substance and effect, that dividends might be made from assets other than surplus profits if the proposed division of the assets would be fair, just, and equitable, and would leave the corporation in a sound financial condition. The commissioner is made the mere agent of the lawmaking department to ascertain and declare the facts upon which its expressed will is to take effect.

"The line of demarcation between legislative and administrative functions is not always easily discernible, the one often running into the other. But, as was said by Mr. Justice Brewer in Chicago & Northwestern R. Co. v. Dey (C. C.) 35 F. 866, 1 L. R. A. 744: 'The law books are full of statutes unquestionably valid, in which the Legislature has been content to simply establish rules and principles, leaving execution and details to other officers.' Thus in Trustees of Saratoga Spring v. Saratoga Gas, etc., Co., 191 N. Y. 123, 83 N. E. 693, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 713, 14 Ann. Cas. 606, it was held that where a statute provides that a commission shall fix the maximum price of gas and electricity 'within the limits prescribed by law,' the intention is to include both the common law and statutory law; and, as the common law prescribes that the rates shall be 'reasonable,' it was held that the statute prescribed reasonableness as the standard for the guidance of the commission, and that such standard is not too general. See, also, State v. Railroad Commission, 137 Wis. 80, 117 N. W. 846; Ex parte McManus, 151 Cal. 331, 90 P. 702; Ex parte Whitley, 144 Cal. 167, 77 P. 879, 1 Ann. Cas. 13; Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S. 364, 27 S. Ct. 367, 51 L. Ed. 523; Sears R. Co. v. Federal Trade Commission, 258 F. 307, 169 C. C. A. 323, 6 A. L. R. 358; Railroad Commission v. Central, etc., Ry. Co., 170 F. 225, 95 C. C. A. 117; Klafter v. State Board, 259 Ill. 15, 102 N. E. 193, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 532, Ann. Cas. 1914B, p. 1221; Insurance Co. v. Welch, 49 Okl. 620, 154 P. 48, Ann. Cas. 1918E, p. 471; Idaho Power, etc., Co. v. Blomquist, 26 Idaho, 222, 141 P. 1083, Ann. Cas. 1916E, p. 282.

"We find no difficulty in holding that section 309 may be read in the light of the provisions of the Corporate Securities Act, and that when so read there will be found in it a sufficient criterion or standard prescribed by the Legislature for the guidance of the commissioner. Indeed, the courts have often gone so far as to hold that an act may be construed so as to read therein an implied declaration of an adequate standard whereby the administrative body or officer is to be governed. Thus, in Ex parte McManus, supra, Mr. Justice Shaw, in his concurring opinion, says: 'The statute does not expressly prescribe any standard of qualification in the applicant. It must be construed as at least an implied declaration that no person shall be entitled to a certificate as a licensed architect, unless he has such ordinary knowledge of the principles and science of that art or profession, and such ordinary skill in the practical application of those principles and that science, as are usually possessed by those engaged therein. It is the usual standard implied in law, where no different standard is expressed by the statute.' 151 Cal. 338, 90 P. 705. See Laurelle v. Bush, 17 Cal. App. 409, 415, 416, 119 P. 953; also Trustees of Saratoga Springs v. Saratoga Gas, etc., Co., supra, where it was held that the statute, by implication, incorporated into itself the common-law rule that rates shall be 'reasonable.'

"This proceeding undoubtedly involves questions of much importance to corporate and general interests, and we have endeavored to give to them that careful consideration which is commensurate with their gravity, with the result that we have arrived at the conclusion that section 309, in so far at least as it is sought to apply it to the facts of this case, does not contravene any constitutional requirement or guarantee."

Let the writ issue as prayed for.

DEL MONTE LIGHT & POWER CO. v. JORDAN, Secretary of State. (S. F. 11328.)

Corporations ⊂⊃62 — Refusal of secretary of state to accept for filing amended articles of incorporation, providing for shares of preferred stock of designated par value and shares of common stock of no par value held proper.

Refusal of secretary of state to accept for filing amended articles of incorporation of public utility corporation, within St. 1917, p. 1367, § 3, providing for shares of preferred stock of a designated par value and shares of common stock of no par value held proper, under Const. art. 12, §§ 3, 12; Civ. Code, §§ 290, 307, 322, 362, despite sections 290b–290f, added in 1923, the Constitution contemplating a capitalization represented by shares of a single par value.

In Bank.

Original application for mandamus by the Del Monte Light & Power Company, to be directed to Frank C. Jordan as Secretary of State. Application denied.

Chickering & Gregory and Garret W. McEnerney, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert Harrison, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein applies for a writ of mandate, whereby it seeks to have the respondent in his capacity as secretary of state filed the petitioner's amended articles of incorporation, a copy of which is attached to its petition herein, the respondent having refused to receive or file the same for certain specified reasons which are fully set forth in said petition. The facts upon which the petitioner relies as furnishing a sufficient basis for its claim of right to have its said amended articles of incorporation filed in the office of said respondent and to have this writ issued to compel such filing, are also embraced in its said petition and may be stated in brief as follows: The petitioner was duly organized as a corporation in and under the laws of the state of California on or about the 12th day of May, 1919, for the purpose of engaging in such activities in the way of the distribution of light, heat, and power as would constitute it a public utility corporation, with a declared stock capitalization of $25,000, divided into 250 shares, each of the par value of $100, of which 125 shares were to consist of preferred stock entitled to certain preferences as specified in its articles of incorporation, and of 125 shares of common stock.

The law as it read at the date of the organization of said corporation provided that the preferred and common shares of a corporation should be of the same par value. Civ. Code, § 290. In the year 1923 the Civil Code was amended by the addition thereto of sections 290b, 290c, 290d, 290e, and 290f, wherein it was for the first time enacted that corporations existing or thereafter to be organized might in their original or amended articles of incorporation provide for the issuance of shares of stock without any nominal or par value, and that the articles of incorporation, in either their original or amended form, might provide for the issuance of a specified number of shares of stock with a nominal or par value, and for the issuance of a specified number of shares of stock without a nominal or par value; that the nominal or par value of shares of stock having a nominal or par value should be the same, and that, as to the shares of stock having no nominal or par value, each share thereof should be equal to every other share thereof. By these amendments to the Civil Code it was also provided that corporations organized or amending their articles of incorporation thereunder should state therein the amount of capital stock with which the corporation would begin business; and further provided that no corporation authorized thereunder to issue shares with no nominal or par value should begin business until the amount of capital with which it would begin business as stated in the articles of incorporation should have been fully paid in. There are certain other provisions in these amendments to the Code which do not need to be considered in this opinion. Acting under these provisions of the Code as thus amended in 1923 the petitioner herein, in August, 1924, proceeded to amend its articles of incorporation so as to provide that the amount of stated capital with which it would begin business was $25,000; that the number of its shares with a nominal or par value was 125, which were designated as and were to be preferred shares with the preferences particularly specified in its said amended articles of incorporation, and with a nominal or par value of $100 per share; and that the number of its shares without a nominal or par value was 250, designated as common shares. It was these amended articles of incorporation which the petitioner herein, after the due preparation thereof by its officers, and authorization thereof by its stockholders, as required by the foregoing provisions of the Civil Code, offered for filing to and in the office of the secretary of state, and which the respondent herein, for the reasons specifically stated by him, refused to file. Wherefore the petitioner herein demands this writ.

The first specific objection which the respondent presented to the filing of the petitioner's said amended articles of incorporation was that the same were in violation of section 362 of the Civil Code, which relates to the amendment of articles of incorporation, and which contains the provision, "that both the common and preferred shares shall be of the same par value." The same provision is to be found in section 290 of the Civil Code, which relates to the contents of original articles of incorporation. In response to this objection the petitioner contends that the foregoing requirement found in each of these sections of the Civil Code was inserted therein by amendment thereto in the year 1915, but that the provisions of said Code relating to par value and nonpar value stock were inserted in said Code in 1923, and that they effected a change in the law in the above regard by necessary implication, since, in permitting corporations to so organize or so amend their articles of incorporation as to provide for both par and nonpar stock, the Legislature, of necessity as to such corporations, did away with the requirement that common and preferred shares of stock, if the former were also nonpar stock, should have the same par value. The argument of the petitioner in this regard is plausible and might be effectual, except for the fact that it lies in the face of the decision by this court in the case of Film Producers, Inc., v. Jordan, 171 Cal. 664, 154 P. 605, and the petitioner herein, realizing that fact, insists that this court should now overrule that decision, or at least should confine its application to the particular facts of that case and to the particular state of the law at the time it was written. This insistence renders necessary a reconsideration of the basic principles underlying that case. In that case, as in this there was an application to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the secretary of state to file the petitioner's articles of incorporation. Said articles thus tendered in that case stated that:

"The capital stock of this corporation is $1,000,000, divided into 50,000 shares of common stock of the par value of $1 each, and 47,500 shares of preferred stock of the par value of $20 each."

At the time said articles of incorporation were presented for filing to the secretary of state, sections 290 and 362 of the Civil Code had not been so amended as to require "that both the common and preferred shares shall be of the same par value." The decision of this court was not, therefore, predicated upon this requirement in these sections of the Civil Code, but was based upon the provisions of sections 307 and 322 of the Civil Code. The latter of these is the section of said Code which provides that:

"Each stockholder of a corporation is individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation."

Section 307 of said Code is the section thereof which regulates corporate elections, and provides that:

"All elections must be by ballot and every stockholder shall have the right to vote in person or by proxy the number of shares standing in his name * * * for as many persons as there are directors to be elected, or to cumulate said shares," etc.

The learned writer of the opinion in the said case held that these two sections of the Civil Code were correlated, and were to be read together, and the words and phrases employed in each given the same interpretation. He then proceeded to point out that these sections of the Civil Code were framed upon the theory of a corporate capitalization represented by shares of stock of a single par value. Based upon this premise the opinion states that:

"It was the clear design of our law that liability should be imposed in proportion to the ownership of the capital stock, and where the shares of capital stock had the same par value, it was a matter of indifference whether the law declared that the liability should be in proportion to the owned shares or in proportion to the owned capital stock. The law, however, uses both phrases. When it comes to the stockholder's voting power in a corporation, it may not be questioned for a moment but that that fundamental right to vote is based upon ownership of the capital stock as distinguished from shares and not merely upon shares, which are but representations of value. And as little can it be questioned but that the voting power should be given to stockholders in proportion to their interest in the capital stock of the corporation."

Applying the foregoing principle to the case then in hand, the court held that to permit a corporation to so frame or amend its articles as to provide that one body of stockholders, designated as preferred stockholders, should be permitted to have shares of the capital stock of the corporation of the par value of $20 per share, while another body of the stockholders might have stock, designated as common stock, of the par value of $1 per share, would be violative of the above declared policy of the law, since under such a plan of stock capitalization the stockholder owning one share of the common stock of such a corporation, of the par value of $1 per share, would, under section 307 of the Civil Code, be entitled to the same vote and voice in the election of directors of the corporation as the stockholder of one share of the preferred stock of the corporation having a par value of $20 per share would have, or, in other words, with relation to the capitalization of the corporation, would have 20 times the voting power in voting his single share or in cumulating his share of the common stock over that of the owner of a share or shares of preferred stock; and since, on the other hand, in considering the liability of the stockholder of the corporation under section 322 of the Civil Code, the owner of one share of the preferred stock of the corporation would be subjected to the same liability to the creditors of the corporation for the proportion which his share of stock bore to the entire subscribed capital stock as would the owner of one share of common stock, although the interest of the owner of the share or shares of preferred stock was 20 times greater than was that of the owner of an equal share or shares of common stock. These consequences, as pointed out in the opinion, would be hostile to the policy of the law in accord with which the correlated sections 307 and 322 of the Civil Code were framed, and which by requiring each share of the capital stock of corporations to have the same par value served to maintain an equality of voting power and of proportionate liability among all of the stockholders of the corporation.

If we adopt as correct the conclusion of this court in the foregoing case to the effect that a right interpretation of sections 307 and 322 of the Civil Code requires a capitalization of corporations, represented by shares of a single par value, and if we apply to the instant case the reasoning as to the consequences which would flow from a departure from that principle, it would follow irresistibly that the amended articles of incorporation which the petitioner herein has presented for filing to the secretary of state also violates the same principle, and is subject to similar consequences, and this for the reason that there can be no ratio of equality between the holders of shares of preferred stock of a fixed par value and the holders of shares of common stock of no par value; and this is perfectly illustrated by what the petitioner herein is proposing to do by its amended articles of incorporation, since its main purpose in such amendment of its articles is to enable it, while maintaining constant that portion of its capital stock which is represented in its 125 shares of preferred stock with a par value of $100 per share, to increase the number of its shares of common stock of no par value to 250 shares. The effect of this change would inevitably be to give to the holders of the increased number of shares of the common stock of the petitioner a doubled vote for directors of the corporation over that of the holders of the preferred stock thereof; and this result if once permitted might go on indefinitely through further amendments of its articles of incorporation until the voting influence of the holders of the preferred stock of the corporation under section 307 of the Civil Code would be practically destroyed; or, on the other hand, by a like increase in its shares of common stock the liability of the holders of the latter to the creditors of the corporation, under section 322 of the Civil Code, would correspondingly part company with the liability of the holders of the preferred stock but in the reverse ratio. The petitioner herein, as one answer to the foregoing reasoning and consequences of the decision in Film Producers, Inc., v. Jordan, supra, points out that, as sections 307 and 322 of the Civil Code are statutory enactments, they were subject to change as to their purpose and consequences by the Legislature, and that such change was effectuated by the adoption of sections 290a et seq. of the Civil Code, providing for the issuance of nonpar stock by corporations; and that such change also had the effect of repealing that portion of sections 290 and 362 of the Civil Code wherein it is provided that the preferred and common shares of corporations shall be of the same par value. The difficulty with this argument lies in a misconception of what is really determined by our decision in said case. This misconception is in part at least due to the fact that the writer of the opinion in that case rested his conclusions upon the language of sections 307 and 322 of the Civil Code. But the language of these sections of the Civil Code is but a reproduction in statutory form of the identical language found in section 3 of article 12 and section 12 of article 12, respectively, of the Constitution, and hence the decision in that case is to be given the same effect as though its reasoning and conclusions had been predicated upon these corresponding provisions in the state Constitution, which, of course, no later statutory enactment could change. As to the provisions in sections 290 and 362 of the Civil Code, declaring that the preferred and common stock of corporations should have the same par value, it is apparent that the amendment of these sections of the Civil Code in this particular respect was made in conformity with the same principle which was declared by this court in the case of Film Producers, Inc., v. Jordan, supra, viz., that it was the intent of the framers of both the organic and the statutory law, embodied in sections 307 and 322 of the Civil Code, that the capitalization of corporations should be represented by shares of a single par value.

In order, therefore, to agree with the petitioner herein that it is entitled to have filed with the respondent its proposed amended articles of incorporation, it is undeniable that we must overrule the decision of this court in the case of Film Producers, Inc., v. Jordan, to the extent of holding that it was not the intent of the framers of the Constitution in placing therein the provisions of sections 3 and 12 of articles 12 thereof, to require that the capitalization of corporations should, for the purpose of giving effect thereto, be represented in shares of a single par value. We are not prepared so to do. The Constitution of 1879 was adopted at a time in the history of the state, and in fact of all the states, when such a concept as the existence of corporate stock having no par value was a thing unknown to the laws relating to the organization and functioning of business corporations, and also at a time when the actual or possible evils of favoritism among the stockholders of corporations, both in respect to voting influence and to liabilities, had become apparent in the history of corporate development in the opinions of textwriters and in the decisions of courts. It was in order to guard against these and certain other consequences of actual or potential danger existing or foreshadowed in that marvelous expansion of corporate growth in varied and widening fields of activity and of influence which mark that epoch in our state and national history, that the provisions of article 12 of our state Constitution were adopted, covering many pages thereof, and consisting largely of limitations upon corporate powers, definitions of corporate liabilities, and restrictions upon the otherwise unlimited right of the Legislature to unduly extend the one or to remove or qualify the other. We are, as above stated, not prepared to hold that the purpose of the framers of our Constitution was not that indicated in the decision of Film Producers, Inc., v. Jordan, supra, or with respect to this particular case to overrule or qualify that decision. In so stating we are not to be understood as indicating any view as to whether the recent and yet somewhat widely adopted idea of forming corporations with shares of stock in whole or part of no stated par value is or is not a wholesome development of the law and policy of corporations in that particular regard. This is as yet a much-disputed question among those jurists and textwriters who are disposed to philosophize upon the subject. We do not enter that field.

We only conclude in this decision that it was the intent of the framers of our state Constitution in inserting the provisions therein above referred to touching the relative voting influence and proportional liability of the stockholders of corporations to require that corporations organized thereunder should have their capitalization represented in shares of a single par value, and that such must be required of those seeking to organize corporations or to amend the articles of corporations already organized in this state so long as the aforesaid provisions of our state Constitution remain unchanged. This conclusion renders unnecessary an extended discussion of the other objections urged by the respondent against the filing of the petitioner's amended articles of incorporation and also renders needless any further consideration of the effect of section 11 of article 12 of the Constitution upon the immediate questions involved in the instant case, other than a reference to the light cast thereon by our decision in the two cases of Dominguez Land Corporation v. Daugherty, 238 P. 697, 703, this day filed; and also renders unnecessary a discussion of the question as to whether the petitioner herein, in its capacity as a public utility corporation is precluded by the provisions of section 3 of chapter 713 of the Statutes of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1367), from so amending its articles of incorporation as to provide for shares of its stock having a nominal or par value, and for shares of its stock without nominal or par value, or to file with the secretary of state amended articles of incorporation containing such provisions, since our conclusions upon the main question covers also such a case.

The application is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Proceeding by Mollie A. De Frees Brownrigg for allowance of a claim against the estate of John M. De Frees, deceased. From a judgment for Carrie De Frees, administratrix of the estate, claimant appeals. Reversed.

Welles Whitmore, of Oakland, for appellant.

Balaam & Balaam, of Lompoc, and C. Roy Garnett, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal is presented by a bill of exceptions. Appellant, Mollie A. De Frees Brownrigg, is the issue of the marriage of John M. De Frees, deceased, and his former wife, Susan M. De Frees. In the year 1888, the wife brought an action against her husband for a decree of divorce. Mollie, who is a mute, was then a minor of about the age of 15 years. The ground of the divorce action was cruelty and a decree of divorce was awarded the wife on that ground. She was also awarded the custody of said deaf and dumb minor child. As a consideration of the wife's forbearance in the matter of alimony, and her consenting to the fixing of the amount that should be paid by the husband for the care and maintenance of said minor by contract, rather than by the court's decree, the following contract or agreement of maintenance as to said minor was executed by said John M. De Frees:

"In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Alameda. Susan S. De Frees, Plaintiff, v. John M. De Frees, Defendant. No. 5008.

"Whereas, a decree of divorce was this day granted in favor of plaintiff in the above-entitled action; that in said decree no alimony is allowed and no provision is made for the care and maintenance of Mollie A. De Frees, minor daughter of plaintiff and defendant:

"Now, therefore, I, John M. De Frees, hereby promise and agree to pay to my said daughter $10 per month, on the 1st day of each and every month, commencing on the 1st day of September, 1888, until said Mollie A. De Frees arrives at the age of 21 years, on to wit: The 27th day of January, 1894. Said payments are to be made to her mother, Susan S. De Frees.

"I further promise and agree not to plead the statute of limitation to any payment that may become due under this contract, and I hereby, on behalf of myself, my heirs, executors and administrators, waive the statute of limitations as to any and all claims that may accrue aginst me under this contract for the period of 99 years.

"Dated: August 9, 1888.

"John M. De Frees.

"Witness: Welles Whitmore."

The foregoing contract was received as a part of the evidence in the case. None of the payments provided therein was ever made except one, in the sum of $10, which was paid September 1, 1888. John M. De Frees remarried and became the father of several children by a subsequent marriage to the administratrix herein and died September 1, 1918. A claim was duly presented by plaintiff to the said administratrix of the estate of John M. De Frees, deceased, which included the full amount claimed to be due under the contract with interest to the date of his death. Said claim was rejected by said administratrix, and the present action was brought to recover the principal with interest thereon, amounting to the sum of $2,036.80.

The complaint was demurred to on the ground that the action was barred by section 337, subd. 1, Code of Civil Procedure. Said demurrer was overruled, and defendant answered, but did not plead the bar of the statute as a defense to the action. Neither was laches pleaded, either specially or generally, as a defense.

The defendant, upon information and belief, alleged as a special defense to the action, that on June 7, 1889, John M. De Frees and his wife duly executed and delivered to plaintiff (appellant) a deed to certain described property, situated in the county of St. Joseph, state of Indiana. It is alleged that said conveyance was made by John De Frees and his wife and was accepted by plaintiff as and in full satisfaction of any and all claims then existing or which might thereafter exist against the said John M. De Frees on account of said agreement dated August 9, 1888, and made for the support and maintenance of said minor.

The court found that the contract was made and executed as alleged in the complaint. It further found, contrary to the allegations of the complaint, that it was not true that the said John M. De Frees did not pay the amounts therein provided, or any of them, save and except the sum of $10; also that it was not true that said monthly payments contracted and agreed to be paid by said John M. De Frees under said contract, were unpaid and past due. The finding, as to the payments under the contract having been made, is absolutely unsupported by any evidence in the case and is unsupportable upon any principle of law applicable to the facts disclosed by the record. It was further found by the court that claim made at the trial by respondent that a conveyance of certain real property, executed by John M. De Frees and his wife to plaintiff some years prior to the death of the former, was made in full satisfaction of the claim now pressed, was not true. There is evidence in the record to support this finding made in appellant's favor. Finally, it was found that plaintiff had been guilty of laches in delaying the commencement of her action. As a conclusion of law, doubtless based on the theory of laches, the court concluded that judgment should go against the plaintiff and for the defendant. No finding whatever was made on the bar of the statute of limitations, a question raised by the demurrer, but the following appears in the findings of fact:

"(10) That it is true that the plaintiff has been guilty of laches in commencing the above-entitled action."

[1] It will be observed that said purported finding of fact amounts to nothing more than a conclusion of law. No fact is stated or suggested as the basis of the conclusion, and no other reference to laches is anywhere to be found in the pleadings, findings, or record of the case. This being so no sufficient finding, as to appellant being guilty of laches, was made. Mere delay in commencing an equitable proceeding without a showing of inequitable conduct or prejudice suffered thereby is not sufficient to bar the action. Dufour v. Weissberger, 172 Cal. 223, 155 P. 984; McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 70, 155 P. 460.

This action is one at law by which plaintiff sought to recover certain payments owing by reason of a breach of contract by the defendant's intestate, and it has been held in this state, and generally elsewhere, that the defense of laches is a creature of equity. Trail v. Firth, 186 Cal. 68, 198 P. 1033; 10 Cal. Jur. 522; 21 C. J. 214.

"It is scarcely necessary to say that complainants cannot avail themselves as a matter of law of the laches of the plaintiff in the ejectment suit. Though a good defense in equity, laches is no defense at law." Wehrman v. Conklin, 155 U. S. 314, 15 S. Ct. 129, 39 L. Ed. 167.

S.) 1045, 138 Am. St. Rep. 317; Commercial Security Co. v. Archer, 179 Ky. 842, 201 S. W. 479.

[2] In an action at law, or where the plaintiff asserts no equitable rights, "the statute of limitations, rather than the doctrine of laches, furnishes the rule of decision." 10 Cal. Jur. 526. Respondent insists that the defense may be pleaded in bar to an action at law as well as an action in equity, but the cases, such as Stevinson v. San Joaquin etc., 162 Cal. 141, 121 P. 398; Elliott v. Bunce, 10 Cal. App. 741, 103 P. 897; Emerson v. Kennedy Min., etc., 169 Cal. 718, 147 P. 939, and others cited to support her contention, are actions of an equitable nature.

No showing was made that the delay had been productive of any hardship or injustice to the defendant or to the other heirs at law of decedent. If the decedent had complied with his contract and had paid the monthly allowances in accordance with his agreement, his estate would have been proportionately reduced. The question of laches is always relative to the circumstances of each particular case. Dufour v. Weissberger, 172 Cal. 223, 155 P. 984. No circumstance, even considered as an equitable question, appears in aid of respondents in this case.

[3] We next come to a consideration of the effect of the clause in the contract which waives the running of the statute of limitations. Placing one's self in the position of decedent, at the time the contract was made, it is not difficult to understand the considerations that moved him to freely waive the bar of the statute as against his afflicted daughter's claims upon him for care, maintenance, and education, until she should attain the age of 21 years, a period of about 6 years. He owed her a legal and moral duty, and it is inconceivable that a normal parent should harbor a desire to evade, if he could, the first obligation of parental duty, especially when that duty is rendered doubly imperative by the heavy hand of affliction. The question of want of consideration for the execution of the contract is clearly out of the case. An agreement on the part of a parent under the circumstances of this case, to contribute $10 per month for the support, maintenance, and education of his child, who is deprived of the sense of hearing and unable to speak and without means, until she should attain the age of 21 years, and to waive the bar of the statute on his own delinquencies or inability to make prompt payments, as by contract provided, cannot be regarded as a mere gratuitous act.

[4] In view of the circumstances in which the contract was made, it is not to be questioned that the decedent meant to waive the statute of limitations so long as he should live, and if upon his death any of the monthly allowances remained unpaid to make such payments, notwithstanding the privilege of the statute, a charge upon his estate. The fixed period of 99 years was inserted in the agreement upon the suggestion of the attorney in the divorce proceeding. Pending the settlement of the divorce action, decedent expressed himself as being willing to waive the statute of limitations as to his daughter "forever." The term "forever" was used relatively, of course, with reference to his mortal existence. Upon the suggestion of the attorney that a fixed period of 99 years be inserted as the limit of the statute, decedent readily assented thereto. He was satisfied, beyond question, that he had no such expectancy of life. But he was doubtless aware of the duty which the law of this state imposed upon a parent as to his liability for the support and education of minor children, and also as to his duty to adult children when they become sick or disabled, or from any cause become unable to maintain themselves. He agreed to do no more than the law ordinarily would have compelled him to do, except as to the agreement to waive the privilege of the statute. This he voluntarily did. In so doing he was merely exercising a personal right for the benefit of the individual which may be waived. Tebbets v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 155 Cal. 137, 99 P. 501.

[5] The privilege of the statute, being a personal privilege, is deemed to be waived, unless the debtor asserts his right under it by demurrer or plea. 16 Cal. Jur. 603. The law will not plead the statute for him. It is well settled by the decisions of this state, as well as by the courts of some other jurisdictions which have a statute similar to our section 3513, Civil Code, that no law established for a public reason is contravened by a private agreement to waive the statute of limitations. Said section provides as follows:

"Any one may waive the advantage of a law intended solely for his benefit. But a law established for a public reason cannot be contravened by a private agreement."

It has been expressly held by this court in numerous decisions that the privilege conferred by the statute of limitations is not a right protected under the rule of public policy, but it is a mere personal right for the benefit of the individual which may be waived. In Tebbets v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., supra, the authorities, sustaining the view that the statute may be shortened or waived by private agreement, as well as those which take the opposite view and hold that the statute cannot be so shortened or waived, because of the question of public policy involved, are collated, reviewed, and distinguished. No doubt can longer exist as to the rule in this state. 16 Cal. Jur. 570.

A degree of uncertainty finds expression in some of the decisions of this state as to whether the courts will place a limit of time beyond which the statute could not be suspended. Doubt on this question finds its first expression in this state so far as our investigation has gone aided by the industry of counsel, in the case of Wells Fargo. Co. v. Enright, 127 Cal. 669, 60 P. 439, 49 L. R. A. 647. That was a case wherein an agreement not to plead the statute of limitations was made in consideration of a promise by the creditor to refrain from instituting suit for the period of six months, before the expiration of which period the bar of the statute would otherwise have attached, and the plaintiff in that case forebore bringing suit for the period of time agreed upon. The court there held that the action, under the terms of the agreement, was brought within time inasmuch as the statute is one for the benefit and repose of individuals, and not to secure general objects of policy or morals. By way of argument, intermixed with possible dicta, the court further said:

" 'Its protection may, therefore, be waived in legal form, by those who are entitled to it; and such waiver, when acted upon, becomes an estoppel to plead the statute.'—citing numerous cases to the same effect. We think this a correct statement of the law.

"The Supreme Court of the United States regarded such an agreement as operating by way of estoppel in pais to a defense under the statute of limitations. Randon v. Toby, 11 How, 493 [13 L. Ed. 784]. Respondent cites cases from the District of Columbia, Maine, South Carolina, Vermont, Texas, Mississippi, New Jersey, Tennessee, and New York. We find that they support its position. See, also, Wood on Limitations, § 76, where it is stated that if the promise be made before the debt is barred, and in consideration of forbearance to sue and the creditor forbears 'it is binding upon the debtor, and at least has the effect to keep the debt on foot until the statutory period, dating from such promise, expires, either by way of estoppel or as a conditional promise to pay the debt in case the plaintiff proves it.' Conceding that some of the cases cited by appellant tend to support its contention, they do not convince us that there is any rule or principle of public policy violated by an agreement to waive the statute of limitations under the circumstances here disclosed. It is probably true that after an agreement to waive the statute has been entered into, in consideration of forbearance to sue, the courts would place some limit of time beyond which the statute would not be suspended. In the case of 147 Massachusetts [Kellogg v. Dickinson, 147 Mass. 432 (18 N. E. 223, 1 L. R. A. 346)], cited by appellant, the action was brought after 40 years. Some of the cases, as Mr. Wood does, place this limit within the statutory period, dating from the agreement, and this seems to be a reasonable limitation. But we are not called upon to decide, and do not decide any further than that in our opinion the present action was brought in time."

The agreement in that case to waive the statute was in consideration of forbearance to sue, and what is there said with reference to the time limit beyond which the statute, possibly, would not be suspended is nothing more than the expression of questionable probability on a matter not necessary to a decision in that case, as the last clause of the quoted paragraph makes emphatic.

State Loan, etc., v, Cochran, 130 Cal. 245, 62 P. 466, 600, was a case wherein the sureties on a bond, who, upon being sued on account of the defalcation of their principal, promised, in writing, pending the running of statute of limitations, in consideration that no further proceedings be taken against them for the collection of any of the obligations arising out of their suretyship, to take no advantage of delays thereafter incurred until they (said sureties) should "request that such proceedings be taken." Suit was brought more than seven years after the occurrence of the breach of the bond. It is there said:

"With regard to the policy of the law, there may be a question as to the validity of an agreement to waive the statute, made as part of the original contract, or a subsequent agreement to waive the statute for all time; and on this point we have authorities both ways. Crane v. French, 38 Miss. 531, 532; Quick v. Corlies, 39 N. J. Law, 11. But in the former case—which holds such a contract to be against public policy—the validity of such agreements for a definite or limited time is admitted; nor has any case to the contrary been brought to our attention except that of Wright v. Gardner, 98 Ky. 454 [33 S. W. 622, 35 S. W. 1116], which does not commend itself to our consideration. The general rule is embodied in the maxim, Pacta legem faciunt inter partes; and no reason, on the score of [public] policy or otherwise, can be suggested why an exception should be made in this case. In this state, at least, the validity of such agreements must be regarded as established. Wells Fargo v. Enright, 127 Cal. 669 [60 P. 439, 49 L. R. A. 647]."

It was held that the agreement on the part of the plaintiff never to sue, until requested by the defendants, was invalid as to plaintiff. But as there was a written request from the defendants that proceedings should not be taken until requested by them, accompanied by a written promise to waive the statute if the plaintiff would forbear legal proceedings, nevertheless the compliance of the plaintiff with the request constituted a sufficient consideration for the promise. The statute was held not to run from the date of the written agreement, but from the time the parties ceased to act upon it, which was at a subsequent time.

Kemper v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 618, 171 P. 426, is also a "forbearance to sue" case. It merely holds, and no case in California states a contrary rule, that:

"It is undoubtedly true that parties to a controversy may enter into an agreement to forego the statute of limitations for a definite period and that such an agreement may operate as an estoppel to a plea of the statute. Wells Fargo & Co. v. Enright, 127 Cal. 669 [60 P. 439, 49 L. R. A. 647]; State Loan & Trust Co. v. Cochran, 130 Cal. 245 [62 P. 466, 600]."

There is, however, direct authority to the point that the statute can be continuously waived by private agreement. Such a case is State Trust Co. v. Sheldon et al., 68 Vt. 259, 35 A. 177. As a part of the promises and undertaking in the declaration therein mentioned, and at the time of making the same, the defendants agreed in writing to waive the statute of limitations in respect to such promises and undertaking. Relying upon the agreement, the plaintiff did not bring its action within the time limited by the statute. The question before the court was whether the defendants were estopped by the agreement from pleading the statute of limitations in bar of the action. It was there urged that the agreement to waive the statute was void because, by private agreement, it undertook to avoid a statute, and was against public policy. The court in disposing of the questions before it said:

"The statute limiting the time within which actions shall be brought is for the benefit and repose of individuals, and not to secure general objects of policy or morals. Its protection may, therefore, be waived in legal form by those who are entitled to it, and such waiver, when acted upon, becomes an estoppel to plead the statute. Sedgw. Stat. and Const. Law (2d Ed.) 86, 87; Quick v. Corlies, 39 N. J. Law, 11; Burton v. Stevens, 24 Vt. 131 [58 Am. Dec. 153]; Gay v. Hassom, 64 Vt. 495 [24 A 715]; Randon v. Tobey, 11 How. [U. S.] 493 [13 L. Ed. 784]. When such waiver is made it is continuous, unless by its terms it is limited to a specified time. There was no such limitation in the waiver of the defendants. We, therefore, hold that they are estopped from pleading the statute of limitations in bar of plaintiff's action." (Italics supplied.)

See, also, Mann v. Cooper, 2 App. D. C. 226; Parchen v. Chessman, 49 Mont. 326, 142 P. 631, 146 P. 469, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 681; Jordan v. Jordan, 85 Tenn. 561, 3 S. W. 896; Lyndon Sav. Bank v. International, etc., 78 Vt. 169, 62 A. 50, 112 Am. St. Rep. 900; Andrews v. Cosmopolitan Bank, 183 App. Div. 787, 171 N. Y. S. 875; City of Springfield v. Deming, 215 Mo. App. 309, 252 S. W. 91; Wood on Limitations, §§ 41, 42, 53e.

Admittedly there is a line of cases which hold that the statute cannot be waived. Crane v. French, 38 Miss. 503; Nunn v. Edmiston, 9 Tex. Civ. App. 562, 29 S. W. 1115; Bridges v. Stephens, 132 Mo. 524, 34 S. W. 555; Smith v. Gillette, 59 Tex. 86; Young v. Sorenson, (Tex. Civ. App.) 154 S. W. 676; Moxley v. Ragan, 10 Bush (Ky.) 156, 19 Am. Rep. 61. Those cases, however, are contrary to the declared doctrine of this state and to most of the states which have a statute similar to ours. The decision of the states, which recognize the right to waive the statute by private contract, turn upon the interpretation given by the courts to the promise or agreement upon which the waiver is asserted. The intention of the parties must always be considered in the light of the circumstances of each particular case. A promise not to take advantage of the statute pending negotiations for allowing further time to arbitrators to report, or pending negotiations for the adjustment of the difference between litigants, will not be construed to be an agreement never to take advantage of the statute, but an agreement that the statute should not run while the settlement was pending. After negotiations have concluded, the statute will begin to run. Cowart v. Perrine, 21 N. J. Eq. 101. So, too, it has been held in cases where the circumstances seem to justify the inference that it was not intended that the statute was to be suspended for all time, it is suspended for a reasonable time only.

[6] The language of the agreement to waive the statute in the instant case leaves no room for the indulgence of inferences or implication. The intention of the decedent is expressed in clear, unequivocal language. There can be no doubt as to what he meant to do. If no rule of public policy or morals is violated by an agreement to waive the statute, and if the rule is embodied in the maxim, Pacta legem faciunt inter partes, as was held by this court in State Loan, etc., Co. v. Cochran, supra, no sufficient reason is shown in the instant case why the agreement made by the parties thereto should not be respected. No decision of this state holds to the contrary. That the daughter forbore to sue her father, or harass him with legal process, should not, considering the relationship existing between them, be now urged against her. She relied upon his promise that the bar of the statute would never be pleaded against his obligations to her.

[7] Respondent makes the point that the evidence was not sufficient to show that the decedent had not paid the monthly allowances according to his agreement, and under some authorities (1 A. L. R. 781; Gage v. Downey, 79 Cal. 140, 21 P. 527, 855), in the absence of rebutting circumstances, debts will be presumed paid after the lapse of 20 years from the time they become due. Such a presumption cannot be indulged here. The appellant, doubtless because of her afflictions, was not called as a witness in the case. The mother, however, with whom appellant had resided during the greater part of her lifetime and who had the burden of her support, testified that no moneys except the first monthly allowance of $10, had been paid by the father in accordance with his agreement; that had he made any further or other payments she would have had knowledge of them. The agreement provided that all payments should be made to the mother. The attorney for the wife in the divorce proceeding, who is also attorney for appellant in this proceeding, testified that he had upon many occasions covering a series of years attempted to collect the unpaid monthly allowances, but had repeatedly met with failures. The decedent, said attorney testified, told him that all remittances would be sent to him to be delivered to the wife. No remittances were received except the first monthly allowance. No serious claim was made at the trial or is made here that any payments, except the first payment of $10, have actually been made. There is no merit in the contention that the evidence is insufficient to show that the amount sued for, or any part thereof, was at any time paid by decedent.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

BELL v. KELLY. (Civ. 5184.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 10, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court, Aug. 6, 1925.)

1. Libel and slander ⟸121(2)—Damages of $8,000 held not excessive for slander.

In action for damages for slander, damages of $8,000 for charging plaintiff with running a house of prostitution and calling her a prostitute, and declaring that she had stolen some tables and chairs, held not excessive.

2. Trial ⟸112—Trial court has sound discretion as to amount of time to be allowed for argument.

Amount of time to be allowed for argument is a matter resting in sound discretion of trial court.

3. Appeal and error ⟸925(3)—Reviewing tribunal cannot presume that more lengthy argument would have caused jury to see facts differently.

In action for damages for slander, with trial court restricting argument of counsel, reviewing tribunal could not presume that a more lengthy argument upon the facts would have caused jury to see them differently than it did.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1050(1)—Any error in permitting plaintiff's witness to testify that persons heard defendant's slanderous statements of plaintiff held not prejudicial.

In action for damages for slander, any error in permitting witness to state his conclusion that persons two or three feet away heard slanderous statements held not prejudicial, where on cross-examination witness testified to situation of different persons, and that defendant talked as loud as witness while on stand, and plaintiff testified that she heard defendant's remark.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by Mary Jane Bell against Mike Kelly. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John L. Richardson, T. E. Parke, and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Weber & Crawford, of Santa Monica, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $8,000, in an action brought to recover damages for slander. The allegations of the complaint were denied, and as a separate defense numerous incidents in the conduct of plaintiff's hotel business were set forth as a justification for some of the slanderous remarks alleged to have been made by defendant.

The complaint contained a number of counts, but the ones upon which the jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff were counts 4, 6, and 7, reading, in part, respectively, as follows:

"That on or about the month of August, 1921, at Los Angeles, Cal., the defendant maliciously, falsely, and with the intent of injuring the plaintiff, stated to Mr. Charles H. Magee, as follows: 'She (meaning Mary Jane Bell, the plaintiff herein) is running a house of prostitution down there (meaning the Winnipeg Hotel), and I am going to get her out under the Red Light Abatement Act. She is permitting all kinds of immorality, and I am going to have the district attorney put her out, and if I can't get her out one way, I will another.' That on or about the 1st day of September, 1921, at the city of Ocean Park, Cal., and while the plaintiff was passing the place of business of the defendant, the defendant called out in a loud tone of voice at the plaintiff, the following: 'Prostitute.' That on or about the 1st day of March, 1921, at Santa Monica, Cal., the defendant maliciously, falsely, and with the intent of injuring plaintiff, stated to one Van Tyne that the plaintiff had stolen from the defendant tables and chairs."

[1] Since the jury found upon substantial evidence that the foregoing allegations of the complaint were true, we think their finding as to damages is not excessive. Five thousand dollars was given on the fourth count, $2,000 on the sixth count, and $1,000 on the seventh count. The larger amount was given upon the fourth count, probably because the language therein recited tended to injure plaintiff not only personally, but in the conduct and management of her business, which was that of operating a hotel.

[2, 3] In addition to the claim that the damages are excessive, appellant contends that error was committed by the trial court in restricting the time for argument by counsel before the jury to 35 minutes for each party. The plaintiff and respondent was satisfied with this allotment of time, and it is a matter resting within the sound discretion of the trial court. We may not presume that a more lengthy argument upon the facts would have caused the jury to see them differently than it did.

[4] Complaint is made of the ruling of the trial court in permitting a witness to testify that on the occasion when the defendant made one of the slanderous statements about plaintiff, persons passing by on the street about two or three feet away from his doorway could hear it. If error was committed in thus permitting the witness to state his own conclusion, it was not prejudicial, because upon cross-examination defendant caused this witness to testify in detail regarding the occurrence, and he stated that on the occasion in question he was standing on the side of a counter opposite from where defendant was standing in defendant's store, near the front of the store; that persons were passing; that defendant pointed to plaintiff as she came down the street and called her a "prostitute"; that in doing so he talked as loud as the witness was talking then upon the witness stand. The jury thus had an opportunity to judge whether or not persons two or three feet away could hear the remark. Plaintiff also testified as to this incident, and that she heard the language of defendant as she was passing along the street in front of his store.

There are a few other objections made to rulings upon evidence, but we can find no merit in any of the contentions made with reference to them; most of them relate to matters which could not constitute prejudicial error even though theoretically incorrect.

The judgment is affirmed.

GRANGER v. RAJE. (Civ. 4413.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 25, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Weight to be given conflicting evidence as to contents of lease contract held question for trial court.

In action for unlawful detainer, in which evidence as to whether lease contract contained provision for option for renewal at time it was written was conflicting, weight to be given such evidence was for trial court.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1010(1)—Appellate court will not disturb findings of trial court sustained by evidence.

In action for unlawful detainer, where evidence as to whether lease contract contained option for renewal sustained trial court's findings, appellate court will not disturb such findings.

3. Costs ⟸260(4)—Appeal held not frivolous, so as to justify penalizing appellant.

In action for unlawful detainer, defended on ground that lease of premises in question contained option for renewal, which defendant had exercised, where evidence as to whether lease contract contained such provision was conflicting, appeal by defendant held not frivolous, so as to justify penalizing him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action for unlawful detainer by Paul H. Granger against Thor Raje. From the judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Walters & Mauk, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Action in unlawful detainer. Plaintiff acquired the real property in controversy as a gift from his father, Ralph Granger, a few months prior to the commencement of the action. Prior to conveying this property to his son, Ralph Granger had leased it to the defendant. According to the contention of plaintiff and his father, the term of this lease was one year, beginning on March 15, 1921. A copy of such a lease was attached to the complaint and the original produced in court at the trial. It bore the signatures of the parties thereto and no question is made as to the genuineness of such signatures. Both plaintiff and his father testified in effect that this lease was the only lease they, or either of them, had given to the defendant of the premises in question. The defendant claimed that his lease was for a period of one year, with an option of two years additional upon the same terms as the first year, and that he had given due notice to the plaintiff of his desire to avail himself of the right given him under the option. Defendant produced at the trial a purported lease, in most respects a copy of the lease produced by plaintiff, but with the difference that it contained a paragraph reading as follows:

"And the said party of the second part shall have the right to renew and extend this lease for two years on same terms and conditions after the expiration of first year as provided herein."

Both copies of the lease were on printed forms with the blanks therein filled in, in the main, in typewriting, with the exception of the above paragraph, which was in the handwriting of the wife of the defendant, and this paragraph was written in one of of the blank spaces of the printed form used in preparing the lease. The real controversy in this action revolves around these two instruments; the plaintiff claiming that the one produced by him was the only lease which had been given to the defendant, while the defendant contends that the one produced by him and containing the two-year option paragraph was the real lease of the parties.

[1, 2] Assuming that the explanation given by the defendant and his wife, as to how the disputed paragraph came to be written by Mrs. Raje in the copy of the lease produced by the defendant, was both reasonable and plausible, yet the plaintiff, who acted for his father in the negotiations leading up to the execution of the lease, and Ralph Granger, the father, each gave testimony in direct conflict with that of the defendant and his wife. It may be that this testimony on behalf of plaintiff may not be in all respects free from objection, yet the weight to be given it was for the trial court. Evidently the court accepted the statements of plaintiff and his father in preference to those of the defendant and his wife, and we are not prepared to say that it was not justified in doing so. The evidence on plaintiff's behalf unquestionably sustains the findings. This being the case, this court will not disturb them.

[3] The question of whether plaintiff acted as the agent of his father in procuring the lease and agreeing to the terms thereof is not involved in this appeal, in view of the admission of respondent that such agency existed and that every act of plaintiff in connection with the lease was binding upon his father, Ralph Granger.

We are not prepared, however, to hold that the appeal is frivolous, and that, therefore, appellant should be penalized for taking the same.

Judgment is affirmed.

WASHBURN v. MANN et al. (Civ. 2844.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 22, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 20, 1925.)

Schools and school districts ⟸65—Purchase of school site for union school district held invalid as having been based on inapplicable statute.

Pol. Code, § 1611, is not applicable to purchase of a school site for union school district, despite section 1589a giving boards of trustees in such districts the powers and duties of boards of school trustees, except as otherwise provided, as section 1585 et seq. contains special provisions for selection of sites in union school districts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County, Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Suit by E. T. Washburn against C. O. Mann and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. P. Rich, of Marysville, for appellants.
W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

SHIELDS, Judge pro tem. The question involved here is the manner in which a school or schools are located in union school districts. In this case a union school district, later known as "Feather River Union School District," was organized as required by law by merging two existing school districts in Yuba county. Shortly after the formation of the union school district the defendants Mann, Beard, Hanson, Parsons, and Shaver qualified as trustees of the district, and later proceeded and attempted to select and purchase a site for the union schoolhouse and grounds. In doing this they adopted the procedure provided by section 1611 of the Political Code, deeming this section applicable because of section 1589a, Political Code, which provides:

"The powers and duties of boards of trustees in union * * * school districts shall be such as are now, or may hereafter be assigned by law to boards of school trustees, except as otherwise provided in sections one thousand five hundred eighty-five to one thousand five hundred ninety-one c, inclusive of this Code."

Under the procedure adopted, that provided by section 1611 of the Political Code, the trustees selected a tract of three acres of land owned by the defendant J. F. Michel which they proposed to purchase. The price agreed upon was $1,500, which was paid to J. F. Michel and he, together with his wife, Emma Michel, thereupon executed a deed to the trustees for the above mentioned three-acre tract.

Thereafter and on February 19, 1924, the plaintiff, the respondent herein, began this action asking that the attempted purchase be declared void; that the deed be canceled; and that J. F. Michel be directed to repay to the trustees the purchase price of the land. Defendants filed an answer admitting that they had followed the procedure provided for by section 1611 of the Political Code and justifying their action thereby. Thereupon plaintiff moved for judgment on the pleadings, which motion was granted by the trial court. This case comes here upon appeal from that judgment. The appeal is not well taken.

The very section of the law which provides for the formation and organization of union school districts (section 1585, Pol. Code) very clearly provides a system by which the newly formed school shall be named and how the location of the school or schools therein shall be determined. This system is complete, and must be held to be exclusive.

Under it and succeeding sections, additional schools may be located in any union school district, and changes of location of any existing school may be effected. Section 1589, Pol. Code. The general law relating to school trustees is made applicable to union school trustees only as to such particulars as are not specially provided for in the law relating to union school trustees. With reference to the cases where there is a special provision, there is an exception and the general school law does not apply. Section 1589a, Pol. Code. Sections 1585 et seq. do make a special provision relating to union school trustees and the method by which they locate a union school and purchase a site, and therefore the general law as contained in section 1611 of the Political Code does not apply in this respect to union schools.

Other points raised in the appeal are not necessary to the decision of the case. The wrong method having been adopted in the attempted location and purchase of the school site, it follows that the judgment so declaring should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

ENTERPRISE FOUNDRY CO. v. POLLY.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 15, 1925.)

Appeal and error ⊜1071(3)—Judgment based on sufficient ultimate findings held not subject to attack because additional findings of probative facts were not sufficient.

Judgment in action to recover possession of engine, based on findings that plaintiff was not the owner and entitled to possession of the engine, that it was not wrongfully detained from plaintiff, and that defendant was the owner and entitled to the possession, held not subject to attack on appeal because additional findings that defendant had purchased the engine from plaintiff's agent and paid therefor were not sufficient to establish payment or agency.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by the Enterprise Foundry Company against A. Polly. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pierson & Stone and Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for appellant.

M. H. Iverson, of Ukiah, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll alone, in an action wherein the plaintiff sought to recover possession of a certain gasoline engine, or the value thereof. The defendant had judgment, and the plaintiff appeals.

The only points relied upon for reversal are the alleged inconsistencies in the findings, and that therefore the judgment is not supported by the findings of facts.

At the conclusion of the trial, the court made the following findings of fact:

"(1) The court finds that the plaintiff, on August 16, 1921, was not and is not now the owner of and entitled to the possession of that certain 8 horse power gasoline engine No. 370, which said engine was and is now in a certain boat being used in fishing out of Ft. Bragg, Mendocino county, Cal.

"(2) The court further finds that said personal property is not now and was not at the time of filing the complaint in this action wrongfully detained or detained at all by the defendant from the plaintiff.

"(3) The court further finds that on August 16, 1921, and for a long time prior thereto, the defendant, A. Polly, was and now is the owner of and entitled to the possession of the said gasoline engine described and referred to in paragraph 1 of these findings.

"(4) The court finds that said defendant, A. Polly, became the owner of said property by purchase from one E. Karnaiss, and that he has fully paid said E. Karnaiss the full purchase price of said engine prior to the commencement of the action herein.

"(5) The court further finds that at the time of purchasing the said engine from the said E. Karnaiss, and at the time of paying him for it, the said Karnaiss was the agent of the plaintiff, Enterprise Foundry Company, a corporation."

By findings 1, 2, and 3 the ultimate fact is determined that the defendant was, prior to the time of the trial, at the time of the trial, and at the date of making the findings and entering judgment, the owner of the gasoline engine in controversy. By findings 4 and 5 certain probative facts, which appeared in the case, are set forth, and it is on the ground that these findings, in setting forth probative facts, do not set forth sufficient to establish payment or agency.

The law is well settled in this state that where ultimate facts are found, which are sufficient in themselves to support the judgment entered, the mere fact that the trial court also makes findings in which probative facts are incorporated, which indicate that the ultimate facts are not sufficiently proven, and an appeal is made upon the judgment roll alone, the probative facts set forth in the findings must be disregarded. In Gill v. Driver, 90 Cal. 72, 27 P. 64, in considering this very question, the Supreme Court held as follows:

"Ultimate facts were found which do support the judgment; and they are not questioned, nor could they be, without bringing up the evidence in a statement or bill of exceptions. The rule has long been settled that 'when the ultimate fact is found, no finding of probative facts, which may tend to establish that the ultimate fact was found against the evidence, can overcome the finding of the ultimate fact' "—citing, Smith v. Acker, 52 Cal. 217; Pio Pico v. Cuyas, 47 Cal. 174.

In the case of Breeze v. International Banking Corporation, 25 Cal. App. 437, 143 P. 1066, this court, speaking through Justice Hart, thus decides the same question:

"Where the trial court makes both probative and ultimate findings and the one set is inconsistent with the other, the general rule is as it is declared in the case of Perry v. Quackenbush, 105 Cal. 299, 38 P. 740, as follows: 'Findings of probative facts will not, in general, control, limit, or modify the findings of the ultimate fact. The province of the trial court is to find the ultimate facts, and not probative facts. If, from a consideration of the probative facts, this court should determine that they did not justify the finding of the ultimate fact, it would determine that the evidence did not justify the decision. This, it has been repeatedly held, cannot be done in this mode.' "

And further quoting from the case of Pio Pico v. Cuyas, supra, it is there said:

"It has been repeatedly held that a finding of the court cannot be impeached upon the ground that it is contrary to the evidence, otherwise than by a motion for a new trial, and statement of evidence upon the motion. We can consider, upon appeal from the judgment, only the ultimate facts found by the court, and not the probative facts, which have no proper place in the findings"—citing Smith v. Acker, 52 Cal. 217; Frazier v. Crowell, 52 Cal. 399; Gill v. Driver, 90 Cal. 72, 27 P. 64; Rankin v. Newman, 107 Cal. 602, 40 P. 1024, 41 P. 304; Commercial Bank v. Redfield, 122 Cal. 405, 55 P. 160, 772; Brown v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Ass'n, 137 Cal. 278, 70 P. 187.

These cases are conclusive of all questions presented upon this appeal.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

FARMER v. BARNES. (Civ. 4885.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 24, 1925.)

1. Mortgages ⇐32(6)—Deed held to be intended as mortgage.

Following application for and agreement to make loan, borrower executed deed to lender, agreeing to buy back property for sum advanced; allowance having been made for interest at time of advance, with bonus in case of repurchase. Property transferred was worth from one-sixth to one-fourth more than sum advanced. Held, that deed was intended by both parties as mortgage.

2. Trial ⇐165—Opposing evidence may not be weighed, on motion for a nonsuit.

In determining whether plaintiff has made a case, on motion for nonsuit, opposing evidence may not be weighed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul Burks, Judge.

Action by Frank E. Farmer against D. Barnes. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Loucks & Phister, of San Pedro, for appellant.

Irving S. Baltimore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This action was commenced for the purpose of having a grant deed decreed to be a mortgage. At the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence the trial court ordered a nonsuit, apparently on the ground that there was no evidence from which the court could find that the deed was intended by the parties as a mortgage, and judgment went accordingly. Plaintiff appeals.

There was evidence tending to prove the following facts: Appellant owned, or had an agreement under which he could acquire certain real property. Respondent, acting as the agent of one Alice M. Flood, although there was evidence that he also was the agent of appellant, brought the latter and Mrs. Flood together on paper. As a result of respondent's activity, a lease, signed by both the principals, was executed, whereby appellant demised to Mrs. Flood his real property for a term, to commence 30 days after the completion of a hotel which he contracted, as a part of the agreement of lease, to erect upon the premises. It was necessary for appellant to borrow money with which to construct the hotel, and, following the execution of the lease, Mrs. Flood entered into an agreement to lend him $12,000 for that purpose, payment of the amount to be secured by a trust deed on appellant's property. This agreement was evidenced by certain escrow instructions, signed by both Mrs. Flood and appellant, which were lodged with the title company already mentioned. These instructions were dated May 11, 1923, but were apparently not deposited with the title company until about June 1. At any rate, certain papers called for by the instructions were dated on that day. Mrs. Flood never placed the $12,000 in the custody of the title company, as contemplated by the escrow instructions. Appellant testified that a "grant deed was demanded in place of this trust deed"; that it was demanded by "D. Barnes, for Mrs. Flood"; and that the demand was made in a conversation which occurred "along about July." Appellant testified further:

"Q. State just the conversation you had as nearly as you can. A. Well, Mr. Barnes said,

'We don't want to have the expense of foreclosure and we will take a grant deed, placed with the title company.' I needed the $12,000 and I submitted to the grant deed and placed it with the title company for Mrs. Flood and Mr. Barnes. * * *

"Q. Now exactly what had Mr. Barnes told you respecting this grant deed? A. That he would not consider taking the trust deed; he would have to have the grant deed.

"Q. Why did he say he wanted a grant deed? A. On account of foreclosure proceedings, the expense of foreclosure proceedings in case I could not pay.

"Q. He wanted title to the property? A. In case he had to foreclose—

"Q. At the end of 90 days? A. At the end of 90 days if I could not pay. * * *

"Q. In this conversation * * * was there anything said about the time in which you were to pay this money back? A. Yes; it was to be about 90 days, October 5th, that was the date as I remember it, because I had in mind that I must raise the money by October 5th.

"Q. Was there anything said about interest at that time? A. I allowed him for interest. In the conversation we just made it a full 2 per cent. on top of the $12,000, or $240. That was deducted from the $12,000, and I only received $11,760 into the title company, and that was disbursed to parties whom I owed, * * * that was considered interest * * * for 90 days, and a bonus was to be paid him of a hundred dollars in case I gave him the $12,000 back for Mrs. Flood, the hundred dollars was to be for Mr. Barnes, and the $12,000 for Mrs. Flood, as I understood it. However, Mr. Barnes—I signed the deed in Mr. Barnes' name."

Following this conversation, although appellant ran into it matters which occurred later, the deed was placed in escrow with the title company, which still held the escrow instructions of date May 11 between appellant and Mrs. Flood. The deed was from appellant, as grantor, to respondent, as grantee, and was dated July 5, 1923. Under the same date appellant signed and delivered to the title company a paper which, omitting the description of the real property described in the deed, was as follows:

"D. Barnes: I, the undersigned, hereby agree and promise to buy of you [the real property in question] for the sum of ($12,100.00) twelve thousand one hundred dollars all cash on or before October 5th, 1923, without interest."

The title company having received the $11,760, the deed was delivered to respondent. The latter was called as a witness under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He testified, in part, after referring to the original escrow between Mrs. Flood and appellant:

"Q. But she did not put up any $12,000? A. No, she refused to make the loan.

"Q. And some two months subsequent to that time you put $12,000 in there? A. In a different transaction.

"Q. Was it in the same escrow? A. The same escrow.

"Q. You had carried on all negotiations for Mrs. Flood? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. She had never been present at any time? A. No; I had been transacting her business."

A real estate broker testified that appellant's property was worth $14,000 or $15,000 on July 5, 1923. The lease between appellant and Mrs. Flood does not show what was to have been the cost of the hotel to be erected upon the property, but it was recited that it was to "be built of brick, containing about 100 guest rooms, lobby, 2 stores, and basement, and automatic elevator."

It is too plain for argument that this evidence made a strong prima facie case for appellant. If the grant deed had run to Mrs. Flood instead of to respondent, and if there had been no evidence other than that which we have recited, the court could have made no finding but that the instrument was a mortgage. We cannot see that the making of the deed to respondent, coupled with the fact that the transaction which resulted in its execution may have been one between him and appellant—and respondent now claims that to have been the case—can make any material difference. If we take this claim of respondent as a factor to be considered, as he is the sole defendant in the cause—although some of the testimony of appellant indicates that Barnes was acting for Mrs. Flood to the end—and meet respondent on his own ground, it would appear still that there was a strong prima facie case under the complaint. It is not difficult to perceive a showing under the evidence that respondent, having conducted all the negotiations for Mrs. Flood, stepped into her place at last and made the loan with the grant deed as security instead of the trust deed originally contemplated. He knew that appellant wanted to borrow a certain sum on his property and he paid to appellant practically that amount. His intervention in the last analysis as a principal, if we meet him on his own claim that he did so intervene, seems not to affect the substantial merit of appellant's cause under the evidence adduced by him.

[1, 2] We apparently have here, under the evidence above stated, a typical case of the execution of a deed with the intention of both parties that it should operate as mortgage. The entire chain of transactions originated in an application for a loan, followed by an actual agreement that the loan would be made. Appellant agreed to buy the property back for the sum advanced; an allowance having been made for interest at the time of the advance, and a "bonus" having been provided for in case of "repurchase," and at the time of the execution of the deed the property was worth from one-sixth to one-fourth more than the sum advanced, and had a higher prospective value. Under these circumstances appellant's prima facie case was complete. Holmes v. Grant, 8 Paige (N. Y.) 258; Turner v. Wilkinson, 72 Ala. 361; Daniels v. Lowery, 92 Ala. 519, 8 So. 352. In fact the case was so perfect under the general and well-understood principles affecting the subject that the citation of authority is a work of supererogation. We are unable to understand the conclusion reached by the trial court, except upon the theory that, there having been conflicting evidence in the record, the court adopted the view that opposing evidence may be weighed on motion for a nonsuit. Such a view was, of course, erroneous. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 P. 252; Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

THOMPSON, Judge pro tem. The defendant was convicted, pursuant to section 464 of the Penal Code, December 21, 1918, of burglary by means of explosives. The indictment charged him with "wilfully, unlawfully, feloniously, and burglariously breaking and entering the store building * * * with intent to commit a crime. * * *" The indictment failed to allege either the name or nature of the crime which it was alleged he intended to commit. No demurrer was filed. Upon conviction the defendant was sentenced to state's prison for a term of from 25 to 40 years prescribed by this section. He served 6 years of this sentence. The statute failed to designate whether commitment under this section should be made to the state's prison or to the county jail. For this reason, upon a writ of habeas corpus, the appellate court of the first district held that the sentence was void, and remanded the prisoner with directions to the trial court to resentence him to the county jail. 232 P. 719. Accordingly, on December 24, 1924, he was resentenced by the trial court to imprisonment in the county jail for a term of 25 to 40 years. This sentence was then suspended, and he was released on probation. A motion in arrest of judgment was made and denied. From the final judgment of commitment, the defendant has appealed.

The defendant claims this judgment is void because (1) the indictment fails to specifically designate the name or nature of the crime he was charged with entering the building to commit; (2) that the indictment fails to show that the grand jury, which presented the charge against him, had been first duly sworn according to law; (3) that the defendant, having served a substantial portion of his sentence in the state's prison, was thereby placed in jeopardy.

[1] An appeal does not lie from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment. That motion could not reach the defects complained of. People v. Matuszewski, 138 Cal. 533, 71 P. 701; People v. Swenson, 49 Cal. 388; People v. Williams, 43 Cal. App. 60, 184 P. 498.

[2] The indictment was defective on its face, and was therefore subject to demurrer or motion to quash. The offense with which the accused was charged was burglary by means of explosives. The "crime" which he was charged with intending to commit upon his entry of the building was a mere incident to the major offense of burglary, and yet it was a necessary element. The term "crime" is a general one, and has been said to include treason, felony, and misdemeanor. Johnson

v. State, 29 N. J. Law, 453. It is defined as an act in violation of a public law. 2 Words & Phrases, First Series, p. 1736; Black's Law Dict. 299. It is even more general than the term "felony." Yet in the case of People v. Nelson, 58 Cal. 104, it was held that a complaint for burglary charging that the accused had entered a building "with intent to commit the crime of a felony," failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, and was open to attack even in the absence of a demurrer. The authorities are fairly uniform to the effect that the particular offense which the accused is charged with intending to commit must be named or at least its principal elements must be described. People v. Goldsworthy, 130 Cal. 600, 62 P. 1074; People v. Mooney, 127 Cal. 339, 59 P. 761. In the last case cited, it is said:

"It is a rule, universal and without exception, that every intent, like everything else which the law has made an element of the offense, must be alleged."

Nor is the failure to demur or move in arrest of judgment a waiver of this defect. 8 Cal. Jur. 500; People v. Smith, 103 Cal. 563, 37 P. 516; People v. Nelson, 58 Cal. 104. Where the intent is a necessary element of a crime, as it is in the charge of burglary by means of explosives, the particular offense with which the accused is charged with intending to commit, upon the entry of the building, must be alleged, or the indictment fails to state facts sufficient to constitute the offense. In the Nelson Case last cited, where the complaint charging the defendant with burglary in breaking and entering a building "with intent to commit a felony," was held to be fatally defective, it was said this complaint failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. It was further intimated that this defect would leave the accused wholly in the dark with respect to the particular charge which he might anticipate the prosecution might attempt to prove against him.

[3] The attorney general urges the application of article 6, § 4½ of the Constitution of California, to overcome this defect in the indictment. This provision reads:

"No judgment shall be set aside * * * for any error as to any matter of pleading * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, * * * the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

While it has been repeatedly held that this clause of the Constitution will cure mere "error as to any matter of pleading," it has not been held to be a cure for an absolute absence of material elements necessary to charge a public offense, or a cause of action. Such a construction would be destructive of all rules of pleading and procedure. It would violate the provision of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which declares that:

"No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor * * * deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law."

To place a man on trial upon a complaint or indictment which utterly fails to state facts sufficient to constitute any cause of action against him, and having secured a verdict of conviction, to substitute for the void pleading which is open to attack at any stage of the proceeding, this constitutional remedy, would upset and defeat the wise rules of procedure which are the result of the crystallization of ages of judicial wisdom. This construction would violate the very spirit and purpose of the amendment which was intended to prevent a miscarriage of justice. This amendment was evidently intended to enable the courts to enforce justice in spite of unimportant or unsubstantial errors of pleading or procedure. But it was not intended to abrogate or dispense with the recognized and adopted rules of procedure and evidence.

In the case of Evans v. Wixom, 38 Cal. App. 542, 176 P. 873, the court says with reference to the application of this section of the Constitution to a complaint which failed to state a cause of action:

"We are satisfied that the constitutional provision above mentioned was not intended to carry the protection of judgments to any such extreme length [contended for by respondent]. The phrase, 'any error as to any matter of pleading,' in said section 4½ is entitled to very liberal construction, but not to a construction which will destroy pleading as a necessary element in legal procedure."

In the J. I. Case Threshing Machine Co. v. Copren Bros., 32 Cal. App. 194, 162 P. 647, Mr. Justice Chipman said, with relation to the application of this section of the Constitution to a complaint which lacked material allegations, and where material proof of essential facts was also lacking:

"We think it would be giving to section 4½ of article 6 unwarranted scope to permit its application to such a state of facts as we have here. To do so we must, in effect, say that it is not necessary to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, or, having stated a cause of action, it need not be supported by sufficient evidence. The section was not intended to abrogate or dispense with rules of procedure and evidence. It would, in our opinion, effect a miscarriage of justice to sustain the ruling of the trial court upon the record before us."

For the reason that the indictment in this case fails to state a cause of action, and that this defect will not be cured by application of the provisions of article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution, it becomes necessary to reverse the judgment. It is therefore unnecessary to pass upon the other points involved in the appeal.

The judgment is reversed.

YOAKUM v. GRIMES et al. (Civ. 4372.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 10, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐1010(1)—Finding, supported by evidence, must be sustained, notwithstanding evidence which would have authorized different finding.

A finding, that deceased intended to assign shares of stock in trust for the benefit of his heirs, must be sustained, if supported by the evidence, notwithstanding presence of some evidence which would have supported different finding.

2. Trusts ⇐61(2)—Property held to become property of heirs of trustor on his death.

Where there was no duty imposed upon trustees other than to hold shares of stock for the heirs of trustor, on the death of the trustor, the stock became the property of those heirs.

3. Trusts ⇐345—Administratrix could sue to enforce trust for benefit of heirs.

Where trust created by deceased was in nature of testamentary trust, administratrix could sue to enforce trust for benefit of heirs, in same way and to same extent that she might sue to recover any property vested in deceased at his death.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Suit by Alma R. Yoakum, special administratrix of the estate of John E. Yoakum, deceased, against Clyde Grimes and others. From an adverse judgment, first-named defendant and certain others appeal. Affirmed.

Dana R. Weller and W. W. Kaye, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Randall, Bartlett & White, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The judgment in this case determines that certain shares of stock of the John E. Yoakum Company, a corporation, are property of the estate of John E. Yoakum, and that plaintiff is entitled to possession thereof and orders that the several defendants transfer to plaintiff the shares of stock held by them, as evidenced by their certificates of stock.

The findings of fact, which closely follow the allegations of the complaint, are to the effect that on the 4th day of June, 1915, John E. Yoakum was the owner of 14,960 shares of the capital stock of the John E. Yoakum Company, a corporatioin; that on that date he executed a written instrument in the following terms:

"For and in consideration of ten dollars and other valuable considerations from Mary A. Grimes, I hereby assign to Clyde Grimes one of her heirs, as trustee for the heirs of the John E. Yoakum Company, 11,000 shares of stock in the above said company, No. 82.

"John E. Yoakum, Pres.

"Clyde Grimes.

"Also this day I have assigned the following stock in above said company to John V. Yoakum, 1,000 shares—No. 86, Queenie (Yoakum) Graves, 1,000 shares—No. 85, Jennie Y. Dickenson, 1,000 shares—No. 84, Valentine S. Yoakum, 1,000 shares—No. 83."

Here it should be explained that the evidence shows that at the same time an apparently intended duplicate of this instrument was separately written, on which the signatures in addition to those above shown included the individual signature of John E. Yoakum at the bottom of the instrument. Clyde Grimes also signed both papers. The second instrument to which we refer was not an exact duplicate, for the reason that in the first paragraph the number of shares was given as 10,000 instead of 11,000. There is no dispute about this discrepancy. The judgment assumes that the true number of shares assigned to Grimes was 10,000, and the plaintiff in fact claims nothing more so far as that item is concerned.

The findings are further to the effect that on said 4th day of June, 1915, the said John E. Yoakum caused the corporation to cancel his certificate for 14,960 shares, and caused a new certificate to be issued to Clyde Grimes for 10,000 shares, and to each of the four other parties named in the written instrument a certificate for 1,000 shares, and likewise caused a new certificate to be issued to John E. and Alma R. Yoakum for the remaining 960 shares; that the certificate No. 82, which was for 10,000 shares, was delivered to Clyde Grimes during the month of June, 1922, but that the certificates numbered 83, 84, 85, and 86 were delivered to John E. Yoakum and retained by him, and were never delivered to any of the parties named in the certificates until after his death.

The court further finds that by said written instrument of June 4, 1915, John E. Yoakum intended to assign the said stock in trust for the benefit of his heirs; that John E. Yoakum died on or about the 1st day of July, 1922, and that the plaintiff is the duly appointed and qualified special administratrix of his estate; that the plaintiff has demanded of the defendants that they and each of them transfer to her, as such special administratrix, the said several shares of stock, together with the certificates issued to them in evidence thereof, which demand has been refused by them; that the defendants and each of them denied that they were holding said stock or any part thereof in trust for the benefit of the heirs of John E. Yoakum; that said defendants and each of them claimed absolute ownership of such stock as appearing in their respective names on the books of the company. There are further findings relating to the organization and business of the corporation.

The principal grounds of appeal presented by appellants Clyde Grimes, Jennie Y. Dickenson, and John V. Yoakum are that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and that the findings are not supported by the evidence. Particularly, it is contended that there is no evidence to sustain the finding that by the the instrument set forth in the complaint John E. Yoakum intended to assign said stock in trust for the benefit of his heirs. Manifestly, there could be no heirs of the corporation, and we may assume that the written instrument does not by its terms describe any beneficiaries of the trust, if any trust was intended. But there is testimony sufficient to prove that the transfers were in fact made in trust for John E. Yoakum's heirs. With reference to the transfers other than that to Clyde Grimes, the plaintiff testified that at the time when the transfers were made, the statements of her husband were to the effect that the shares were to be held in trust for his heirs. And with reference to the stock transferred to Clyde Grimes, Mrs. Yoakum's testimony is that, at the time when the instrument of transfer was made, John E. Yoakum said to Clyde Grimes:

"Now, remember that you are to hold this stock for Alma and the children."

The instrument was at the time written out by Clyde Grimes, in response to Yoakum's request that he "write out a receipt for this stock." According to this testimony, it is apparent and fairly may be inferred that by the phrase "heirs of the John E. Yoakum Company," Mr. Yoakum understood that the trust was for his own heirs.

[1] The evidence being thus plainly sufficient to sustain the finding that John E. Yoakum intended to assign all of the stock in trust for the benefit of his heirs, that finding must be sustained, notwithstanding that there is some evidence which would have supported a different finding.

Appellants contend that the complaint does not state a cause of action and that their demurrer should have been sustained. The argument is that the action is brought to revoke a trust; that John E. Yoakum could not have revoked the trust and that the plaintiff's right cannot be any better than that of the trustor. But we agree with respondent that the purpose of the action is to enforce, and not to revoke a trust.

[2, 3] Since there was no duty imposed upon the trustees other than to hold the stock for the heirs of the trustor, it follows that upon his death it became the property of those heirs. Whether or not under the facts shown by the evidence and found by the court, the administratrix is the right party to compel the trustees to perform their duty, is a question which has not been raised or discussed by counsel. The only objection made by appellants, touching this phase of the action, is that the beneficiaries have not been made parties. But it does not appear that there is any beneficiary who is not a party to the action. We are assuming therefore without any attempt to examine into the question thoroughly, that since the trust is one resembling or having the nature of a testamentary trust, the administratrix is entitled to maintain this action for the benefit of the heirs, in the same way and to the same extent that she might maintain an action to recover any property legally vested in the deceased at the time of his death. We deem this disposition of the matter to be satisfactory, because it is apparent that the merits of the matter in dispute have been tried and determined no differently than if the designation of parties had been precisely correct.

The judgment is affirmed.

BLANKMAN v. PARSONS. (Civ. 5230.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 13, 1925.)

1. New trial ⟹90—Testimony that payments to decedent were made under "grubstake" agreement held to constitute "surprise" entitling plaintiff to new trial.

In suit in which administrator counterclaimed for money loaned, testimony of defendant that payments to decedent were made under a "grubstake" agreement held to constitute "surprise" entitling plaintiff to a new trial, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subds. 3, 4, where he subsequently obtained documentary evidence showing payments were on loan.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Surprise.]

2. New trial ⟹10—Stipulation held not to waive right to ask for new trial.

Stipulation by which plaintiff agreed to proceed with trial on date named, whether or not he was ready to proceed, held not to waive his right to ask for new trial.

3. Appeal and error ⟹966(1), 977(1)—Ordinarily discretion of trial court to expedite trial of cases and to avoid new trials not disturbed.

Ordinarily discretion of trial court to expedite trial of cases and to avoid unnecessary continuances and new trials will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Harold G. Blankman against Frederick D. Parsons, administrator, etc., of the estate of Susan H. Parsons, deceased, with cross-complaint by defendant. From a judgment on the cross-complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed with instructions.

O. P. Stidger, of San Francisco (J. H. Sapiro, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Samuel J. Chase, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment against him for something over $1,500, upon a cross-complaint filed by defendant as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Susan H. Parsons, deceased, in an action in which the plaintiff sought to recover from defendant, as such administrator, $985, alleged to have been advanced to decedent upon an open book account.

The extremely unsatisfactory character of the record from the standpoint of either party, and from the standpoint of any court called upon to administer justice and equity, demands from us more than the mere technical decision of the abstract right of plaintiff to a continuance of the case and to a new trial after judgment against him. Some idea of the aimlessness and indefiniteness of the record made in the trial court will be gathered from the following statement of facts:

On June 9, 1923, an amended complaint was filed by plaintiff, setting up a claim against defendant's decedent for $807 and interest upon an open book account for money had and received during the years 1918 and 1919. A demurrer was filed and overruled, and defendant answered denying the indebtedness of decedent to plaintiff, and setting up as a counterclaim an indebtedness of plaintiff to decedent, amounting to $1,000. An answer was filed to the cross-complaint, alleging that said indebtedness of $1,000 from plaintiff to decedent had been fully paid and discharged during the lifetime of decedent.

On January 4, 1924, the following order was made by the court:

"By consent of both parties, it is by the court ordered that the above-entitled cause be, and the same is hereby, continued to March 13, 1924, at 10 o'clock a. m. In this matter it is stipulated by H. L. Corson, Esq., as counsel for the plaintiff that the cause may proceed and defendant proceed with his testimony on this date, regardless of whether the plaintiff is ready to proceed or not."

On March 13 the matter came on for hearing. The first witness was the defendant, F. D. Parsons. The record shows that he was called to the stand for the defendant, but he was first questioned by counsel for plaintiff and disclosed that his mother, the decedent, had received a letter from plaintiff in August, 1916, asking for a loan of $1,000. The court then interrupted, asking the purpose of these questions, in view of the allegations of the complaint with reference to the open book account. After a discussion, counsel stated to the court: "We will not take up the time of the court. We have no evidence to offer through that view of it." Counsel for defendant then examined the witness and introduced in evidence a letter written by plaintiff to decedent during her lifetime, dated at Alaska on August 5, 1916, and asking for a loan of $1,000, to be paid the following June. Witness also stated that his mother had received various sums of money from plaintiff up to the time of her death, that in 1897 she had loaned plaintiff about $370 to go to Alaska, and plaintiff had stated that it was to be a "grub stake" and that he would "split fifty-fifty" with Mrs. Parsons on anything he got in Alaska, and would also repay the loan. At this point the court called counsel's attention to the fact that the pleadings had admitted the loan of $1,000 from decedent to plaintiff, and that the answer to the cross-complaint had as stated that it was to be a "grubstake" and proof had been offered upon the question of payment, and the burden of showing same was upon plaintiff and cross-defendant, judgment would have to go against him, and there was no case to rebut by any testimony on the part of defendant and cross-complainant. Thereupon counsel for cross-complainant rested his case. Counsel for plaintiff and cross-defendant then took up the burden and elicited from the witness the following facts: That Mrs. Parsons had sent plaintiff a telegram on August 22, 1916, as follows:

"Money sent today by draft in letter."

That on the same day she had sent him a letter reading:

"Your letter of 5th August received. I inclose herewith draft for $995—proceeds of $1,000 loan, less bank exchange. The rate of interest is 7 per cent. I will write you very soon."

So far the testimony merely covered an admission in the pleadings—the making of the loan for $1,000. Witness then testified that plaintiff had sent his mother money since 1916, sometimes by check and sometimes through a Canadian bank; that these payments were generally in amounts of $50; that witness knew these payments were made in 1918; that his mother had told him she received nothing upon the $1,000 loan in question; that every little while his mother would come to him and say that plaintiff was not doing as he had agreed to do, and he would advise his mother to write to plaintiff; that his mother had told him on several occasions, and particularly on one occasion shortly before her death, that the $1,000 loan had not been paid. The witness was questioned about a transaction in which his mother had deeded a house to plaintiff, and asked if the parties had not struck a balance at that time and settled their claims against each other, and he stated he did not know.

With the record in this condition, counsel for plaintiff stated that he would like to bring the officials of the bank through which the payments had been made into court to testify in regard to them. The court stated that a continuance would not be granted because counsel had entered into a binding stipulation to try the case on that day. Counsel protested that he had no way of showing payment except by the books of the bank through which the payments had been made. Counsel for defendant and cross-complainant then took the position that, assuming payments of $50 a month had been made, and that they aggregated about $1,800, these payments from 1917 on were under the "grubstake" agreement; that they were made before the deed to the house was executed and after it was executed and after the $1,000 was borrowed. The court took the position that the issues were known to the parties at the time of the stipulation as to the continuance to March 13, and refused a further continuance. Attorney for plaintiff then attempted to testify with relation to the transfer of the house by Mrs. Parsons to plaintiff; he having acted as Mrs. Parsons' attorney in the transaction. This testimony was objected to upon the ground that it was a privileged communication between lawyer and client, and the objection was sustained. That ended the case, except for the renewed request of counsel for plaintiff that he be allowed to show by the bank officials the amount of money that had been paid by plaintiff to Mrs. Parsons. This request was again denied. Thereupon judgment was given for the defendant upon the cross-complaint. No other judgment could have been entered, as the plaintiff proved none of the allegations in his complaint, and failed to show payment of the debt set up in the cross-complaint, the incurring of which was admitted in the pleadings.

In April, 1924, there was a substitution of attorneys, and in May a motion for a new trial was made. It was supported by the affidavit of the former attorney. Some of the statements contained therein are certainly entirely immaterial, such as the statement that a witness had promised to testify for plaintiff and had refused to do so a month before the trial; that a continuance had been obtained to try to persuade her to give her testimony, and counsel had not succeeded in so persuading her, and desired another continuance to accomplish this result. The law provides means for compelling a witness to testify, and the facts recited give no right to a continuance nor a new trial. However, in this affidavit, there is also the statement that the testimony regarding the so-called "grubstake" agreement was a complete surprise to the attorney for the plaintiff, who had never heard of the existence of such an agreement; that plaintiff was in Alaska and could not furnish information to counsel to refute the testimony of defendant regarding the making of such an agreement; that plaintiff had informed his counsel that the payments made by him were to discharge his indebtedness to decedent and as an advance to her to enable her to pay her living expenses.

[1, 2] There was nothing in the pleadings that would have given warning to plaintiff or his counsel that this testimony would be introduced, and, if it came as a surprise to plaintiff's counsel, justice and equity demanded that he be given an opportunity to dispute the claim put forth. The peculiar circumstances of this case, the plaintiff being in Alaska and the other party to the transaction being dead, coupled with the fact that much of the testimony introduced on behalf of defendant and cross-complainant was hearsay testimony and would not have been admissible had its admission been opposed, require, perhaps, a little more leniency to enable the parties to have the case decided upon its merits and to do justice between the parties.

In support of the motion for a new trial, there was also the affidavit of B. M. Aikens, the attorney who was substituted of record in the action, to the effect that in April, 1924, he had obtained from the plaintiff, through the Canadian Bank of Commerce, a large number of documents relating to the matters in dispute in the action, including 27 drafts signed by decedent, drawn upon plaintiff through the Bank of British North America, all of which had been paid by plaintiff in due course; that the first of these drafts was dated August, 1916, and the last of them January 31, 1919, and the others were dated at various times between said dates; that each of said drafts was for $50, and they aggregated $1,350; that among said documents were various letters from the decedent to plaintiff, relating to their financial transactions, and acknowledging the receipt of various remittances; that the said letters and signatures to the said drafts are in the handwriting of said decedent, and that it can be shown upon a new trial that the plaintiff actually paid to the decedent the said loan of $1,000 set up in the cross-complaint; that a certain written statement referred to in the testimony of Parsons, showing that plaintiff had borrowed $370 from Mrs. Parsons, was a statement sent by plaintiff to Mrs. Parsons, together with a letter demanding attention to the same, and in response thereto Mrs. Parsons deeded the house mentioned in the testimony to plaintiff; that among the letters written by decedent to plaintiff, which would be produced at a new trial, is one mentioning certain remittances received by her from plaintiff and speaking of such remittances as "on the $1,000."

All the testimony referred to in this affidavit was pertinent upon the issue raised at the trial with reference to the so-called "grubstake" agreement. There was nothing in the pleadings to inform plaintiff that such an agreement would be urged against him. He relied upon proving the monthly payments of $50 each, aggregating over $1,000, in extinguishment of his debt to Mrs. Parsons. He proved these payments by the testimony of the defendant, but such testimony also went further, to his surprise, and applied these payments to an agreement alleged to have been made 25 years previously. This was a surprise that ordinary prudence could not have guarded against, and plaintiff and cross-defendant was entitled to an opportunity to meet this testimony. Had plaintiff himself been in court, the situation might have been somewhat different, but, as we have said, he was in Alaska, and his attorney, knowing nothing of this alleged agreement, was powerless to meet this issue without time to communicate with his client. After the judgment against the cross-defendant, the attorney discovered documentary evidence to meet the claim which he had never had an opportunity to answer, and, in view of all the circumstances of the case, we think a new trial should have been granted to afford him this opportunity. It cannot be argued with reason that these documents should have been obtained earlier because the attorney for plaintiff had no means of knowing that the so-called "grubstake" agreement would be set up to explain these monthly payments. The situation is brought squarely within the provisions of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, subdivisions 3 and 4, and the plaintiff was entitled to a new trial. The remaining consideration is as to whether or not the stipulation hereinbefore set forth, by which plaintiff agreed to proceed with the trial on March 13, whether or not he was ready to proceed, affects his right to a new trial. It is not necessary for us to pass upon the question of whether an attorney has the power to make so improvident a stipulation on behalf of his client—to practically stipulate all his rights away—because such stipulation does not, in terms, waive the right to ask for a new trial.

[3] The effort to expedite the trial of cases and to avoid unnecessary continuances and new trials is certainly commendable upon the part of a trial court, and under ordinary circumstances the exercise of its discretion will not be disturbed, but the peculiar handicap of the plaintiff in this case and the general unsatisfactory condition of the record, which leaves one unconvinced of the merits of the case, seem to demand special consideration and greater leniency to the end that justice may be done between the parties.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to grant the plaintiff and cross-defendant a new trial.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was charged with the crime of grand larceny alleged to have been committed on the 4th day of December, 1916. He was arraigned on the 9th day of December, 1916, and entered a plea of guilty. December 29, 1916, he was admitted to probation for a term of 10 years. April 11, 1925, the order granting probation was revoked and the court entered judgment "that the said Frank Crappa be punished by imprisonment at San Quentin in the state prison of the state of California, for the term of not less than the minimum and no greater than the maximum time provided by law." This appeal is from the judgment.

[1] Appellant contends that—

"The trial judge who revoked the probation of the defendant and imposed sentence was absolutely disqualified to act, since, as district attorney, he had previously represented the plaintiff * * * in the same case."

Judge Murray, who revoked the order granting probation and sentenced defendant to imprisonment, was district attorney of Madera county at the time the information was filed. As such district attorney he appeared for the people at the arraignment and at the hearing of defendant's application for probation.

"No justice, judge, or justice of the peace shall sit or act * * * in any action or proceeding, * * * when in the action or proceeding, or in any previous action or proceeding involving any of the same issues, he has been attorney or counsel for either party." Code Civ. Proc. § 170.

This provision is too plain to admit of controversy, and the disqualification of the trial judge is clear.

[2] The crime charged was committed prior to the enactment of the Indeterminate Sentence Law (section 1168, Penal Code), and therefore the judgment is void. People v. Booth, 37 Cal. App. 650, 174 P. 685.

Upon the going down of the remittitur herein, the question of whether the order admitting defendant to probation shall be revoked and, if so, the term of imprisonment to be imposed must be determined by a judge who is not disqualified to act in the matter.

The judgment is reversed.

In re LAUREL HILL CEMETERY ASS'N.

LAUREL HILL CEMETERY ASS'N v. SARGENT et al.

1. Corporations ⊂=439—Corporation, empowered to purchase and own land, may sell such land.

Corporation, which is empowered to purchase and own land, may sell such land.

2. Dedication ⊂=41—Party asserting dedication must show that all calls of statute have been followed.

Party asserting dedication must show that all calls of statute have been followed.

3. Cemeteries ⊂=13—Cemetery held entitled to sell lands.

A cemetery incorporated under Act April 18, 1859, §§ 2, 3 (St. 1859, p. 281), codified upon the adoption of the Codes, and appearing therein as Civ. Code, § 608 et seq., held entitled to sell lands bought pursuant to section 3, subd. 3, but never mapped nor platted pursuant to section 4, and use of which for burial purposes was prohibited by an ordinance of the board of supervisors, in view of sections 3, 4, 9, 10; Civ. Code, § 615, not adding to or subtracting from the existing powers of such cemetery.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Petition by the Laurel Hill Cemetery Association for leave to sell real property, contested by George Clark Sargent and others. From an order granting the application, contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Myers, C. J., and Houser, Justice pro tem., dissenting.

George Clark Sargent, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Haven, Athearn, Chandler & Farmer, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an application for leave to sell real property. The application was made by Laurel Hill Cemetery Association. In the lower court George Clark Sargent and others appeared as contestants. A hearing of the application was had, and thereafter the trial court made an order granting the leave. From that order the contestants have appealed, and have brought up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

[1-3] In this court the appellants contend that the petitioner has not been given the power, and, in view of the contractual rights that have been established, the petitioner may not legally be granted power to sell any of the lands of the corporation. On the other hand, the respondent concedes that lands which have been mapped and platted, or lands in which interments have been made, may not legally be sold; but, in this behalf, the respondent shows to the court that the lands for which the respondent asks leave to sell are only a portion of the holdings of the respondent, and that such lands are not and never have been mapped or platted, and that at the present time, by reason of certain ordinances heretofore enacted by the board of supervisors, the lands in question may not hereafter be used for the purpose of therein burying the body of any dead person. As to such lands, the respondent contends that under the act approved April 18, 1859 (page 281, c. 267 of the Statutes of 1859), the respondent had the right to sell such lands, that when the Codes were enacted said statute was codified, and the respondent elected in the manner prescribed by law to continue its existence under the Codes, and that under the provisions of the Codes the respondent's said right was not curtailed or diminished in any respect. In this contention we think the respondent is correct.

Looking at the statute as a whole, it is perfectly clear that when the respondent corporation organized and thereafter filed and caused to be recorded the certificate mentioned in section 2 and section 3 of the statute, it thereupon became vested with power—

"to purchase, hold, sell, and convey, such real and personal estate as the purposes of the incorporation shall require." Section 3, subd. 3.

It also provided that—

"Any association incorporated under this act, may take, by purchase or devise, and hold, * * * not exceeding 320 acres of land, to be held and occupied exclusively for a cemetery for the burial of the dead. Such land, or such parts thereof as may from time to time be required for that purpose, shall be surveyed and subdivided into lots or plats of such size as the trustees may direct, with such avenues, paths, alleys, and walks, as the trustees deem proper; and a map or maps of such surveys shall be filed in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the land shall be situated. And after filing such map, the trustees may sell and convey the lots or plats designated upon such map, upon such terms as shall be agreed upon, and subject to such conditions and restrictions, to be inserted in or annexed to the conveyances, as the trustees shall prescribe. The conveyances to be executed under the common seal of the association and signed by the president or vice president, and the treasurer of the association. Any association incorporated under this act, may hold personal property to an amount not exceeding $5,000, besides what may arise from the sale of lots or plats." Section 4.

Except as restricted or limited in the section just quoted, the statute does not contain any expressed restriction or limitation upon the power of the association to sell its real estate. On the other hand, the provisions quoted from section 3, as well as portions of section 4, clearly vested in the association power to purchase at least 320 acres. When, as here, a corporation clearly has the power to purchase and own land, it has the same right as a natural person to sell such land. This is so because the most important attributes of a natural person are his absolute dominion over his property and his right of disposition thereof, and the same may be said of a corporation aggregate as to its corporate property. Hearst v. Putnam Min. Co., 28 Utah, 184, 77 P. 753, 66 L. R. A. 784, 107 Am. St. Rep. 698, 704, 708; 14a C. J. 521, § 2416.

As to lots in which bodies had been interred, and as to lands which had been mapped and platted, the map recorded, and from which maps lots had been sold, it is quite patent that the statute never contemplated that such lands should be sold except as provided expressly by the statute; on the other hand such property was "* * * to be held and occupied exclusively for a cemetery for the burial of the dead." However, when that is stated, the full purpose of the act is stated. But when, by ordinance or statute, a cemetery is closed so far as the interment of bodies in the future, then and in that event the statute does not purport to extend the rule.

The passage contained in section 4, supra:

"Such land, or such parts thereof as may from time to time be required for that purpose, shall be surveyed and subdivided into lots or plats of such size as the trustees may direct, with such avenues, paths, alleys, and walks, as the trustees deem proper; and a map or maps of such surveys shall be filed in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the land shall be situated. And after filing such map, the trustees may sell and convey the lots or plats designated upon such map, upon such terms as shall be agreed upon," etc.

—is a passage that is commonly contained in acts authorizing the creation of public cemeteries and church grounds. It is also commonly found in statutes providing for the regulation of the sale of town lots, the dedication of streets, and the dedication of public squares. He who would assert that a dedication has been made must show that all of the calls of the statute have been followed because such provisions have been held to be of the substance of the creation of a dedication. Woodyer v. Hadden, 5 Taunton, 125; Town of Pawlet v. Clark, 9 Cranch. 292, 3 L. Ed. 735; McConnell v. Town of Lexington, 12 Wheat. 582, 585, 586, 6 L. Ed. 735; Beatty v. Kurtz, 2 Pet. 566, 7 L. Ed. 521; Price v. Methodist Church, 4 Ohio, 515, 543.

It will be borne in mind that the statute before us was enacted when the Constitution of 1849 was in effect. Under section 4 of the statute the association was authorized to purchase not exceeding 320 acres, and under the same section it was authorized to hold personal property to an amount not exceeding $5,000, besides what may arise from the sale of lots or plats. Under section 9 of the statute it was authorized to take and hold any property, real or personal, bequeathed or given upon trust to apply the income to the improvement, etc., of the cemetery. Finally, under section 10, it was provided:

"The cemetery lands and property of any association, formed pursuant to this act, shall be exempt from all public taxes, rates, and assessments, and shall not be liable to be sold on execution, or be applied in payment of debts due from any individual proprietors. But the proprietors of lots, or plats in such cemeteries, their heirs, or devisees, may hold the same exempt therefrom, so long as the same may remain dedicated to the purpose of a cemetery; and, during that time, no street, road, avenue, or thoroughfare, shall be laid through such cemetery, or any part of the lands held by such association, for the purposes aforesaid, without the consent of the trustees of such association, except by special permission of the Legislature of the state."

Turning to the provisions regarding surveying, platting, and recording, it becomes clear at a glance that the properties actually dedicated to cemetery purposes, and no others, are to become exempt. If any person should give or bequeath to the association a business block, or a farm, the income therefrom could be used for the beautification of the cemetery; but certainly no one would contend that the business block or farm were "cemetery lands" within the meaning of the exemption, nor that the business block or farm would be protected so that "no street, road, avenue, or thoroughfare" should be laid through it. Under a statute quite similar in language, it was held that the portion of the property not mapped and platted did not come within the meaning of such an exemption. Woodlawn Cemetery v. Everett, 118 Mass. 354. Under the same facts, doubtlessly the same rule would have been declared in California. Los Angeles County F. C. Dist. v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 130, 169 P. 1028; In re Bull, 153 Cal. 715, 718, 96 P. 366.

It is argued that, if such lands as those described in the complaint are sold, they may be used for unsightly purposes. That is true, but there is not a word in the statute to the effect that the association ever undertook the burden of controlling either the use of, or the future improvements on, properties adjacent to the cemeteries, whether such adjacent properties were once owned by the cemetery or otherwise.

It therefore appears to us that under the provisions of chapter 267 of the Statutes of 1859 the power existed under certain circumstances which would authorize the corporate authorities to sell the lands in question. When the Codes were adopted, the statute just mentioned was codified. Civ. Code, § 608 et seq. In the Code sections no language was inserted which purported to take away the power. When, in 1889, section 615 was enacted, it neither added to nor subtracted from the powers that already existed. That section merely purported to regulate the manner in which the power of sale might be exercised.

The appellants claim that section 615 of the Civil Code is unconstitutional if it is construed as granting the power of sale to the respondent when, in the absence of that section, the respondent would not have had the power, but, in view of the construction which we have placed upon the provisions of section 615 of the Civil Code, it is not necessary for us to dwell on that point.

As the whole subject before us is one purely of statutory construction, the holdings of other courts in other jurisdictions are of little assistance, but no case has been cited to us that is at variance with anything herein stated. 2 C. J. p. 58, § 19.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

MELONE CO. v. ACQUISTAPACE et al.

(Civ. 2769.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 10, 1925.)

Landlord and tenant ⊜233(3)—Receipt held not to show, as matter of law, that landlord consented to surrender, or was estopped from disputing alleged surrender.

In action to recover installment of rent, receipt, executed by landlord, acknowledging payment by third person on lease to include land leased to defendants, such instrument being made subject to land being vacant at future date held not to show as a matter of law, that plaintiff consented to surrender of premises, or that it was estopped from disputing the alleged surrender.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by the Melone Company against Emil Acquistapace and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. L. Webber, of Napa, for appellants.
Henry C. Gesford, of Napa, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff leased certain lands to defendants for a term of five years commencing on the 1st day of December, 1921, at a "rental for first two years of $2,000 per year and rental for the three years following at $2,500 per year, payable semiannually, every six months, in advance." Defendants went into possession under the lease and paid the first two installments of rent. They vacated the premises in August or September, 1922. This action was commenced for recovery of the third installment of rent. The plaintiff was given judgment, and the defendants have appealed.

The complaint alleges the terms of the lease and is in the usual form of an action for the recovery of rent. The answer sets up a lease containing terms essentially different from those alleged in the complaint. The court found, from conflicting evidence, that the terms of the lease were as alleged in the complaint. Appellants do not contend that the evidence is insufficient to support this finding.

By the terms of the lease, appellants were to plant 12 acres of the land to alfalfa and respondent was to furnish water for the irrigation thereof "at $5 an acre each irrigation." Appellants planted the alfalfa and commenced to irrigate the same. Respondent refused to permit them to continue the irrigation on the ground that "it was wrong to do it" before the seed was sprouted, "and at that time over half of the seed had not sprouted." Respondent notified them not to use the fruit upon a few trees growing in the alfalfa field. Appellants contend that respondent's foregoing acts gave appellants "the right to abandon the property, when they were not receiving that which the lease gave them the right to receive." The lease provided:

"Tenant to upkeep premises and run same to full satisfaction of owners."

If it be conceded that the foregoing acts of respondent constituted a breach of the terms of the lease, neither such breach, nor any breach, was alleged in the answer, the defense set up therein being that the lease was canceled by mutual agreement.

In appellants' brief it is said:

"The appellants' position is this, that there was a surrender and a cancellation of the lease between the respondent and appellants and that the respondent on the 22d day of September, 1922, recognized and consented to the surrendering of the premises by the appellants, such surrender to take effect on or before the 1st day of December, 1922."

At the trial, the defendants introduced in evidence the following writing, admittedly executed by the president of the plaintiff company:

"Sept. 22, 1922.

"Received from M. Luiz & Co. $100 dollars, deposit on 3 yr. lease outside pasture lands and canyon field $500.00 a yr. fr Dec. 2/22, subject to land being vacant at that time.

"Melone Co."

The lands described in the foregoing instrument are included, with other lands, in the lease in controversy here. M. S. Luiz testified that, in September, 1922:

"I talked with Mr. Melone in regard to a lease of some property of Mr. Melone's; and so we come to an agreement on the property; I gave him a deposit of $100, and he handed me a receipt for it; when I was going to take possession. So Mr. Melone told me, 'No; the property isn't vacant, and it won't be vacant until some time in December. * * * In the first part of December.' I told Mr. Melone I was hard up for pasture, but I would like to dispose of it. Mr. Melone told me he had some pasture, so I brought my cattle down; I got some stubble. He says, 'I can use the stubble that time,' so I brought my cattle right down and put them in the stubble field. Later on Mr. Melone said, 'See the Acquistapaces, if Mr. Acquistapace is willing to let you in possession, all right.' So I went to see Mr. Acquistapace and Mr. Acquistapace told me as far as they were concerned I can get right in there; 'I haven't got anything else to do, we are through.' So I came down and put my cattle on the property. * * * I was going to get that lease some time in December."

The witness also testified that the amount of the deposit for which the receipt was given him was returned to him late in November or early in December, 1922. H. C. Melone, president of the plaintiff company, testified:

"He (Luiz) offered me a check for $100 and insisted on my taking it, and I said, 'I can't take it, Luiz, because there is a lease on the place; I would like to rent it to you if the place becomes available.' So I turned the check over to my attorney, who advised me not to cash it. * * * A lease was all drawn up to be signed between ourselves, and I never executed the lease. * * * Mr. Luiz never executed the lease, and this whole matter was put in abeyance subject to the prior claim of the Acquistapaces. * * * I told Mr. Luiz I could not execute a lease. * * * I referred Mr. Luiz to the Acquistapaces and told him he would have to deal with them. * * * The Melone Company leased to Mr. Luiz some stubble and hay land which was ours, and in no way connected with the Acquistapaces and their land."

Emil Acquistapace testified:

That prior to the time the defendants vacated the premises, he said to Melone, "I give you back your ranch right away, * * * because you promised to furnish all tools. * * * I cannot go ahead now if I don't get those things; if I have to buy everything I can't go ahead"; and that Melone replied, "Take your blankets and get out on the road if you feel like it"; and that "I went, I left the place, because I got mad"; that he never talked with Melone thereafter; that "I told him I couldn't stay there; it was too much rent."

Charles Acquistapace gave similar testimony. Melone denied the foregoing statement attributed to him and testified that the plaintiff did not agree to a cancellation of the lease or the vacation of the premises by the defendants, and that the plaintiff had not taken possession of the premises or leased any part thereof to others.

While the aforesaid receipt from plaintiff to M. Luiz & Co. tends to support appellants' contention that the plaintiff had accepted their surrender of the premises, it is not conclusive. The terms of the instrument are conditional, being expressly "subject to land being vacated by that time," December 2, 1922. The defendants had left the premises prior to the time the receipt was executed. The terms of the instrument imply a recognition of their right to resume possession under their lease. No lease to Luiz, or M. Luiz & Co., was ever executed. Melone testified that plaintiff did not resume possession of the land or put Luiz in possession thereof. It cannot be said, as a matter of law from the foregoing evidence, either that the plaintiff consented to the surrender of the premises or that it is estopped from disputing the alleged surrender. In Welcome v. Hess, 90 Cal. 507, 512, 27 P. 369, 370 (25 Am. St. Rep. 145) cited by appellants, it is said:

"A surrender is the yielding up of an estate for life or years to the reversioner or remainderman. Under the statute of frauds it can be done only by express consent of the parties in writing, or by operation of law when the parties do something which implies that both have consented. These acts are such as would estop the parties from disputing the fact of surrender, and which would not be valid unless the term were ended; as, for instance, a new lease accepted by the tenant, or the resumption of possession by the landlord if the tenant acquiesces, or the giving of a lease to another. * * * And while it is said that a surrender by operation of law is by acts which imply mutual consent, it is quite evident that such result is independent of the intention of the parties that their acts shall have that effect. It is by way of estoppel. * * * The tenant, subject to the covenants of his lease, is the owner for the term. If he leaves the demised premises vacant, and avows his intention not to be bound by his lease, his title still continues, unless the landlord has accepted the offer of surrender."

"Merely attempting to secure a new tenant, without taking possession or in fact reletting, is not an acceptance of the surrender." 15 Cal. Jur. 798; Chase v. Oehlke, 43 Cal. App. 435, 185 P. 425.

"Where a lease is repudiated and the premises abandoned, the landlord may pursue one of two courses: He may rest upon his contract and sue his tenant as each installment of rent, or the whole thereof, becomes due, or, he may take possession of the premises and recover damages." Bradbury v. Higginson, 162 Cal. 602, 604, 123 P. 797; Oliver v. Loydon, 163 Cal. 124, 126, 124 P. 731.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Edmund P. Mogan, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, against Elsie Ann Swanson. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

H. W. Hobbs, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Richard S. Flaherty, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff, Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, brought this action to recover from defendant, Elsie Ann Swanson, $1,350, alleged to be due it as rent for a certain store building at 36 Steuart street, San Francisco. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and, at the conclusion of plaintiff's case, defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, which was granted. Judgment for defendant followed; from this judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The facts developed at the trial are these: In August, 1917, Charles J. Swanson, the husband of the defendant, Elsie Ann Swanson, entered into a written lease with the Southern Pacific Company for a store building situated at 36 Steuart street, San Francisco, for the term of five years, ending August 31, 1922, at a monthly rental of $150. The premises were used by Charles J. Swanson for a general merchandise store up to the time of his death, which occurred February 26, 1922. Within a very few days after his death special letters of administration upon his estate were issued to one W. H. Stark, who demanded possession of the premises, and then and there took possession of the premises and the stock of goods therein. He remained in possession as such special administrator until some time in March, 1922, when the defendant, Elsie Ann Swanson, was appointed executrix of the last will and testament of decedent. Mrs. Swanson, after her appointment as executrix, took possession of the premises and the merchandise. She did not attempt to conduct the business, but used the building as a storage place for the stock of goods, and remained in possession of the building during the remainder of the term of the lease, which, as above stated, expired August 31, 1922, and thereafter holding over for the months of September, October, and November, 1922. The stock of goods was inventoried during this time, and Mrs. Swanson finally sold it at auction on the premises.

Many personal demands were made by plaintiff's agents upon Mrs. Swanson for the rent during the time she occupied the premises, and, in addition to this, each month during the same period, the plaintiff mailed her statements or bills for the rent at the rate of $150 per month. These statements were made in the name of Charles J. Swanson. In response to these demands for rent from plaintiff, Mrs. Swanson stated to its representatives that she would pay the rent out of the proceeds of the sale of the merchandise when sold. The attorney for plaintiff, in charge of the collection department, also made efforts to collect the rent, and was informed by Mrs. Swanson's attorney that it was necessary for the estate to retain possession of the premises, and that he would use his best endeavors to have the rent paid as an expense of administration. In pursuance of this last suggestion, a petition was filed jointly by Mrs. Swanson and plaintiff, asking the probate court to allow the rent as an expense of administration. This petition, for some reason not shown by the record, was denied by the court.

The plaintiff, relying upon these promises, refrained from serving notice to oust Mrs. Swanson from the premises and terminate the lease, but permitted her to remain there from March, 1922, to some time after November 1, 1922, when she vacated the premises, after disposing of the stock of merchandise. The rent was not paid. A claim against the estate for the rent due at the time of the death of Charles J. Swanson was presented and allowed and paid, but no claim for the rent following his death was presented. The estate is wholly insolvent.

After many unsuccessful attempts by the plaintiffs to collect its rent, the present action against Mrs. Swanson, individually, was commenced on April 19, 1923. Plaintiff seeks to recover, at the rate of $150 per month, rent for the premises from March to November, 1922, inclusive, which covers the period that Mrs. Swanson was in possession of the store after the death of her husband. Testimony was also given that $150 was a reasonable rental per month for the premises during this time.

After witnesses produced by plaintiff had testified to the foregoing facts, and plaintiff had rested its case, Mr. Wilson, attorney for defendant, made the following motion:

"If the court please, the defendant moves for a nonsuit on the ground that it is not shown that any contract was ever entered into between the Southern Pacific Company and Elsie Ann Swanson as an individual; that it is not shown that Elsie Ann Swanson at any time has occupied these premises as an individual or that she has ever guaranteed the payment of this money personally, or that any of the allegations of this complaint have been proven in this case."

The record does not reveal the ground upon which the motion was granted; all that is shown is, "Thereafter and upon the 14th day of January, 1924, the court made and entered its order granting defendant's motion for nonsuit herein."

[1] We are of the opinion that the trial court erred in granting the motion. The court's power and limitations with reference to the granting of a nonsuit are clear and well defined. The motion admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence and every inference which can be legitimately drawn therefrom, and upon such motion the evidence should be interpreted most strongly against the defendant. Stieglitz v. Settle, 175 Cal. 131, 165 P. 436; Goldstone v. Merchants Cold Storage Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 P. 776; Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 P. 252; Bloom v. Allen, 61 Cal. App. 28, 214 P. 481.

[2, 3] After a careful examination of all the evidence in this case, with the above well-established rules of law in mind, it seems to us that the only logical and reasonable inference to be drawn therefrom is that there is both an express and an implied personal obligation on the part of Mrs. Swanson to pay the value of the use and occupation of these premises. Her express contract to pay rent is gathered from the uncontradicted testimony that she made the direct promise to plaintiff's agents to pay the rent "when the merchandise was sold, or out of the first money received by her as executrix." Plaintiff accepted these promises and allowed her to remain in possession of the store, thereby creating the relation of landlord and tenant, which relation existed during all of the time for which plaintiff claims rent in this action. Her implied obligation to pay a reasonable rental arises from the mere occupancy as tenant of the premises, without an express agreement to that effect. Tiffany on Real Property (2d Ed.) vol. II, § 414; Samuels v. Ottinger, 169 Cal. 209, 146 P. 638, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 830.

[4] The lease did not, however, terminate upon the death of Charles J. Swanson, but his estate became liable for the payment of the rent for the remainder of the term of the lease, to be collected as any other claim against it. Shepperd v. Tyler, 92 Cal. 552, 28 P. 601. The estate's liability arises out of privity of contract, based upon the lease from plaintiff to Charles J. Swanson. The defendant's liability to pay plaintiff the reasonable value of the use and occupation of said premises, while she occupied them, arises out of the privity of estate thereby created and entirely apart from the lease itself.

[5] The liability of the estate of Charles J. Swanson under the lease is one thing; the liability of Mrs. Swanson under the evidence in this case an entirely different and distinct thing. It was therefore perfectly proper to sue Mrs. Swanson personally for the reasonable value of the use and occupation of said premises, notwithstanding the fact that the lease did not end upon the death of Charles J. Swanson. Bonetti v. Treat, 91 Cal. 223, 27 P. 612, 14 L. R. A. 151; Schehr v. Berkey, 166 Cal. 157, 135 P. 41.

[6, 7] It must be conceded, as contended by respondent, that her use and occupation of appellant's premises was as executrix of the estate of Charles J. Swanson and for the benefit of said estate, but this alone would not relieve her of personal liability, for it is well-settled law in this state, and in many other jurisdictions, that an executrix is personally liable on all her contracts, although she is acting in a representative capacity and such contracts are made for the benefit of the estate. It is likewise well established that plaintiff could not maintain this action against the defendant in her representative capacity (except upon a proper claim duly presented for rent under the original lease); for under her general powers as executrix she could not make any contract which will bind the estate and authorize a judgment de bonis decedentis. Schouler on Executors and Administrators, § 256; 3 Woerner on Administration, § 356; Sterrett v. Barker, 119 Cal. 495, 51 P. 695; Melone v. Davis, 67 Cal. 281; 7 P. 703; Eustace v. Jahns, 38 Cal. 21; section 1582, Code Civ. Proc.; Austin v. Munro, 47 N. Y. 360; McKee v. Hunt, 142 Cal. 526, 77 P. 1103; Briggs v. Breen, 123 Cal. 657, 56 P. 633, 886; Renwick v. Garland, 1 Cal. App. 237, 82 P. 89.

[8, 9] Mrs. Swanson no doubt intended, in good faith, to create a debt against the estate for the rental of this store, but the effect of such attempt was not to bind the estate, but to bind her individually, and she in turn must look to the assets of the estate under her control to indemnify her for incurring this obligation. Renwick v. Garland, supra. The assets of an estate are primarily bound for the debts which deceased himself contracted during his lifetime, and not those contracted by his administrator or executor. Schouler on Executors and Administrators, § 256; Austin v. Munro, supra.

[10] It is contended by respondent that no individual liability attaches by her oral promise to pay the rent from the proceeds of the sale of the stock of merchandise, for this would be in effect a special promise to answer for the debt of her testator, which must be in writing, and cites section 1612 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This contention is erroneous; section 1612, Code of Civil Procedure, has no application under the facts of the case at bar, because, as we have already seen, this is not an action upon the lease itself, and not, therefore, a debt of Charles J. Swanson, but an original obligation of Mrs. Swanson, incurred after his death and growing out of the relation of landlord and tenant.

From the conclusions that we have reached in this case, it is unnecessary to pass upon the other grounds urged by appellant for a reversal of the judgment.

It follows, therefore, that the motion for a nonsuit should have been denied and the defendant put to her proofs.

Judgment reversed.

DENNIS v. MILLER AUTOMOBILE CO. et al. (Civ. 2765.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District. California. June 22, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 20, 1925.)

Master and servant ⊜332(2)—Whether driver of truck was within scope of employment held for jury.

In action for injuries to pedestrian when struck by truck delivering packages to express office, evidence that driver of truck deviated from usual route to express office to drive fellow employees home to lunch, for their convenience, held to make question for jury whether he was acting in course of employment and to sustain verdict for plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Action by Belle Dennis against the Miller Automobile Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff against defendant named, and latter appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Myers, C. J., Waste, J., and Houser, Justice pro tem., dissenting.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

George A. Work, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On the 6th day of December, 1922, the plaintiff was injured as the result of a collision between two automobiles, one owned by the appellant Miller Automobile Company and the other by the defendant S. S. Albright Company. The collision occurred at the intersection of Tenth and S streets in the city of Sacramento. Plaintiff obtained judgment against the appellant Miller Automobile Company for the sum of $1,800. From this judgment the Miller Automobile Company appeals. No issue is raised as to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings of negligence on the part of the driver of the Miller Automobile Company, nor is any issue tendered as to the extent of the injuries suffered by the plaintiff; it being apparent that the amount of the damages awarded are very reasonable in view of the extent of the injuries suffered by the plaintiff. At the conclusion of the introduction of the plaintiff's testimony the trial court granted a nonsuit to the S. S. Albright Company, and continued the action against the appellant Miller Automobile Company. The only question tendered for decision upon this appeal is whether or not the driver of the Miller Automobile Company, one Arthur W. Stephen, a boy of 19, employed in appellant's stockroom, was at the time of the accident performing duties within the scope of his employment.

The transcript shows that Arthur W. Stephen, the driver of appellant's car, was in the employ of the appellant on the day of the accident; that as part of his ordinary duties he regularly took express packages belonging to the appellant to the American Express company situate at Second and B streets, in the city of Sacramento; that he ordinarily started on one of his trips to deliver express packages at the hour of about 11:30 a. m.; that in making these trips he used a delivery truck, which was kept in the alley at Sixteenth street, between L and M streets; that on the day in question he had gone to the place where the delivery truck was kept; had placed in the truck two packages belonging to the Miller Automobile Company for the purpose of delivering the same at the express office above mentioned; that he had started his car and was about to proceed on his mission when two boys, employees of the Miller Automobile Company, came out of the building where the truck was kept, and asked Stephen to drive down past their homes. In reply Stephen told them he would go down with the packages, but would take them to their homes, and then deliver the packages afterwards. The homes of the two boys who accompanied Stephen were situate on Sixth and S streets. After the boys had gotten into the automobile Stephen drove south on Sixteenth street to S street, and thence westerly on S street until he reached the intersection of S and Tenth streets, where the collision resulting in the injuries to the plaintiff, who was a pedestrian on the sidewalk at that place, occurred.

So far as this action is concerned, it may be said that the streets of the city of Sacramento from B to S streets, inclusive, running easterly and westerly are all lettered; and the streets running northerly and southerly are numbered from Second to Sixteenth. All streets running westerly within the letters above named intersect streets running northerly and southerly, so that the express office of the American Express Company, located at Second and B streets, may be readily reached. It further appears from the transcript that the driver of the appellant's car, in taking express matter from the point on Sixteenth street, between L and M streets, ordinarily traveled northerly on Sixteenth street to J street, thence westerly on J street to the intersection of Second street, and thence northerly to the express office at B street; that on the day in question he first drove the machine southerly to S street on Sixteenth street, a distance of six and one-half blocks, and then turned westerly on S street, and was proceeding on his journey to the express company's office, having with him the two express packages and the two boys; that this departure or deviation from his usual course to the express office was for the purpose of accommodating the two boys in taking them to their homes, where they were going to get their lunches.

As the argument of both appellant and respondent is based principally upon the testimony of the driver of appellant's automobile, we will set forth the salient portions thereof:

"I was working for the Miller Automobile Company on the 6th day of December, 1922. I was working in the storeroom. I was driving an autmobile owned by the Miller Automobile Company. The collision occurred at the corner of S and Tenth street in the city of Sacramento. I was proceeding west on S street. I had come from Sixteenth street between L and M, that is where we kept our trucks. There were two boys, Clarence Logan and Melvin Bowen with me. I entered my car at almost 12 o'clock. I entered the car first to take my express down to the office. I had a couple of parcels to deliver, and I started the machine, and was just about to leave when these two boys came out. I was originally going by himself when these two boys came out and asked me if I would take them down to the vicinity of their homes for lunch. My purpose in entering the car was to take some express down to the express office. These boys came out and asked if they might ride with me. I told them I had to go down with the packages, that I would take them to their homes, and then deliver my packages afterwards. I had no objection taking the boys home. The taking of express packages was one of my ordinary duties. I usually go down J street and go right to Second street, and then over to the express office. I would not have gone down Sixteenth street to S and turned on S street west if I had not been taking these boys home, otherwise I would have gone down M street. I made the trip, so far as the Miller Automobile Company was concerned in this way, on my own initiative."

On examination by appellant's counsel the witness further testified:

"Q. Mr. Stephen, at the time that this collision occurred, you were on your way to take the boys to their homes, were you not? A. I was.

"Q. That is what you were using the car for at that time? A. Yes.

"Q. That is what you were driving over Sixteenth street to S street for? A. Yes.

"Q. And then out S street to where the accident occurred? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. That was no part of your duties as an employee of the company, was it? A. No, sir.

"Q. You were taking the young men down there purely for their convenience and accommodation, were you not? A. Yes, that is why I was taking them—

"Q. Mr. Stephen, would you have gone from Sixteenth to S street and turned on S street west, if you had not been taking those boys to their homes? A. No, sir.

"Q. That was the purpose for which you went down S street? A. Otherwise I would have gone down J.

"Q. That was the purpose for which you were using the car at the time this collision occurred, was it not—taking these boys down to their homes? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. The was no business or duties connected with the Miller Automobile Company that took you down S street with the car at that time, was there? A. No; there was not."

Only one of the boys who made the journey with Stephen on the trip in question was alive at the time of the trial, and he testified as to requesting the driver to go by way of their homes, and as to the automobile being driven southerly on Sixteenth street, and thence westerly on S street to the place of the collision. It will be observed from the foregoing testimony that the witness Stephen was permitted, not only to state the facts of his own journey, the taking of the automobile, the taking of the express packages, and the taking of the two boys and the course of his journey, but also to state his conclusions as well. Although some of the witness' conclusions are stressed in the argument, it is almost unnecessary to say that neither the court nor the jury are bound by the conclusions of a witness, but are there for the purpose of drawing their own conclusions from the facts. In the first place, it is evident from the facts that the driver of the appellant's automobile would probably have taken some other street on his westward journey to the American Express office, but the fact is also disclosed that he was taking the two express packages with him and was on his way to the American Express Company's office, even though he had departed from his usual course and was making a short detour to accommodate two other employees of the appellant. From the time the automobile, which the witness Stephen was driving, reached the intersection of Sixteenth and S streets, it was proceeding as directly toward the ultimate destination, to wit, the American Express office, contemplated by the driver, as though he had been driving westerly on any other one of the parallel streets in the city of Sacramento lying between B and S streets therein. It is evident that the driver of the appellant's automobile had not abandoned his purpose of taking the packages to the express office, but was simply accomplishing a double purpose—he was taking both the two packages and the two boys. There would be no return to the point of departure; there would simply be a continuation of his journey westerly on S street to the intersection of Second street, and thence northerly to the express office, or to some other intersecting street, leading to the express office which might chance to attract the fancy of the driver. There is nothing in the transcript which shows that the appellant had ever given the driver of the automobile in question any orders as to the streets over which he should travel in delivering the express packages, and, so far as the record shows, he was free to choose any one of them that he found convenient, or that readily answered his purposes. The fact that Stephen testified that he would drop the boys at their homes and then afterwards deliver his express packages is also stressed in appellant's argument, but we do not find any merit therein. The word "afterwards" used by the witness does not mean that he would then re-enter the service of the appellant, because, if such were the case, it would be impossible to cover the hiatus or distance lying between the point of departure between L and M and Sixteenth street to Sixth street on S. The packages had to be conveyed, and the language of the witness means no more than this—that he would travel to the express office by way of S street to Second, then northerly on Second street to the express office, and on the way he would drop the two boys at Sixth and S streets. As the homes of the two boys would be reached before the express office, had their journey not been interrupted by the collision, the mere fact that the witness said he would deliver his packages after leaving the boys at their homes affords no basis for the legal conclusion that the driver of the automobile was not at the same time performing services for his employer, the appellant Miller Automobile Company. The facts are, disregarding the conclusion of the witness: The driver of the automobile was on his way to the express company with the two packages; was performing his usual duties, and took a different course to the express office to accommodate other employees of the company; and, while engaged in the performance of the services and the rendering of the accommodation, the collision occurred.

The trial court, by proper instructions, left to the jury the determination of the fact as to whether the driver of the appellant's automobile was or was not performing a service for the appellant within the scope of his employment at the time of the plaintiff's injury, and we think, under the facts disclosed and as shown by the discussion herein, the court did not err in so doing. We think the facts in this case bring it well within the principle applied to departures, incidental departures, and incidental services had or performed in connection with the main duties and obligations being performed by the employee, and did not constitute an abandonment for the time being of the employer's service. There is presented no element of a junketing trip, or pleasure trip; nothing further than going to the express office by a different route.

Relying upon the facts which have been hereinbefore set forth, the appellant calls attention particularly to the cases of Gousse v. Lowe, 41 Cal. App. 715, 183 P. 295, and Kish v. Cal. State Auto. Ass'n, 190 Cal. 246, 212 P. 27, which rest upon the principle expressed in these words:

"If a servant abandons or departs from the business of his master and engages in some matter suggested solely by his own pleasure or convenience, or pursues some object which relates to an end or purpose which may be said to be the servant's individual and exclusive business, and, while so engaged, commits a tort, the master is not answerable, although he was using his master's property, and although the injury could not have been caused without the facilities afforded to the servant by reason of his relations to his master."

We think the facts of the case at bar, however, show that it is clearly distinguishable from the two cases just cited and the principle upon which the decisions of those cases rests. In the case of Gousse v. Lowe the facts show that the servant had taken his master's automobile, and, instead of going to the place of his ordinary destination, had departed therefrom and driven two miles away upon a mission peculiarly and exclusively his own. He had gone that entire distance for the purpose of interviewing a tailor, where he was having some work done for himself, and on his way back the collision occurred. He had not only stepped aside temporarily, but was engaged absolutely and exclusively in performing a mission of his own, and was not rendering any service to his master whatsoever. A reference to the facts in the Kish Case will also show that the servants had entirely performed their day's work for their employer, and were simply engaged in a mission or an act done for their own personal convenience and accommodation. In the instant case the driver of the appellant's automobile was at all times, after leaving the point of departure on Sixteenth street, engaged in conveying the two packages to the American Express office. That he was also accommodating two other employees of the appellant is beyond question, but this does not take away the fact that he was also in the service of the company and was rendering a mission which it was his duty to perform. Our attention is also called to the cases of Provo v. Conrad, 130 Minn. 412, 153 N. W. 753; O'Brien v. Stern Bros., 223 N. Y. 290, 119 N. E. 550; Drobnicki v. Packard Motor Co., 212 Mich. 133, 180 N. W. 459; Healey v. Cockrill, 133 Ark. 327, 202 S. W. 229, L. R. A. 1918D, 115, and some others following the principles therein set forth, but we think these cases also clearly distinguishable from the one at bar. In the Provo v. Conrad Case the driver of the automobile had gone a number of blocks beyond where he was authorized to go, and was performing no mission for his employer. In the O'Brien v. Stern Bros. Case, supra, the chauffeur, as shown by the opinion in the case, had gone far beyond Pelham Manor, where he was to make delivery of a package, and on through several towns beyond. The facts also show that in the Drobnicki v. Packard Motor Co. Case the employee was strictly on a mission of his own. In the case of

Healey v. Cockrill the chauffeur, instead of performing the duty upon which he was sent, departed therefrom and drove a distance of six and one-half blocks for the purpose of getting a package of cigarettes, and it was while he was on this mission that the accident occurred, which was involved in the case. We do not deem it necessary to set forth the facts disclosed in the other cases cited by appellant, but they all show a complete departure and abandonment by the servant of the master's service and employment for the time being, and the engaging in business or pleasure exclusively his own. We think that the facts in this case bring it clearly within the principle enunciated in the case of Gibson v. Dupree, 26 Colo. App. 324, 144 P. 1133, where it is said:

"The law is well settled that one may be in the service of another and yet at times attend to business or pleasure for himself, and acts done while the servant is at liberty cannot render the master liable; but, if the servant, while about his master's business, makes a slight deviation for ends of his own the master remains liable, as, where the servant drives out of the most direct route for personal ends, or where a plot diverges from a direct course for ends not connected with the master's business."

In the opinion in this case the different cases are taken up and considered, and the distinction is drawn between a departure from or abandonment of the master's business and the mere performing of the master's business in a different manner from that ordinarily theretofore performed, showing that in the first instance the master would not be liable, while, under the second state of facts, the employer would be responsible. This case also follows the rule holding that, where the facts show a performance of some service for the master, the fact of whether the employee is acting within the scope of his employment, while also performing some act of accommodation, should be left to the jury, and also where the departure is merely incidental or only slight. See, also McKeever v. Ratcliffe, 218 Mass. 17, 105 N. E. 552, where similar questions were held properly submitted to the jury as a question of fact, when the departure was not such as to authorize the court in declaring the same as a matter of law. In a note to Fisher v. Fletcher, 22 A. L. R., beginning on page 1404, a large number of cases are collected bearing upon the question of deviation from the customary routes by chauffeurs and drivers of automobiles, from which it appears that, if the servant is also engaged in the performance of some mission for himself, a slight or temporary deviation from the ordinary route of travel will not relieve the master from liability for negligence on the part of the servant, and especially is this true where the servant has been left free to select his own highway, street, or route of travel.

We think the trial court in this case properly left to the jury the determination of the fact of whether the driver of appellant's automobile was not, at the time of the injury suffered by the plaintiff, also engaged within the scope of his services, and was in fact taking packages belonging to the Miller Automobile Company to the American Express office as well as accommodating the two boys; and the verdict of the jury, including necessarily within it the finding of such fact, we conclude that the judgment is supported by the evidence, and should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; THOMPSON, Judge pro tem.

ALEXANDER v. MANTON JOINT UNION SCHOOL DIST. IN TEHAMA AND SHASTA COUNTIES. (Civ. 2901.)

1. Schools and school districts ⟸141(5)—School trustees may treat attempted dismissal of teacher as nullity, hold hearing on due notice, and discharge teacher.

After attempted dismissal of school teacher, where no charges had been preferred, no notice given, and no hearing had, school trustees may treat it as nullity, hold hearing on due notice, as required by Pol. Code, § 1609, and discharge teacher.

2. Schools and school districts ⟸142—Teacher, on discharge, held entitled to sue to determine truth or falsity of charge preferred.

Under Pol. Code, § 1698, section 1609, subd 5, as amended in 1921, school teacher, discharged by board of trustees, may sue in court to determine truth or falsity of charges preferred against him.

3. Trial ⟸84(1)—Offer of proof of truth of charges, for which school teacher was dismissed, held sufficient, in absence of objection on that ground.

In action by school teacher for dismissal by school trustees, offer by defendants to prove charges preferred against plaintiff by independent testimony and without reference to decision of school board was sufficient, in view of facts that no objection was made on ground that it was by improper method, and that it was rejected on ground that court had no right to hear testimony as to truthfulness of charge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by W. J. Alexander against the Manton Joint Union School District in Tehama and Shasta Counties, for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Fred C. Pugh, of Red Bluff, Curtiss Wetter, of Corning, for appellant.

M. J. Cheatham, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment and the defendant has appealed therefrom.

The complaint alleges that on or about the 12th day of May, 1923, the plaintiff and the board of trustees of the defendant district—

"entered into an agreement whereby plaintiff was employed as principal in the said Manton Joint Union School District at a salary of $2,000 per year payable as follows: $200 per month for 10 months, beginning such payments on October 3, 1923; * * * that pursuant to said agreement plaintiff performed the duties of principal of said Manton Joint Union School District continuously from the 10th day of September, 1923, to the 10th day of March, 1924, at which time the said board of trustees wrongfully and without any cause discharged plaintiff and refused to permit him to perform the duties of principal any longer; * * * that under said agreement said board of trustees have paid plaintiff the sum of $1,200 and no more, and by reason of the discharge of plaintiff as aforesaid, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $800."

The answer admits the employment and the performance by the plaintiff of services thereunder up to the 10th day of March, 1924, as alleged in the complaint; denies that the board of trustees "wrongfully * * * or without cause, or at all discharged plaintiff on the 10th day of March, 1924"; alleges that the board of trustees, "on the 24th day of March, 1924, dismissed plaintiff for unprofessional conduct, incompetency, evident unfitness for teaching, and persistent violation of and refusal to obey the school law of California and reasonable rules prescribed for the government of public schools in the county of Tehama"; and admits that "plaintiff is entitled to be paid his salary under the provisions of his contract of employment for the period from March 10th to March 24th."

As a further and separate defense, the answer alleges that "during the school year of 1923, and to and including the 10th day of March, 1924, plaintiff was guilty of * * * unprofessional conduct, incompetency, evident unfitness for teaching, persistent violation of and refusal to obey the school laws of California, and the reasonable rules prescribed for the government of public schools of the county of Tehama; that on the 12th day of March, 1924, charges were duly preferred in writing against plaintiff * * * for the causes in paragraph II hereof set forth, a copy of which charges is hereto annexed * * * and made a part hereof"; that a copy of such charges and a notice of the time and place of hearing to be had thereon were duly served upon the plaintiff; that said hearing was had March 24, 1924, and "witnesses were called and sworn and gave testimony in proof of said charges and * * * said board of trustees upon the affirmative vote of a majority thereof, all of whom had been present throughout the entire hearing sustained said charges and dismissed plaintiff as principal of said school."

The charges against plaintiff, referred to in and made a part of the answer, were dated March 12, 1924, and signed by three of the five trustees of the district and, among other things, contained the following:

"To W. J. Alexander, Principal of Manton Joint Union School District of Tehama County, California— * * * You will please take notice that the board of trustees * * * request and demand your resignation and dismissal as principal of said Manton Joint Union School District for the following causes and upon the following grounds committed and suffered to be done by you for the school year 1923–1924 in the manner following, to wit: * * * cursing and using profane and opprobrious language towards and addressed to a trustee of said district in the presence of said trustee and in the presence of the pupils of said district on the school grounds; * * * continuously disobeying the orders and requests of said board of trustees * * * to maintain order on the school grounds; * * * incompetence by reason of defective hearing; * * * refusing to discuss school problems with the superintendent of schools of Tehama county regarding the benefit and welfare of the school, and by waving an iron ramrod over her head."

February 25, 1924, plaintiff was served with a notice, signed by the three trustees who later signed the aforesaid charges, reading as follows:

"You are hereby notified that your services will not be required after March 10, 1924."

March 12, 1924, he was served with a second notice, signed by the same trustees, reading as follows:

"You are hereby again notified that our action on February 25, 1924, asking and demanding your dismissal, is final, and your services discontinued from that date. You will, therefore, be governed accordingly."

After giving the latter notice, the trustees employed another person as principal and put him in charge of the school.

The county superintendent testified that she was present at the hearing on March 24, 1924; that witnesses "were sworn and examined as to the charges"; that the trustees then "withdrew to another room and talked over the matter, and when they came back they announced that they found the charges to be sustained, and they were of the opinion that Mr. Alexander should not be continued in the school, and that he had been discharged two weeks before." One of the trustees, who appeared as a witness at the trial, was asked by counsel for defendant to state what findings the board made at the hearing. Counsel for plaintiff objected to the question upon the ground, among others, that there is "no provision of the law for the trial of the question." The court said:

"It appears that some two weeks before this trial was had this teacher had been dismissed by the board and another teacher had been installed in his place, and that such teacher was teaching at the time the trial was had. * * * It would appear to me that it is immaterial to prove the trial was had afterwards."

Thereafter the following took place:

"Mr. Pugh: I offer to show that the discharge of the plaintiff by formal findings on the 24th day of March, 1924, at the conclusion of the hearing—that that was final.

"The Court: You make that as an offer?

"Mr. Pugh: Yes.

"The Court: Denied.

"Mr. Pugh: I now offer to prove by independent testimony and without reference to the decision of the school board on March 24th, that on the dates on which the two letters were written by the school board to plaintiff the causes of dismissal specified in paragraph 'j' of section 1609 of the Political Code existed, and that plaintiff, not being a permanent teacher, was not entitled to a trial upon written charges and upon notice.

"The Court: Denied.

"Mr. Cheatham: We ask that the jury be directed to bring in a verdict for the plaintiff.

"The Court: That will be the order."

The court thereupon instructed the jury "to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant in the sum of $800."

Prior to the proceedings last narrated, the court had clearly stated its interpretation of the law applicable to the case. The county superintendent was asked whether she had "had any difficulty in getting Mr. Alexander to obey and enforce the rules promulgated by the county board of education." In sustaining an objection to the question the court said:

"That should have been determined * * * by a trial body of which the school superintendent is not a member."

Thereafter the following occurred:

"Mr. Cheatham: The original evidence should be introduced here.

"The Court: I don't think it should. The hearing should be before the board of trustees, and they are to determine the question as to whether or not those charges are sustained. * * *

"Mr. Cheatham: That would not bind the court—what the evidence was before that board.

"The Court: I think it does. They have the right to determine the question. * * * I think that is final, except an appeal to the * * * county school superintendent. * * * I don't think this court would have any right to hear the testimony going to the truthfulness or untruthfulness of the charge preferred against him. That is a matter for the trustees of the district."

From the whole record it clearly appears that the court decided the case upon the theory that the trustees had the right to dismiss plaintiff during the term of his employment for cause only, and after notice and a hearing as provided in section 1609 of the Political Code; that the court was without jurisdiction to determine the truth or falsity of the charges; and that, since the board had given plaintiff notice of dismissal without a trial and had placed another teacher in charge of the school, it had no authority to try him thereafter, because he was no longer a teacher in the school.

[1] It is unnecessary to decide the proposition first stated. If the trustees have authority to dismiss a teacher for cause without a trial, then in case of a wrongful dismissal he would undoubtedly have a cause of action on his contract, and in such action the court would have jurisdiction to determine, as in other alleged breaches of contract, whether there was just cause for his dismissal. If the trustees have not such authority, then the attempted dismissal of plaintiff was abortive, and the subsequent trial of the charges against him was a proper procedure for the termination of the contractual relations between the parties. If the trustees had attempted to dismiss plaintiff, after a trial upon charges preferred against him, but upon insufficient notice, or without any notice of the hearing, it would hardly be contended that they might not thereafter treat their attempted dismissal as a nullity and proceed anew to a hearing after a sufficient notice thereof. No reason appears why they could not pursue a similar course where no charges had been preferred, no notice given and no hearing had. In White v. Wohlenberg, 113 Iowa, 236, 84 N. W. 1026, it is said:

"Plaintiff had a contract to teach for the term of one year. After she had been teaching for a time charges were preferred against her, and, upon a hearing before the board, the charges were sustained, and plaintiff dismissed from her employment. From this decision of the board plaintiff appealed to the county superintendent, who reversed the action of the board, on the ground that plaintiff had been given no notice or opportunity to be heard. Plaintiff was not reinstated in her position, but new charges were at once filed against her by a member of the board, a time was fixed for their hearing, and due notice given her. * * * The decision of the county superintendent was not based on the merits of the case before him. He finds expressly that no notice was given plaintiff of the hearing. * * * This finding amounts to nothing more than a holding that the hearing before the board was a nullity. * * * The abortive attempt at a trial, when no jurisdiction was had of plaintiff, should not prevent a lawful hearing and legal judgment. Counsel say, if plaintiff had been reinstated in her position, this second proceeding might have been had, but that, inasmuch as the board did not recognize her as a teacher, it could not try her. This reasoning seems to us faulty. The board did recognize her as a teacher, although she was not permitted to perform duties as such. It was because she was acknowledged as a teacher, to whom the district was bound by contract, that the board desired this latter hearing. Plaintiff's contract rights can be cut off only by her discharge for cause, after a full hearing. If the cause exists, it would seem strange to deny the board the right to show it, merely because of a former hearing that was wholly illegal and void. We do not see how the question at issue here is affected in any way by the fact that plaintiff was not again given her classes after the decision on appeal by the county superintendent. It was sought by these second charges to try her as a teacher to whom the district was still bound by contract. If this cannot be done, she will hold out her term, and recover her full compensation. We should, then, have the anomaly of a hearing, on which no legal judgment of conviction could be founded, operating as a full and complete acquittal."

The foregoing reasoning is sound and is determinative of the question under consideration.

[2] There are cases holding that the dismissal of a teacher for cause, after a trial by the board of trustees on charges preferred against him, is final and conclusive. There are others holding that where the teacher is given the right of appeal to the superintendent of schools in case of his dismissal, such remedy by appeal is exclusive. Section 1698 of the Political Code provides for such an appeal. Section 1609, subdivision 5, as amended in 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 1664), however, provides:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed in such manner as to deprive any teacher of his rights and remedies in a court of competent jurisdiction on a question of fact and law."

Section 1609 prescribes the grounds and the proceedings for the dismissal of a teacher for cause. It would be difficult to give the provision quoted any meaning other than that, upon the discharge of a teacher for any alleged cause, he is entitled to maintain an action in court to determine the truth or falsity of the charges preferred against him. The reasons which may have actuated the Legislature in giving a teacher such right are well illustrated by the facts in this case. The trustees, as the representatives of one party to the contract, preferred the charges against plaintiff. One of the charges was abusive language towards a trustee who sat as a judge in the trial of plaintiff. Another charge constituted offensive and unmanly conduct towards the superintendent of schools, to whom the plaintiff had the right to appeal.

[3] Respondent contends that the appellant's offer to prove the truth of the charges preferred against plaintiff by "independent testimony and without reference to the decision of the school board" was a mere "offer to prove a conclusion of law without any offer to prove any fact from which such conclusion could be reached." No objection was made by plaintiff at the trial to the form of the offer, but it was denied by the court and, without waiting for defendant to close its evidence, on motion of the plaintiff, the court directed the jury to find for the plaintiff. In Biddick v. Kobler, 110 Cal. 191, 196, 42 P. 578, 579, it is said:

"A mere general 'offer' to prove a variety of things, without producing the witnesses or evidence whereby they are to be proved, or segregating the different items, is an improper method of presenting offered evidence, and should not be allowed unless by consent of parties. In the case at bar, however, the objection was not made upon the ground that the offer was an improper method, and therefore we will assume that this method was used by consent. And we think that the court below erred in sustaining the objection to appellant's said offer."

From the parts of the record quoted herein it clearly appears that counsel for plaintiff insisted at the trial, and he admits on this appeal, that evidence of the character designated by the defendant's general offer of proof was admissible, and that the court repeatedly declared to the contrary and stated:

"I don't think this court would have any right to hear the testimony going to the truthfulness or untruthfulness of the charge preferred against him."

The court also sustained plaintiff's objection to a question put to the county superintendent of schools relative to the truth of one of the charges against plaintiff. The effect of these declarations and this ruling was to limit the introduction of evidence to the other issues in the case. Under all the circumstances stated, it must be held that defendant's offer of proof was sufficient. Pastene v. Pardini, 135 Cal. 431, 67 P. 681.

The judgment is reversed.

GAFFNY v. MICHAELS. (Civ. 3994.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 6, 1925.)

Corporations ⟸121(4)—Variance between complaint and findings as to name of corporation, whose stock was sold, held immaterial.

In suit to recover amount of profit which defendant agreed to pay in addition to stipulated value of stock sold him, variance between complaint and findings as to name of corporation and amount due held immaterial; trial court being authorized to find according to the evidence, without requiring an amendment, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 470.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Maude C. Gaffny against A. Michaels. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fogel & Beman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Floyd S. Sisk, of Venice, Cal., for respondent.

CRAIG, J. It was alleged in the complaint filed by respondent, and admitted by the answer thereto, that on or about the 2d day of January, 1921, the appellant purchased from respondent and the latter's assignor certain capital stock of the Santa Monica Soft Water Company, a corporation, and that appellant then agreed to pay therefor, in addition to the stipulated sale value, such amount of profit as an audit of the company's accounts might show to have been earned between August 28, 1920, and December 31, 1920. The plaintiff alleged that an audit was made by competent accountants, and that the amount thereby determined to have been earned during said period of time was the sum of $1,413.60, for which the plaintiff prayed judgment. The defendant denied that it was determined by said or any account, or that it was the fact, that any profit was so earned, or that he ever became or then was indebted to the plaintiff on account of such purchase in any amount.

The case went to trial upon the issues thus presented by the pleadings, and at the conclusion thereof the trial court found that the allegations of the complaint were true, except as to the amount and the name of the corporation. Written findings were signed and filed, wherein it was recited that from an audit of the books by a chartered public accountant it appeared that the sum of $1,413.60 had been earned upon said stock within the time specified, but that from oral evidence adduced at the trial it was found that defendant was indebted to the plaintiff under the terms of their agreement in the sum of $797.28.

This appeal is taken from the judgment solely upon the ground that the findings and the judgment do not conform to the allegations contained in the complaint.

Appellant's brief raises no objection to the findings or judgment upon any attempted assertion that the evidence was insufficient to support them as to the amount of indebtedness, or the fact that it was due. The complaint alleged that the corporation whose stock was purchased by appellant was that of the Santa Monica Soft Water Company, a corporation, but the findings recite that "defendant purchased from plaintiff 2,400 shares of stock in the Santa Monica Soft Water Laundry, a corporation." Appellant contends that the judgment is based upon findings which nowhere mention or consider the company named in the complaint. Authorities are cited wherein it was held that a finding upon a fact not in issue can form no element in determining the appropriate judgment to be rendered; that a plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the case as made by his complaint; that, where specific facts are put in issue, it is the duty of the trial court to find the facts specifically. Other authorities are presented, holding that a finding that plaintiff's services were worth 25 per cent. of an agreed selling price appeared to conflict with an allegation that they were worth 35 per cent. thereof, when the appeal was taken upon the judgment roll alone, and that a prayer in the complaint upon a contract for lawful money of the United States would not justify a finding or judgment for gold coin.

There is a wide distinction between the case at bar and those cited by appellant. In the instant case the relief sought was not specific performance of an agreement to purchase, or to deliver, the capital stock mentioned, nor was any particular stock or corporation directly involved in the controversy. This action was instituted for the recovery of a sum of money alleged to be due to the plaintiff through the sale of stock, as a result of an audit which the parties had previously agreed upon.

In alleging the necessary facts, it was incidentally stated in the complaint that the stock sold was that of the Santa Monica Soft Water Company; the findings, either inadvertently, or as the result of the evidence offered, which is not before us, recited that the transaction in question arose over the sale of stock of the Soft Water Laundry. The stock itself had long since been delivered and, so far as this case was concerned, the identity of the stock had never been questioned. It is not claimed that the name of the corporation was the subject of controversy; that the wrong business was audited; or that the agreement required the payment of a certain kind of money and that the findings or judgment specified another kind. It is true that the findings and the complaint are not in accord as to the amount due, but this could not seriously be said to affect the legality of the findings or judgment. It is obvious, therefore, that any variance, if it be such, was immaterial.

In Varney v. Hutchinson Lumber & Mfg. Co., 64 W. Va. 417, 63 S. E. 203, it was held that a judgment against the Hutchinson Lumber & Manufacturing Company would not be set aside because the writ summoned the Hutchinson Lumbering & Manufacturing Corporation. Opportunity to amend and correct the name of the defendant was afforded the plaintiff, but this was not done, and the defendant contended upon appeal that the judgment was void. In holding to the contrary, the Supreme Court of West Virginia said:

"Although a corporation must sue and be sued by its corporate names, yet, if some words are added, omitted or changed in the spelling, this is not a fatal variance if there be enough to distinguish it from other corporations or to show that the corporation suing or being sued is the one intended."

In Claryville, G. L. & B. Turnp. Co. v. Commonwealth, 107 S. W. 327, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 861, 1157, it was held that an indictment and summons issued against a corporation under the name of Grant's Lick, Claryville & Butler Turnpike Company was sufficient to bring it before the court and to validate a judgment rendered against it by default, although its true name was the Claryville, Grant's Lick & Butler Turnpike Company, where the summons was served upon its president, and the real corporation was not misled or deceived by the error. There are many other holdings of a similar nature, but in the instant case it is not contended, nor could it be, that the corporation in question was at any time interested in the litigation, or that the defendant was misled, or his rights in any way affected by the deviation complained of. In the cases to which reference is made above the corporations whose names were confused in the pleadings or judgments were directly interested in the litigation, whereas in this instance such is not the same, and the difference between the name as alleged in the complaint, and that as found by the court is one which is quite immaterial. If a slight misnomer of a defendant whose rights are at stake does not affect a judgment, much less can it be said to have prejudiced the interests of a party where the name of the corporation was not at issue.

In Stevens v. Stebbins, 4 Ill. (3 Scam.) 25, it was held that—

"The courts at the present day are not confined to the rigid rule of idem sonans, but adopting a more liberal and reasonable one, inquire whether the variance be material or immaterial. If there be a material and substantial variance, it is fatal; otherwise it is not."

The same rule was applied in Belton v. Fisher, 44 Ill. 32.

In holding that the variance in question is immaterial, we have disposed of appellant's contention that the trial court failed to make a specific finding on the allegation that the corporation whose stock was purchased by appellant was that of a definite corporation. This is true, because, the variance being immaterial, the finding made is specific upon the allegation with which it deals. As we have pointed out, the variance in question was immaterial. The trial court found according to the evidence, without requiring an amendment. This action upon its part was fully authorized by section 470 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Where a variance between an allegation and the proof is immaterial—that is, where it is not of such a character as to mislead the adverse party to his prejudice, in maintaining his action or defense upon its merits—the court may either direct an immediate amendment of the pleading to conform to the proof, or it may direct the fact to be found according to the evidence without requiring such amendment. Code Civ. Proc. § 470.

The judgment is affirmed.

FINLAYSON, P. J. I concur. The record before us consists only of the judgment roll. That record, in view of the permissible presumptions which may be indulged to support the judgment, fails to show that the trial court erroneously based its judgment upon a finding outside of the issues, even though the court did find that the stock was issued by the Santa Monica Soft Water Laundry instead of by the Santa Monica Soft Water Company, as alleged in the complaint. On appeal every intendment and presumption, not contradicted by or inconsistent with the record on appeal, will be indulged in favor of the judgment of the court quo. There is nothing in the judgment roll before us inconsistent with the presumption that respondent, when putting in his case, proved that the stock was that of the corporation referred to in the findings, the Santa Monica Soft Water Laundry, nor is the record inconsistent with the further presumption that appellant did not object to such evidence on the ground of variance. The failure of a party to object to evidence upon the ground of variance between it and the allegations of his adversary's pleading is a tacit admission that he is not misled by it to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense on the merits. Indeed, his failure so to object affords the best possible evidence that the variance has not misled him to his prejudice. A variance which does not mislead a party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense on the merits is not deemed to be material (Code Civ. Proc., § 469); and, where the variance is not material, the court may either direct the fact to be found according to the evidence, without amendment of the pleading, or it may order an immediate amendment (Code Civ. Proc., § 470). It must be presumed, therefore, in support of the judgment, that appellant made no objection in the trial court upon the ground of variance, and that therefore the court properly found the fact according to the evidence without requiring an amendment.

I concur: WORKS, J.

LATHROP v. TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. (CROCKER, Intervener). (Civ. 5171.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 6, 1925.)

1. Bonds ⟸74—Pledgee not entitled to retain, as security, bonds issued in 1905, though payable to bearer.

Although amendment to Code, in relation to negotiable instruments, of August 8, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 99), makes bonds payable to bearer negotiable, character of bonds issued theretofore was not affected, and pledgee of bonds issued in 1905 was not entitled to hold bonds as security for debt negotiated in 1916, by one without proper authority, as against true owner.

2. Pledges ⟸21 — Pledgee of nonnegotiable bonds not entitled to retain bonds after debt was barred, where pledgor had no title.

The pledgee of nonnegotiable bonds receives only title of pledgor, and, where debt was barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 339; Civ. Code, § 2911, pledgee held not entitled to keep bonds until debt was paid, where pledgor had no authority, as against true owner of bonds.

3. Estoppel ⟸58, 110—Defense must be pleaded; injury must be shown from things relied on.

Defense of estoppel must be pleaded, and proof must show that injury caused resulted from things relied on to estop party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by Orville A. Lathrop against the Title Insurance & Trust Company, wherein E. S. Crocker intervened. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Porter C. Blackburn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Otis H. Castle, C. Elvon Musick, and H. C. Allen, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondent Title Ins. & Trust Co. and others.

Stuart M. Salisbury, Wm. B. Himrod, and Verne E. Robinson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Crocker.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment against her in an action in which she sought to recover three bonds of the Home Telephone & Telegraph Company, of the face value of $1,000 each, which she had delivered to the defendant, and which it refused to return to her because of a claim of ownership made by E. S. Crocker, who intervened in the action, and in whose favor judgment was given.

The trial court found that intervener was the owner and entitled to the possession of said bonds; that the bonds had been pledged to the husband of plaintiff to secure a loan of $600 made to one Vaughn; that Vaughn had no right or authority to make such pledge. It appears that intervener had permitted the bonds to be used to secure a debt of Edna Brown to one Peck; that, when this indebtedness was satisfied, the bonds were received by Vaughn as attorney for Miss Brown and without her knowledge or consent, and, without the knowledge or consent of intervener, Vaughn pledged the same to secure a personal loan. The pledgee having died, the bonds were distributed as a part of his estate to his widow, the plaintiff in this action. She had given the trust company possession thereof, and intervener notified it of his ownership before it had accounted to plaintiff for the bonds, and thereupon the trust company protected itself by refusing to deliver the bonds without a judgment of court.

[1] There is no dispute about the foregoing facts. The findings are not attacked upon appeal. The first point raised is that plaintiff was entitled to hold the bonds as security for the debt because the bonds are made negotiable by statute, being payable to bearer. This contention is settled against the appellant by the recent case of Popp v. Exchange Bank, 189 Cal. 296, 208 P. 113. That case holds that the act of the Legislature of August 8, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 99), amending the Code in relation to negotiable instruments so as to make bonds such as those we are considering negotiable, did not have the effect of changing the character of such bonds issued before the amendment, although transferred thereafter. The bonds involved in the instant case were issued in 1905, and the loan was negotiated in 1916.

[2] Another phase of the case is presented by the findings of the trial court to the effect that no promissory note, writing or memorandum was given to evidence the debt for which the bonds were pledged, and that this debt was incurred in August, 1916, for a period of 90 days. The court concluded therefrom that the debt was barred under the provisions of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure. This holding is not attacked by appellant, but she contends that, even though the debt was barred and the lien extinguished under the provisions of section 2911, Civil Code, nevertheless she, being in possession of the pledged property, like a mortgagee in possession of real property after the debt has been barred, was entitled to retain such property until the debt was paid.

Respondent concedes that equity requires the payment of a debt barred by the statute of limitations, when the debtor is asking to quiet his title against the mortgagee in possession, because of the moral obligation of the debtor, but contends that the reason for the rule fails where the person seeking to recover his property was never legally nor morally bound to the pledgee or mortgagee. As authority for this differentiation, respondent cites the case of Faxon v. All Persons, 166 Cal. 707, 137 P. 919, L. R. A. 1916B, 1209, wherein it is said:

"The respondent contends, and we think rightly, that the rule in question should not be extended to a case in which a liability to pay the debt does not, in morals and equity, rest upon the plaintiff or his property. Where the plaintiff is himself the debtor, the applicability of the rule is apparent. No different situation is presented where the plaintiff has bought the land before the right to foreclose the mortgage has become barred. In such case, he acquired the property subject to a valid existing lien, which was, presumably, taken into account in fixing the purchase price. Such property, when he acquired it, was bound by the debt, and it would be as inequitable to relieve him of the burden without payment as it would be to thus free the original debtor.

"In the present case, however, the plaintiff acquired the land by purchase for a consideration after the lapse of the time within which an action to foreclose the mortgage could have been brought. * * * The plaintiff was not personally liable for the debt, and was under no moral obligation to discharge it. When she bought the land, the records showed that the lien of the mortgage had become extinguished. Civ. Code, § 2911. It is difficult to see, therefore, how the land itself, so bought, was bound, legally or equitably, by the debt. There seems to be no good reason for refusing to quiet the title of an owner in the situation of the plaintiff here."

Similarly, in the instant case, intervener was never bound either legally or morally for the debt, and a purchaser of nonnegotiable bonds, although he buys in good faith and for value, acquires only the title of the seller. Popp v. Exchange Bank, supra. Therefore a pledgee of nonnegotiable bonds receives only what the pledgor had—in this case, no title at all. It must follow that there is no obligation upon the part of the intervener to pay the debt for which the bonds were pledged.

[3] The only other matter requiring discussion is the contention that the intervener was estopped from setting up the statute of limitations or from claiming that Vaughn had no authority to make the pledge. We think this contention is not borne out by the evidence, and, furthermore, the defense of estoppel was not pleaded as required, and there was no proof that any injury had been caused to plaintiff by any of the things relied upon by her to estop the intervener.

The judgment is affirmed.

UMPHRAY v. HUFSCHMIDT. (Civ. 4846.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 6, 1925.)

1. Brokers ⊂⊃50—Owner's conduct held waiver of limitation of time fixed by broker's contract of agency to sell property.

Though broker's contract of agency to sell realty expired, owner's conduct thereafter in continuing negotiations with prospective purchasers procured by the broker, and depositing a deed in escrow, held a waiver of the limitation of time fixed by broker's contract of agency to sell the property.

2. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1011(1)—Ascertainment of truth of disputed conversation held matter for trial court.

Ascertainment of truth of disputed conversation between owner and broker as to latter's admission of termination of agency held matter for trial court.

3. Brokers ⊂⊃52—When written contract between vendor and purchaser is not essential to recovery of commissions stated.

Written contract between vendor and purchaser is not essential to recovery of a commission by broker, if latter has produced to vendor a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to purchase upon vendor's terms, and who has agreed to those terms, and is willing and offers to enter into a binding written contract.

4. Brokers ⊂⊃63(1)—Broker held entitled to commission, even though owner never met prospective purchasers.

A broker held entitled to a commission whether or not the owner met prospective purchasers personally, where one of them was at office of escrow holder ready to close sale, but owner, after depositing all necessary documents with escrow holder, withdrew them and canceled sale.

5. Brokers ⊂⊃82(4)—Broker, basing complaint upon quantum meruit, held entitled to recovery of reasonable value of services, despite proof of written contract.

Broker, basing complaint upon quantum meruit, held entitled to recovery of reasonable value of services, despite proof adduced established written contract of agency to sell.

6. Brokers ⊂⊃86(1)—Written contract held evidence upon which finding of reasonable value of services could be made.

In action for commission, based upon quantum meruit, written contract of agency adduced held evidence upon which finding of reasonable value of services rendered could be made.

7. Brokers ⊂⊃74—Broker's right to recover commission not dependent upon ownership of land by party employing broker to sell such property.

Broker's right to recover commission held not dependent upon ownership of land to be sold by party employing broker to sell such property; the payment of commissions being purely a matter of contract.

8. Brokers ⊂⊃74—That defendant employing plaintiff to sell property was not owner thereof, of which fact plaintiff was aware, held not to relieve defendant from payment of agreed commission.

That defendant employing plaintiff to sell property was not owner thereof, of which fact plaintiff was aware, held not to relieve defendant from payment of agreed commission, where it appeared that he obtained and was given absolute control over a deed executed in blank by the real owners.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by Wm. E. Umphray against Henry Hufschmidt. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward R. Eliassen, of Oakland, for appellant.

H. S. Craig, of Oakland, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J. An action to recover real estate broker's commissions, alleged to be of the reasonable value of $1,000, for which amount judgment was given in favor of plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

On April 21, 1922, Hufschmidt, the appellant, made a written contract with Umphray, the respondent, whereby, in consideration of a small cash payment and the prospective services of respondent as agent, he agreed to deed to respondent, or to any grantee the latter might name, at any time within 30 days, for the sum of $12,000, net, a tract of land situate on Holway street, Oakland, the purchase price to consist of the payment of the sum of $7,000 in cash and the delivery of a mortgage for the balance covering certain real property in San Leandro, Alameda county. Said contract further provided that as commissions for services rendered, respondent should be paid all money received from the sale of the property over and above the sum of $12,000. Appellant was at no time the owner of said property; title thereto being vested in the names of his daughter and other relatives, of which fact respondent was aware at the time the contract was entered into. Thereafter respondent procured a buyer named Page, who agreed to pay $13,000 for the property. Page was acting in the matter for himself and one Nason, with whom he was engaged in certain building enterprises under an arrangement existing between themselves whereby Nason furnished the capital, took title to real property in his name, and Page afterwards erected improvements thereon for an interest in the property. On May 22, 1922, Page deposited with a title insurance company, as part payment on the purchase price, certain securities, of which Nason was the owner, representing in the aggregate the sum of $1,769.74. Those securities were not acceptable to appellant but the parties continued on with their negotiations, and Page finally agreed to meet appellant's terms; that is, to deliver in payment of the purchase price a mortgage on said San Leandro property for the sum of $5,000, and to pay the balance in cash. Pursuant to this arrangement appellant, on May 29, 1922, obtained from the owners and deposited with said title insurance company an executed deed to said Holway street property, in which the name of the grantee was, at respondent's suggestion, left blank. The deposit of said deed was accompanied by written escrow instructions, signed by appellant, in which said title insurance company was authorized to deliver said deed to the purchaser upon receipt of a note for the sum of $5,212.50, secured by a deed of trust covering said San Leandro property, a 60-day note for $200 signed by Nason, an agreement that the buyer assume payment for street work adjoining said Holway property amounting to $3.120.63, and the payment of the sum of $3,466.87 in cash. Said escrow instructions fixed 10 days from the date thereof as the period of time within which to complete the sale, and further provided that, in the event that the conditions of said escrow were not complied with at the expiration of the date specified therein, said company should complete the same at the earliest possible date thereafter, unless written demand by appellant was made for the return of all instruments deposited, whereupon Page, a day or two thereafter, withdrew the securities previously deposited. Later, on or about June 1, 1922, and well within the 10 days specified in said escrow instructions, the purchasers called at the title insurance company's office prepared to consummate the purchase of said property in accordance with the terms of said escrow instructions, but were informed that about an hour or two prior to their arrival the prospective sale had been canceled by the other parties to the agreement by the withdrawal of the deed and the escrow instructions. About 4 months later Nason and Page, after further negotiations with the owners personally, purchased said property for the sum of $13,000; title thereto being conveyed to Nason by delivery to him of the same deed deposited with, and afterwards withdrawn from the possession of, said title insurance company. These subsequent negotiations were carried on by the parties themselves without the knowledge or aid of respondent. The sale was a cash transaction, except as to the matter of the payment for street work; payment therefor being assumed by the purchasers. When respondent learned of the sale of said property, he demanded a commission of $1,000, and upon refusal of appellant to pay the same commenced this suit with the result already stated.

[1, 2] The position taken by appellant upon the merits of the controversy, and in support of which he has cited a number of authorities, is as follows: That the contract upon which respondent's cause of action is founded expired by limitation of time on May 22, 1922, and that, inasmuch as no sale was made within that period, the contractual relationship of the parties at that time ended; that the circumstances of the deposit of the deed in escrow, accompanied by the escrow instructions, constituted an independent transaction, embodying a new offer which was disassociated with said contract of agency, and which offer appellant had power to withdraw at any time before the same was accepted; that, having in fact withdrawn said offer before it was accepted, no liability for commissions was incurred; that the sale of the property 4 months later was the result of separate negotiations opened by the purchasers with the owners of the property personally, and that the sale was made upon terms different from those previously agreed upon under the agency contract; that respondent did not participate in the ultimate sale of said property, and consequently was not entitled to a commission thereon.

There is sufficient evidence in the record to show, however, that the transaction involving the sale of the property was a continuing one from the time the agency contract was made until and including the time appellant made the escrow deposits; that, although the contract of agency according to its terms would have expired on May 22, 1922, appellant continued on with the negotiations through respondent, the result of which was that on May 29, 1922, he deposited in escrow the deed to the property, accompanied by written instructions directing the escrow holder to close the deal within 10 days thereafter upon the terms specified in said instructions, which terms were substantially the same as those set forth in the contract of agency. It further appears that, in continuation of those negotiations, and in direct response to, and within the limitation of the time fixed by, said escrow instructions, the buyers presented themselves to the escrow holder, ready, willing, and able to consummate the purchase of the property in accordance with the requirements of said escrow instructions; that the only reason why the sale was not completed at that time was that the documents had been withdrawn from escrow. Under those circumstances it must be held that appellant waived the limitation of time fixed by respondent's contract of agency for the sale of the property. True, evidence was offered by appellant to show that on the day of but prior to the withdrawal from escrow of said deed and written instructions respondent stated to one of the owners of the property that his contract for the sale of the property had expired; but this evidence was contradicted on behalf of respondent by a witness who was present at the time it is claimed the statement was made. The ascertainment of the truth of this disputed conversation was therefore a matter of determination for the trial court.

[3] We are also of the opinion that under the circumstances disclosed by the record respondent's claim to commissions cannot be avoided upon the ground that he neither obtained from the prospective purchasers a valid contract of purchase nor during the negotiations brought appellant and the purchasers together personally, for it is the established law of this state that a written contract between the seller and the purchaser is not essential to the recovery of the broker's commission, if he has produced to the seller a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to purchase upon the terms proposed by the seller, and who has agreed to those terms, and is willing and offers to enter into a binding written contract. The broker has performed his duty, and has earned his commission regardless of whether a written contract is actually entered into or whether the sale is ever consummated by the delivery of the property and the payment of the purchase price. Twogood v. Monnette, 191 Cal. 103, 215 P. 542.

[4] The evidence shows, as before stated, that appellant, in writing, constituted and appointed said title company his agent to complete the sale, and deposited with said company all of the necessary documents for that purpose, which included an executed deed to the property and written authority to receive the purchase price and deliver the deed; that within the extension period fixed by said escrow instructions, to wit, on or about June 1st, the purchasers were present personally at the office of the title company, ready, able, and willing to meet the escrow terms and to pay the purchase price and accept the deed, but were prevented from doing so by the act of appellant and the sellers in canceling the sale. Under such circumstances, and in view of the rule stated in Twogood v. Monnette, supra, we believe that respondent was, at that time, entitled to his commissions. It matters little whether or not appellant ever met the purchasers personally during the negotiations, for the reason that he had vested said title company with full power to consummate the sale, and it was at the title company's office that the purchasers appeared ready to close the sale, and it is also immaterial whether or not Page or respondent were there at that time, although it would seem that they were, because each testified that he was. Nason was there, and he testified positively that at that time he was prepared to pay the cash and turn over the securities in payment of the purchase price. Nason cannot, therefore, be considered an undisclosed principal, as appellant contends; and, in any event, the evidence shows that Page and Nason were at all times jointly interested in the purchase of the property, and, although title was afterwards conveyed to Nason, the property was nevertheless acquired for the benefit of both Page and Nason.

[5-7] We are unable to sustain appellant's contention that there was a fatal variance between the allegations of the complaint and the proof, in that the complaint was based upon a quantum meruit, whereas the proof established a written contract, for the reason that, irrespective of whatever the rule may be in other jurisdictions, it has been held in this state that a recovery may be had for reasonable value in an action based on a common count, although the proof shows a written agreement; and in such an action the contract itself serves as competent evidence upon which a finding as to the reasonable value of the services may be made. Naylor v. Adams, 15 Cal. App. 548, 115 P. 335; San Joaquin L. & P. Co. v. Barlow, 43 Cal. App. 241, 184 P. 899. Nor do we think that respondent must be denied relief because appellant was not vested with ownership of the title to the property, of which fact respondent was aware at the time the contract was made, because the payment of commissions is purely a matter of contract, and it is immaterial, so far as concerns the right of the broker to recover, whether the party to be charged under the contract is or is not the owner of the land to be sold. Sanchez v. Yorba, 8 Cal. App. 490, 97 P. 205. Moreover, the evidence shows that, after the contract of agency was made, appellant obtained from the owners the execution and acknowledgment of a deed to the property with the grantee's name left blank, of which deed he was given absolute control; that he deposited said deed in escrow, and signed the escrow instructions authorizing and directing delivery to the purchaser on complying with the escrow instructions; that, after the deed was withdrawn from escrow, it was kept in appellant's possession in his safe deposit box for approximately 4 months, and eventually was delivered to the purchaser in consummation of the sale. Under those circumstances we think appellant may not escape the liability under his contract to pay commissions upon the ground that he was not the owner of the property.

Lastly, it is urged that commissions cannot be allowed for the reason that the escrow instructions required the payment of a purchase price aggregating only $12,000. But the testimony of both Page and Nason proves that they had agreed and were prepared to pay a purchase price of $13,000, which testimony was corroborated by the evidence of respondent. It is therefore obvious that the specific items of payment called for by said escrow instructions, and which aggregated only $12,000, related to the net amount the vendor was to receive for the property and not to the gross amount the purchasers had agreed to pay therefor.

We are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

ARISS-KNAPP CO. v. SONOMA COUNTY. (Civ. 5189.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 18, 1925. Hearing denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1925.)

1. Highways ⇐113(4)—Matters to be shown to warrant recovery for work in excess of estimate.

To warrant recovery of reasonable value of work performed in excess of amount covered by written contract to gravel highway, on theory that plaintiff mistook amount included because of error in estimate in notice to bidders, it must be shown that mistake was mutual; that minds of contracting parties met; that they agreed upon a certain thing which was to have been embodied in their contract; and that by mistake it was either fraudulently or inadvertently omitted, or inadequately expressed, and the reasons why plaintiff did not discover the mistake must be shown.

2. Highways ⇐113(4)—Contractor not entitled to amount in addition to contract price for graveling a highway because county engineer erred in estimate of gravel required.

Where contractor entered into written agreement for graveling highway a certain distance for a "lump sum," it could not recover additional sum because county engineer, in notice to bidders underestimated yardage; bidders being directed to specifications from which yardage could have been readily computed, and contract containing declaration that contractor had seen and examined specifications.

3. Customs and usages ⇐17—Custom of contractors to rely on estimates inadmissible, where contract to contrary.

Where notice calling for bids on highway graveling contract stated that estimates of yardage were approximate, and referred bidders to plans and specifications, and contract contained declaration that contractor had seen and examined the plans and specifications, evidence of custom of contractors to rely on estimates, and make no independent investigation, would have been inadmissible as modifying express terms of written contract containing no uncertainty, and amended complaint setting up such custom was demurrable.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the Ariss-Knapp Co. against the County of Sonoma. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellant.

G. W. Hoyle, Dist. Atty., of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an action brought to recover the sum of $5,460 for work done in graveling a county road under a written contract executed with the county of Sonoma under the provisions of section 2643 of the Political Code. The action is termed a suit in equity, though, in fact, it is nothing more than an action at law to recover the reasonable value of work, which by reason of an alleged mistake was not included within the terms of the written contract. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, amendments were filed, and a demurrer thereto sustained. Amendments were again filed and a demurrer thereto was sustained without leave to amend. Judgment followed in favor of the defendant, from which plaintiff appeals upon a record prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The facts of the case as disclosed in the complaint are that in May, 1920, the board of supervisors of the county of Sonoma duly instituted proceedings for the graveling and improving of a certain road within the county, acting under the provisions of section 2643 of the Political Code, as amended in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 167), which section was repealed in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 1681, § 1). In the course of these proceedings notice inviting proposals for the work was duly given, and in response thereto the plaintiff's proposal was accepted, and on the 23d of June, 1920, a contract for the doing of the work was duly executed between the plaintiff and the county. In the notice inviting proposals the estimated yardage of surfacing gravel was given as 3,050 cubic yards and the estimated cost thereof was given as $8,387.50. In the same notice the length of the highway was given as 16,680 feet. In response to this invitation the plaintiff submitted a bid for the surface graveling of $9,150 and executed the contract upon the same terms; the exact language of the bid and contract reading as follows:

"For gravel road, in place complete as per attached plans and specifications, the lump sum of ninety-one hundred and fifty dollars ($9,150.00) for the entire length of road embraced in the said plans and specifications."

On December 31, 1920, all the work had been done under the contract except some of the graveling. At that time the plaintiff had laid 1,995 cubic yards of gravel. Between that date and May 21, 1921, the plaintiff laid 2,875 cubic yards of gravel, making an aggregate laid by plaintiff of 4,870 cubic yards instead of the estimated quantity of 3,050 cubic yards, an excess of 1,820 cubic yards. Up to the time of December 31, 1920, estimates had been made by the county engineer upon the basis of which payments were made to the plaintiff as the work progressed. It is claimed by plaintiff that these estimates were made upon the basis of $3 per cubic yard, calculated upon the engineer's estimate of 3,050 cubic yards. The dispute arose over the estimate made for the work done from December 31, 1920, until May 31, 1921, and the plaintiff made written protest and claimed before the board of supervisors and the county engineer that this work should have been estimated on the basis of $3 per cubic yard. After the work was completed and on the 8th day of June, 1921, the plaintiff for the first time raised the claim that more work had been done than that noted in the original estimate, and thereupon made demand for payment for this excess work on the basis of $3 per cubic yard.

[1] The whole case of the plaintiff thus becomes an action for the recovery of the reasonable value of work alleged to have been performed in excess of the amount covered by the written contract upon the theory that in the execution of the contract the plaintiff mistook the amount included because of the error of the county engineer in the estimate placed in his notice to bidders. It is essential to show in an action of this kind based upon an alleged mistake on the part of the respondent that the mistake was mutual; that the minds of the contracting parties met; that they agreed upon a certain thing which was to have been embodied in their contract; and that by a mistake it was either fraudulently or inadvertently omitted or inadequately expressed. Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534, 541, 166 P. 808. It is not sufficient merely to show that a mistake was made and that the party relied upon it to his injury, but he must show the reasons why he did not discover the mistake. If the means of investigation are at hand and knowledge of the mistake could be readily had, such knowledge will be imputed to him. This is particularly true if the relations of the parties are not fiduciary, and where there is no warranty, and where the means of knowledge of the truth of the facts are at hand and equally available to both parties.

[2] In the case before us the appellant relies solely upon the mistake in the estimate of the total yardage which was made in the notice to bidders. It is pointed out by the respondent that in this notice the county particularly stipulated that the estimates of quantity were merely approximate and the prospective bidder was not only directed to refer to the plans and specifications for the full details and descriptions of the work to be done, but was required to certify that he had carefully examined the plans and read the specifications and that he had personally satisfied himself as to all the local conditions affecting the work. The respondent points out that reference to the plans and specifications would have readily disclosed the discrepancy in the original estimate of the county engineer, and also that the number of lineal feet mentioned in the notice to bidders was in itself sufficient notice to the prospective bidder as a simple multiplication of the length of the highway thus given, 16,680 feet by 16 feet, the width of the portion to be graveled, by one-half foot, the depth of the gravel, would have given a total of 133,440 cubic feet or 4,942 cubic yards. It is also pointed out that in the contract which was executed by the parties the appellant obligated itself to lay the gravel road "as per attached plans and specifications * * * for the entire length of road embraced in the said plans and specifications." It is to be noted that the appellant's bid and the contract called for the doing of this work for the lump sum of $9,150, no mention being made in either the bid or contract of the amount to be paid per yard; whereas, the other portions of the contract were on the basis of unit prices. We have then the allegation that the appellant, in making its bid for the work, relied upon the estimates made therefor, as stated in the notice, "and did not investigate to ascertain whether said estimates were or whether any one thereof was correct or not," because it believed that the county engineer was a reputable engineer, and because the county board of supervisors had approved the estimates.

In regard to this allegation, we are confronted with the written contract of the parties, executed before the work was commenced, in which the appellant covenanted to perform the work in accordance with the plans and specifications, which, in turn, it declared it had seen and examined. The contract is included in the complaint in hæc verba and presents a sharp conflict between the written obligations of the appellant made at the beginning of the transaction and the allegations prepared for the purpose of enforcing a claim for extra work. At the most the complaint demonstrates that the appellant failed to investigate where an investigation would have disclosed the mistake upon which it now relies. If its action is one in equity, as it claims it to be, then it is a case for the application of the well-known equitable rules that relief will not be afforded in equity on the ground of mistake where it is the result of pure carelessness and that there will be no relief to one who suffers by not using the ordinary means of information, whether his negligence be attributable to indifference or credulity. In making the allegation that no investigation was made for the purpose of determining the correctness of the estimates as to total yardage, when the very notice upon which the appellant relies stated definitely that the estimates of yardage therein contained were approximate only and that the prospective bidder was directed and required to examine and refer to the plans and specifications, the pleader has pleaded himself out of court, so far as any equitable remedy is concerned.

[3] In the amendment to the complaint the appellant set up the claim that it was relying upon a custom of contractors engaged in doing public work in the state of California to the effect that they relied upon the estimates made by the engineers appearing in their notice to the public and that such contractors would not make any independent or preliminary investigation to ascertain whether such estimates were correct. It is difficult to follow the rule that upon the consideration of a demurrer to a complaint we must assume all the allegations to the complaint to be true when such allegations are palpably absurd and contrary to all common knowledge and experience. But in this case the allegation is nothing more than an attempt to set up an issue of a prevailing custom as modifying the express terms of a written contract. To prove the issue, it would be necessary to rely upon parol evidence in a case where there is no uncertainty in the terms of the written contract and such evidence would be inadmissible. Withers v. Moore, 140 Cal. 591, 597, 74 P. 159. The amendment to the complaint merely injected an issue which could not be proved. It would not strengthen the case which the appellant attempted to plead.

Judgment affirmed.

RICHMAN v. BANK OF PERRIS et al.
(Civ. 5175.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 25, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 20, 1925.)

1. Banks and banking ⟹43—Proceedings to compel bank to issue certificates of stock held not barred.

Proceedings by judgment creditor to compel bank to issue certificates of stock originally owned by judgment debtor, when certificates had been canceled and others issued to different persons pursuant to sale for delinquency under void assessment, held not included in or barred by Civ. Code, § 347, providing that no action must be sustained to recover stock sold for delinquent assessments on the ground of irregularity in the assessment, unless the sum for which the stock is sold be first tendered, or within Code Civ. Proc. § 341, subd. 2, providing that an action must be commenced within six months to recover stock for a delinquent assessment.

2. Banks and banking ⊂⊃43—Sale of bank stock to satisfy delinquency under illegal assessment held void.

Sale of bank stock to satisfy delinquency assessment voted at meeting called by two directors, without notice required by by-laws to third who did not attend, was, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 305, 308, void, though attempted purchase was made in good faith by persons who knew that bank was insolvent and for the purpose of reorganizing it.

3. Banks and banking ⊂⊃43—Statute requiring directors of bank to levy an assessment upon stock to repair any deficiency in the capital does not change requirement for valid directors' meeting nor authorize administration of corporate affairs in any manner not prescribed by corporate by-laws.

Bank Act, § 133, requiring directors of bank to levy assessment upon stock to repair any deficiency in the capital which may be found by bank superintendent, does not change requirement for valid directors' meeting nor authorize an administration of corporate affairs in any manner not prescribed in by-laws, and, where there is such deficiency in capital, and directors are in such a position that it is impossible to secure a legal meeting of stockholders, they should permit superintendent to raise required money, as authorized under section 136.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by Fred W. Richman to compel the Bank of Perris and others to issue certificates of corporate stock. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John E. Biby and Harry C. Biby, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John L. Richardson, T. E. Parke, and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against him in an action wherein the complaint presented the following facts:

The defendant bank is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California. Its capital stock consists of 250 shares of the par value of $100 each. The number of directors of said corporation provided for in its articles of incorporation is three, and at all times mentioned in the complaint it has had a board of directors consisting of three members. On or about April 16, 1919, and prior to August 9, 1919, Joseph B. Moffere, Louis Vaiani, and Louis Casaretto were the duly elected, qualified, and acting directors of said bank. Moffere, on April 16, 1919, was the owner of 199 shares of the capital stock of the bank, represented by two certificates of stock issued in his own name, and also owned 10 shares of stock, which were represented by two other certificates for 5 shares each, issued in the names of Louis Casaretto and Louis Vaiani, so that these persons might act as directors of said bank. During April, 1919, defendants W. W. Stewart, W. G. Stewart, and Clifford R. Stewart learned that said bank was insolvent, and made efforts to reorganize said bank, and, in connection with this purpose, consulted with Charles F. Stern, superintendent of banks of the state of California, and said superintendent of banks requested the bank to repair its capital in the amount of $40,000. During all the times mentioned it was provided in the by-laws of the bank that special meetings of the board of directors might be called by the president on one day's notice to each director, either personally or by wire, and that special meetings might be called in like manner and on like notice on the written request of two directors.

On May 26, 1919, directors Vaiani and Casaretto signed the following instrument in writing:

"Los Angeles, May 26, 1919.

"Mr. James B. Moffere, President of the Bank of Perris, Huntley Apartments, Los Angeles, Cal.—Dear Sir: The undersigned, being a majority of the board of directors of the bank of Perris, hereby request a special meeting of said board, to be called and held in the Bank of Perris at one o'clock in the afternoon of Tuesday, the 27th day of May, 1919.

"Louis Vaiani.
"Louis Casaretto."

Said directors caused said instrument to be delivered to the Huntley Apartments, in Los Angeles, and the proprietor of said apartments signed the following instrument:

"Los Angeles, Cal., May 26, 1919.

"This is to cerify that Mr. James B. Moffere, formerly a tenant of the Huntley Apartments, 1207 West Third street, Los Angeles, was not here present (nor has he been for over thirty days, his present whereabouts being unknown here) to receive a letter personally delivered by messenger, said letter being a call to the meeting of the directors of the Bank of Perris, addressed to James B. Moffere, Huntley Apartments, and signed by Louis Vaiani and Louis Casaretto, as directors.

"Huntley Apartments,
"By E. Blalack."

The defendants W. W. Stewart, W. G. Stewart, and Clifford R. Stewart knew that said Moffere was a director of said bank, and that he could not be found for the purpose of securing his attendance at a meeting of the directors of said bank. Moffere, president of the bank, did not at any time make a call for the holding of a special meeting of the board of directors of the bank; but, on the 27th day of May, 1919, the said Vaiani and Casaretto, as directors of said bank, met at the banking room in said bank, and assumed to act as the board of directors of said bank and caused to be entered upon the minutes of the proceedings of the board of directors a resolution purporting to levy an assessment of $160 a share upon each share of the capital stock of the defendant, which then amounted to 259 shares, payable on June 26, 1919, to Louis Vaiani, the secretary and cashier of said bank, and in and by said resolution, and as a part thereof, the said two directors directed that any stock upon which said purported assessment should remain unpaid on the last-mentioned date would be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and would be sold to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale, or would be sold at private sale and without such public notice. During the month of May, 1919, the defendants W. W. Stewart, M. P. Mapes, and J. F. Hooks offered in writing to pay the defendant bank $41,400 cash on account of the purported assessment above mentioned levied against the stock enumerated. Thereafter the following letter was sent to each and every stockholder of the bank:

"Perris, California, May 28, 1919.

"Dear Sir: Please be advised that we have this day been offered full payment of the amount assessed against your stock of this corporation, a notice of which assessment was mailed to you at your last known address, a copy of which offer is inclosed. If you refuse or neglect to pay such assessment on or before July 14, 1919, please be advised that such offer will be accepted by the board of directors of this corporation.

"Yours very truly,

"Bank of Perris,

"By Louis Vaiani, Sec."

However, the aforementioned offer to purchase said stock was not accepted at any time by the bank or by its board of directors, and it was agreed later that the persons making the offer would not purchase the stock of the bank, but that the stock would be purchased by the persons named in a resolution hereinafter referred to in the amounts and for the sums set opposite their respective names. In order to carry out said agreement on July 15, 1919, the said two directors of the bank, Vaiani and Casaretto, met at the office of the bank, and caused to be entered on the minutes of the proceedings of the directors a resolution which purported to cancel 249 shares of stock, including the 209 shares owned by Moffere, and said resolution further declared said stock to be null and void, and purported to authorize the vice president of the bank to issue new certificates in the amounts and to the persons named in said resolution.

It was alleged, upon information and belief, that, pursuant to the proceedings above recited, the bank, on July 15, 1919, purported to cancel the shares of stock mentioned in said resolution, including the 209 shares owned by Moffere, and issued new shares in lieu of the shares purported to have been canceled to various persons and in various amounts, and the defendants named in this action, except the bank, are the persons to whom said shares of stock were issued, and each of said persons, prior to the time he paid for the stock so issued to him, knew that the two directors of the defendant bank were attempting to sell said stock pursuant to assessment proceedings, and that each of said directors' meetings purported to have been held by them was held without notice to the third director, and that such meetings were not held on the date of the regular meeting of the board of directors, and each of said defendants knew that each of said meetings was held at a time and on a date other than the time provided by the by-laws for the regular meetings of said board, and each of said defendants knew that said meetings were not held pursuant to any call by the president of the bank nor pursuant to any call made in the manner provided by the by-laws of the bank. After the stock purported to have been canceled was issued to the various persons, the said defendants, with full knowledge of the facts set forth herein, acquired the remainder of the stock purported to have been canceled by said two directors of the bank, so that said defendants now claim to be the owners and holders of all the shares of stock of the bank.

Plaintiff alleges, upon information and belief, that the foregoing proceedings are the only proceedings held or performed or purported to be held or performed pursuant to which the said stock owned by said Moffere was canceled, or pursuant to which it was attempted to deprive said Moffere of his ownership thereof, and the foregoing proceedings are the basis of defendants' claim of their asserted right, title, or interest in any of the stock of said bank.

It is alleged, upon information and belief, that ever since such purported cancellation of said stock owned by Moffere and the issuance of shares in lieu thereof to various persons said bank has claimed that Moffere has not owned any of said stock subsequent to July 15, 1919, and that subsequent to that date he was not entitled to appear as a stockholder on its books, nor to exercise any of the rights of a stockholder therein, and that subsequent to the date last mentioned said bank has treated the persons to whom shares of stock were issued by it in lieu of the shares owned by Moffere, and their purported successors in interest, as the owners of all said stock owned by Moffere, and such persons claim to be the owners of all of the stock owned by Moffere. It is then alleged that the sale and reissuance of stock as hereinbefore set forth are void, and that none of the defendants claiming to own the same has any right, title, or interest in the same.

The plaintiff commenced an action against Moffere on August 14, 1922, and a writ of attachment was issued therein and levied upon the shares of stock of the bank alleged to be the property of Moffere and to have been illegally canceled. Thereafter plaintiff recovered judgment against Moffere in said action in the sum of $34,027.50, and an execution issued thereunder, and was levied upon said stock alleged to have been owned by Moffere. Moffere's interest in said stock was sold under execution to plaintiff for the amount of his judgment. Plaintiff presented his certificate of sale to the bank, and demanded the issuance of a stock certificate to him for 194 shares, and the bank refused such demand. Plaintiff alleged, upon information and belief that said stock is of the value of $160 a share, and prayed that the purported sale and cancellation by the bank of the certificates representing the stock of Moffere be declared null and void, and that plaintiff be declared to be the legal owner of said stock.

Defendants demurred to the complaint upon the ground: (1) That it did not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action; (2) that said action is barred by the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 341, Code of Civil Procedure, and by the provisions of section 347, Civil Code. The demurrer was sustained and judgment given for the defendants.

[1] Upon the question of the statute of limitations appellants call to our attention the cases of Herbert Kraft Co. v. Bank of Orland, 133 Cal. 64, 65 P. 143, and Cheney v. Canfield, 158 Cal. 342, 111 P. 92, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 16. Cases from other jurisdictions are also cited, but, as the California cases relied upon seem to be decisive of this question in favor of the appellant, we shall not go further afield for authorities.

[2] There remains, then, to be decided the question of whether or not the complaint states a cause of action. The special meeting of the board of directors at which the purported assessment upon the stock was levied was not called by the president, as required by the by-laws of the corporation, and was held without notice to one of the directors, who did not attend. Section 305, Civil Code, provides:

"The corporate powers, business, and property of all corporations formed under this title, must be exercised, conducted, and controlled by a board of not less than three directors, to be elected from among the holders of stock. * * *"

Section 308, Civil Code, provides:

"A majority of the directors is a sufficient number to form a board for the transaction of business, and every decision of a majority of the directors forming such board, made when duly assembled, is valid as a corporate act."

In 6 California Jurisprudence, p. 1055, it is said:

"It is the general rule, therefore, that a special meeting held without notice is void, and the directors present at such meeting cannot perform any valid corporate act. The provision that a majority of the whole number of trustees shall form a board for the transaction of business and every decision of a majority of the persons duly assembled as a board shall be valid, does not change the rule."

See, also, Harding v. Vandewater, 40 Cal. 77; Thompson v. Williams, 76 Cal. 155, 18 P. 153, 9 Am. St. Rep. 187; Smith v. Dorn, 96 Cal. 82, 30 P. 1024; Beatty v. Rianda, 34 Cal. App. 180, 167 P. 185; Raisch v. M. K. T. Oil Co., 7 Cal. App. 667, 95 P. 662; Curtin v. Salmon River, etc., 130 Cal. 348, 62 P. 552, 80 Am. St. Rep. 132; Cheney v. Canfield, 158 Cal. 345, 111 P. 92, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 16. In the case last cited it was said:

"It is the settled law that an assessment can be legally levied upon the capital stock of a corporation by the board of directors only at a regular meeting of the board or at a special meeting thereof regularly called. [Citing cases.] As all proceedings whereby an assessment is levied upon the stock of a corporation, and under which a forfeiture of the stock of the stockholders may be had are in invitum, it is elementary law that they must be strictly followed. The levy of such an assessment can only be accomplished legally by a strict compliance with the statutory provisions relative thereto, or with the provisions of the charter of the corporation upon the subject. [Citing cases.]"

It must follow that, since the meeting of the directors was not regularly called, it was powerless to levy a legal assessment, and, the assessment being void, no rights flowed from proceedings thereunder.

[3] Respondent seeks to avoid the effect of the want of regularity in the directors' meeting by reliance upon section 133 of the Bank Act (Act 652, Gen. Laws of Calif., Deering [1923], p. 153). That section requires the directors of the bank to levy an assessment upon the stock to repair any deficiency in the capital which may be found by the bank superintendent. However, said act in no way changes the requirements for a valid directors' meeting, nor authorizes an administration of corporate affairs in any manner not prescribed in the corporate by-laws. It is certain that the directors might refuse to take the action called for by the bank superintendent, and this very contingency is provided for in the Bank Act itself (section 136), wherein the superintendent of banks is expressly authorized, in case of a refusal by the directors to levy such an assessment, to take possession of the bank and enforce the liability of stockholders and otherwise administer the affairs of the bank.

It seems obvious that, when the two directors of the bank found themselves in a position where they could not secure a legal meeting of the directors to levy the assessment, they should have permitted the superintendent of banks to exercise his authority and raise the money required by the means provided in the Bank Act.

We reach this conclusion with great reluctance, because of the consideration due those who, in good faith, paid this assessment and performed a public service in rehabilitating an insolvent bank. In deference to their good faith and endeavor to remedy a most deplorable situation we have striven for ways and means of affirming the judgment of the trial court, but we have reached the conclusion that this is one of the "hard" cases which, proverbially, make "bad" law, and that any attempt upon the part of courts to relax the safeguards placed by corporate by-laws about the actions of directors would open a Pandora's box of business ills which would impair the usefulness of corporations. The law seems definite and clear and the practical policy behind it of the soundest.

The judgment must be reversed, with directions to the trial court to require the defendants to answer. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. BOMAR. (Cr. 1179.)

1. Indictment and information ⟸39 — Functions of district attorney in filing information are ministerial.

Functions of district attorney in filing information are ministerial only, he having no power to file information for any offense other than for which defendant was by committing magistrate held for trial.

2. Criminal law ⟸241—Defective commitment may be returned by court order to committing magistrate for correction.

When commitment is defective in form or fails to state specific charge on which defendant was bound over, it may, by superior court order, be returned to committing magistrate for correction, and when corrected it has same force and effect as if originally issued in its corrected form.

3. Criminal law ⟸241—Order directing filing of commitment nunc pro tunc held proper.

Where amended commitment was left with clerk of court August 4, though not marked filed at that time, order of August 18, directing its filing as of date August 4, was proper.

4. Criminal law ⟸241—Magistrate's determination as to whether testimony shows commission of crime is judicial act, and amounts to judgment.

Determination by magistrate of question as to whether testimony before him shows that certain crime has been committed is judicial act, and in effect amounts to judgment of tribunal over which he presides.

5. Criminal law ⟸241 — If magistrate pronounces erroneous conclusion as to crime committed, it is judicial error beyond his power to correct.

If magistrate, in considering testimony as to whether certain crime has been committed, arrives at and pronounces erroneous conclusion as to crime committed thereby, it is on his part judicial error which is beyond his power to correct.

6. Criminal law ⟸241 — Magistrate judicially erring as to commission of crime cannot thereafter modify order except as to matter of form.

As law at conclusion of examination by magistrate requires that if it appears to him that offense has been committed, and there is sufficient cause to believe defendant guilty, he must make or indorse on complaint order signed by him to that effect, in making such order he exhausts all power invested in him by law, and attempt thereafter to modify this order, either under direction of superior court or on his own motion, except as to matter of form, is beyond his power and jurisdiction.

7. Criminal law ⟸241—Magistrate without authority to amend commitment holding defendant for offense different from that for which he was held in original commitment.

Magistrate has no authority to amend his commitment by holding defendant for trial for offense different from that for which he was ordered held in original commitment.

8. Criminal law ⟸223, 1186(4)—Failure to accord accused preliminary examination held miscarriage of justice, and prejudicial error.

Where accused was not accorded fair trial on information filed against him, because no preliminary examination before committing magistrate was held on charges of which he was found guilty, there was miscarriage of justice, and hence Const. art. 6, § 4½, is inapplicable.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

A. W. Bomar was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Reversed.

Paul W. Schenck and Richard Kittrelle, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. A complaint was filed in the justice court of Los Angeles township containing four counts, each charging the defendant with the commission of the crime of grand larceny. A preliminary examination of said defendant was held upon said complaint, and the committing magistrate, on July 9, 1924, issued a commitment holding the defendant for trial in the superior court upon two charges of grand larceny set out in the first and second counts, respectively, of said complaint. On August 8th the district attorney filed an information against the defendant, which information contained four counts. The first two thereof charged the defendant with two separate crimes of grand larceny, and being the same two charges set forth in said commitment, and in each of the third and fourth counts of said information the defendant was charged with the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses. The defendant moved the court to set aside the information on the ground that the defendant had not been legally committed. This motion was made on August 14th and continued to August 18th. On the calling of the motion on the 18th, the court, upon motion of the district attorney, ordered that the clerk file nunc pro tunc, as of August 4, 1924, an amended commitment. This amended commitment was issued by the committing magistrate before whom the preliminary examination of defendant had been held. It was dated August 4, 1924, on which date it had been received by the clerk of the court, but had not been marked filed, and it purported to commit the defendant for trial upon the two charges of grand larceny set out in the original commitment, and also two charges of obtaining money under false pretenses; said two last mentioned charges being the same two charges which were set forth in counts 3 and 4, respectively, of the information. The court then denied defendant's motion to strike out the information, or any part thereof. Upon the trial defendant was found guilty of the two charges of obtaining money under false pretenses. The two charges of grand larceny in the information had previously been dismissed by the court upon the motion of the district attorney. The sole point made by appellant at this time for the reversal of the judgment herein is that the court erred in its refusal to grant appellant's motion to strike out the information in so far as said motion applied to the two charges of obtaining money under false pretenses. On a former hearing the judgment was affirmed (46 Cal. App. Dec. 966), but later this court granted appellant's petition for a rehearing, and also, upon his suggestion of a diminution of the record, ordered that the original complaint and the commitments of date July 9th and August 4th, respectively, be made a part of the record on appeal. These papers were not before the court on the former hearing.

[1, 2] Was the defendant legally committed upon the two charges of obtaining money under false pretenses, being the charges of which he was found guilty by the jury? The functions of the district attorney in the filing of an information are ministerial only. He has no power to file an information for any offense other than that for which the defendant has been by the committing magistrate held for trial. People v. Nogiri, 142 Cal. 596, 76 P. 490. When the commitment is defective in form or fails to state the specific charge on which the defendant was bound over, it may be, by order of the superior court, returned to the committing magistrate for the purpose of correction, and, when corrected, the commitment has the same force and effect as if originally issued in its corrected form. People v. Norman, 62 Cal. App. 219, 216 P. 402; Ex parte Fowler, 5 Cal. App. 549, 90 P. 958.

[3] In the present action the superior court made no order returning the commitment to the magistrate for correction. The court did, however, upon motion of the district attorney, order the corrected or amended commitment filed as a record of the superior court. Under these circumstances this action of the court in ordering the corrected or amended commitment filed, we think, might serve as a legal substitute for an order of the court directing the return of the commitment for correction. The amended commitment had evidently been left with the clerk of the court on August 4th, although not marked filed at that time. The order of the court directing its filing as of date August 4th, was therefore proper. The commitment, however, as originally issued by the committing magistrate, held the defendant for trial for the crime of grand larceny. There was no defect in the form of this commitment, nor was there any failure to state the specific charge for which the defendant was bound over to the superior court for trial. The corrected or amended commitment made no material correction in the form of the original commitment binding the defendant over to the superior court for trial upon the charge of grand larceny, but it set forth, in addition to these two charges of grand larceny contained in the original commitment, two other and distinct charges, to wit, two charges of obtaining money under false pretenses, and purported to commit the defendant for trial in said superior court upon all four of said charges.

Has a magistrate any authority, after committing a person for trial on one offense, thereafter to change his order and commit said person for another and distinct offense, without any further hearing and upon the same testimony upon which the original commitment was based? The only decision of our courts to which our attention has been called in which this direct question has been considered is the case of Ex parte Fowler, supra, where the court, after holding that the committing magistrate had power to correct the commitment in matter of form, said:

"Of course we are not to be understood as suggesting that a magistrate, after once committing an accused for a certain offense, may thereafter change his order and commit him for another and distinct offense."

[4, 5] This statement of the court was probably not necessary for the decision of any question involved therein, and therefore may very properly be considered as dictum. Yet we are not prepared to say that the court did not make a correct statement of the law upon the question under discussion. The determination by a magistrate of the question as to whether the testimony before him shows that a certain crime has been committed, is a judicial act (People v. Nogiri, supra), and in effect amounts to a judgment of the tribunal over which said magistrate presides. If the magistrate, in the consideration of such testimony, arrives at and pronounces an erroneous conclusion as to the crime committed thereby, it is on his part a judicial error which is beyond his power to correct. "Notwithstanding the power of the court to correct by amendment its inadvertent acts, where they are of such a nature as to be regarded as mere clerical misprisions, it is undoubtedly true that judicial error may not be thus corrected, but must be remedied in another way, as by motion for a new trial or on appeal. Proceedings for amendment of judgments * * * ought never to be the means of modifying or enlarging the judgment or the judgment record, so that it shall express something which the court did not pronounce, even though the proposed amendment embraces matter which clearly could, or even should have been pronounced." 14 Cal. Jur. p. 999. The authorities cited in the text in support of this proposition are directly applicable to judgments of courts of record, but we can see no reason why the same rule should not apply to a committing magistrate in the exercise of the power conferred upon him of holding preliminary examinations.

[6] At the conclusion of the examination, the law requires that if it appears to the magistrate that a public offense has been committed, and there is sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof, he must make or indorse on the complaint an order signed by him to that effect. In making this order, the magistrate has exhausted all the power in the premises with which he has been invested by law. Any attempt on his part thereafter to modify this order, either under the direction of the superior court or upon his own motion, except to correct the same in matter of form, is beyond his power and jurisdiction.

[7] We conclude, therefore, that the magistrate had no authority to amend his commitment by holding the defendant for trial for an offense different from that for which he was ordered held in the original commitment, and, therefore, that the defendant was not legally committed for the offense for which he was found guilty.

[8] Neither do we think that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution is applicable in the present case. Before any accused person can be called upon to defend himself on any charge prosecuted by information, he is entitled to a preliminary examination upon said charge, and the judgment of the magistrate before whom such examination is held as to whether the crime for which it is sought to prosecute him has been committed, and whether there is sufficient cause to believe him guilty thereof. These proceedings are essential to confer jurisdiction upon the court before whom he is placed on trial. To say that he was accorded a fair trial upon an information filed against him without a substantial compliance with these jurisdictional requirements, and therefore that there had been no miscarriage of justice, hardly meets the situation. Such an argument would apply with equal force to the validity of the conviction upon an information filed by the district attorney in a case where no preliminary examination at all had been held. Such practice would result, in legal effect, in wiping out all provisions of the Constitution and the Penal Code providing for preliminary examination, and in clothing the district attorney with unlimited authority to file information against whomsoever in his judgment he might consider guilty of crime. We do not believe that it was ever the intention to extend the scope of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution to any such limits.

The appellant never having been legally committed, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant appellant's motion to set aside the information.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Charles J. Luckehe against Reclamation District No. 2054. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Johnson, Sr., of Gridley, and J. C. Saylor, of Fresno, for appellant.

A. H. Hewitt, of Yuba City, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in an action to annul an assessment levied against plaintiff's property situated in reclamation district No. 2054, in Sutter and Butte counties, on the ground that said property was illegally included within said district, not being the character of swamp and overflow land subject to reclamation as provided by statute.

The action was brought under the provisions of section 3462 of the Political Code of the state of California. The complaint alleges the formation of the reclamation district pursuant to the provisions of part 3, title 8, chapter 1, article 2, of the Political Code; that the plaintiff is the owner of the land in question; that his land was included within the boundaries of the reclamation district by order of the board of supervisors of Sutter county, April 21, 1921; that prior thereto plaintiff had expended large sums of money and performed labor widening and deepening Snake river adjacent to his property, and connected ditches therewith, through his property, so as to thoroughly reclaim and drain the property; that at the time of the formation of reclamation district No. 2054 his property was not swamp or overflow land, and therefore not subject to reclamation; that in 1922 said board of supervisors wrongfully, inequitably, unjustly, and oppressively levied an assessment of $9,958 against plaintiff's property; that his land will receive no benefit from said plan of reclamation; that he "filed written objections to said assessment so made upon said lands before a hearing held by the board of supervisors thereon, on July 5th, 1922, in the manner and within the time required by law, and plaintiff offered evidence in support of his said objections at said hearing," but that said assessment was approved by the board; and plaintiff asks to have said assessment vacated and set aside.

The answer admits the formation of the reclamation district; the levying of the assessment; the ownership of the land; denies the widening or deepening of Snake river and the construction of ditches by plaintiff and the draining of his land thereby; denies that the assessment was unjust, wrongful, or oppressive; and alleges that plaintiff's land was swamp and overflow land, properly included within the district, and that said assessment was apportioned on all lands within the district according to the benefits that would be derived. The allegations of the complaint respecting the objections filed with the board were not denied.

At the trial a civil engineer, two of the reclamation commissioners, and the plaintiff were examined. The chief effort on the part of the plaintiff was to prove that the enlarging of Snake river, and the digging of ditches across his land, prior to the formation of the reclamation district, had the effect of draining and reclaiming his land, and therefore removing it from the class of swamp and overflow land subject to reclamation under the statute. The levy of assessment was proven. There was no effort made at the trial to prove that any objections were made or filed with the board of supervisors upon the formation of the district or at the levying of the assessment. While it is alleged in the complaint, and not denied by the answer, that objections to the levying of the assessment were made and filed with the board in the time and manner provided by law, there was no allegation of the character or nature of these objections. At the trial there was no proof in support of the allegations in this regard, indefinite and uncertain as such allegations were.

In an effort to prove that the reclamation district project was not beneficial to plaintiff's land, he propounded the following questions, to which objections were sustained:

"Prior to 1906, Mr. Luckehe, was there any arrangement ever made with you and any others whereby you did acquire the right to drain into Snake river?" and "As far as the use of your land is concerned, have you been able to cultivate any more land since this reclamation work was completed, than you did before?" and "Were you able, last year to produce more crops on your land than you did before?" and "How much acreage did you have in cultivation in the year 1921?" "How much acreage did you have in cultivation, and susceptible of cultivation last year?"

At the close of plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit was made under section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, and specifically that there was no evidence that objections had been made to the board of supervisors as provided by section 3462 of the Political Code; that it was not shown that the lands were assessed for a sum in excess of the benefits derived; and that it was not proven that the assessment was not apportioned according to the benefits accruing to each tract of land in the district. This motion was granted. From the judgment of dismissal this appeal was taken.

Section 3455 of the Political Code provides that, where the reclamation district is within the Sacramento or San Joaquin districts, the trustees must report their plan of formation of the district to the board of supervisors; three copies of the original plan of work shall be filed with the county clerk; notices of the time and place of hearing objections to said plan shall be published; at the hearing evidence may be adduced in support of such objections. It is then provided (subsection 5):

"When the said reclamation board shall have taken action approving, modifying, or rejecting any such original, supplemental or new plan of reclamation after a hearing as herein provided, such action shall be final, and thereafter the sufficiency of said plans shall not be subject to attack either before the reclamation board or in any court. * * *"

It is neither alleged nor proven that any objection was ever made before the board of supervisors to the proceedings leading up to the formation of district No. 2054, nor to the including of plaintiff's land in said district.

[1-3] Reclamation districts created under the provisions of the Political Code are quasi public in character. 9 Cal. Jur. 856; Reclamation District No. 542 v. Turner, 104 Cal. 334, 37 P. 1038. The formation of a reclamation district is a legislative act carried out in the exercise of the police or taxing power of the state. Inglin v. Hoppin, 156 Cal. 483, 105 P. 582; Williams v. Board of Supervisors, 65 Cal. 160, 3 P. 667. The proceedings for the formation of a reclamation district are special proceedings, and are final and conclusive as to all except jurisdictional matters. In 9 California Jurisprudence, at page 865, the author says:

"Among the facts thus conclusively determined are the following, that the lands included in the district are in fact swamp and overflow lands, that they will be benefited by reclamation, and that they have not been heretofore reclaimed."

[4, 5] Even though objections to the formation of the district on the ground that plaintiff's land was not in fact swamp or overflow land, and that it should not therefore be included in the proposed district, had been made before the board of supervisors as provided by law, in this attack upon the proceedings the determination of the Board of Supervisors would be res judicata. Lower Kings River Reclamation District No. 531 v. Phillips, 108 Cal. 306, 39 P. 630, 41 P. 335. The legality and regularity of the proceedings leading up to the formation of a reclamation district cannot be collaterally attacked. 9 Cal. Jur. 868.

[6] An action to contest the validity of an assessment under section 3462 of the Political Code can only be maintained after objections have been duly presented and adversely ruled upon by the board of supervisors. In such an action no objections to the assessment are available, except such as have already been presented in writing to the board of supervisors, unless they go to the jurisdiction, and render the proceeding wholly void. 9 Cal. Jur. 908; Meyer v. Reclamation District No. 17, 172 Cal. 104, 155 P. 635. Section 3462 of the Political Code provides, with relation to assessments:

"At any time before the date of such hearing, any person * * * may file written objections to such assessment, stating the grounds of such objections, which said statements shall be verified. * * * At said hearing the board of supervisors shall hear such evidence as may be offered. * * * And such decision of said board of supervisors shall be final. * * * No objection to such assessment shall be [thereafter] considered by the board of supervisors, or allowed in any other action or proceeding, unless such objection shall have been made in writing * * * as above specified."

[7, 8] The allegation of the complaint to the effect that "written objection to said assessment" was made before a hearing of the supervisors "in the manner and within the time required by law" is the mere statement of a conclusion. The "grounds of such objections" are not mentioned, if indeed they were specified in the written objections filed. Moreover, there was no effort to supply any proof of these allegations at the trial of this case. Under the foregoing authorities, this failure is fatal to plaintiff's right of recovery in this action.

[9, 10] It necessarily follows that the objections sustained to plaintiff's questions regarding the benefits presumed to have been derived by the formation and assessment of the district, are harmless. Moreover, under the authority of People v. Hagar, 66 Cal. 59, 4 P. 951, the question of such benefit was res judicata, and the evidence sought to be elicited was incompetent. The court there said:

"The board of supervisors, in hearing the petition for the formation of the district, and in making the order, had jurisdiction to determine what lands were to be benefited by the proposed system of reclamation, and to include such lands within the district, and their determination cannot now be inquired into; * * * the commissioners had authority to assess upon each and every acre within the district to be reclaimed or benefited a tax proportionate to the whole expense, and to the benefits which would result from the works. Such jurisdiction and authority being given by the statute, we do not think it was competent for the court below to have determined that either of the parcels enumerated in the offer was not benefited, or that such benefit was not of the value of the assessment."

The judgment of nonsuit was properly granted.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

WATERHOUSE-WILCOX CO. v. BETZ & MABREY et al. (Civ. 2834.)

1. Dismissal and nonsuit ⟸24—Plaintiff may dismiss action by nonsuit as against part of defendants and proceed against remainder.

In replevin, plaintiff may dismiss action against one or more of defendants by nonsuit and proceed against remainder, especially where defendants against whom he proceeds ask for no relief against codefendants, and do not object to granting nonsuit.

2. Replevin ⟸11(2)—Where taking is tortious, and answer denies plaintiff's ownership, and alleges possession was lawful, no demand for return of goods is necessary.

Where taking of property is tortious, and defendants in answer deny plaintiff's ownership, and allege that their possession is lawful, demand for return of property, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 509–521, is unnecessary.

3. Replevin ⟸72—Evidence held to show that plaintiff was owner and entitled to possession of property.

In replevin to recover elevator doors taken wrongfully from place where they had been delivered through mistake by carrier, evidence held to show that plaintiff was owner and entitled to possession.

4. Replevin ⟸68—Permitting amendment of complaint so as to allege directly that defendants converted and disposed of property to their own use held proper.

In replevin, permitting original complaint, alleging taking goods and retaining possession, to be amended several months later to allege directly that defendants converted and disposed of property to their own use, was not error.

5. Replevin ⟸10—Plaintiff held not prevented from maintaining replevin because property was in possession of sheriff at commencement of action.

In replevin for conversion of elevator doors, which through mistake on part of carrier had been misdelivered and wrongfully taken, and after being delivered to defendants were taken from defendants, who replevied them, in which action they were in control of sheriff, who placed them in possession of a keeper, in view of fact that doors were taken from keeper prior to trial of action, plaintiff was not precluded from maintenance of replevin on ground that property was in possession of sheriff at commencement of action.

6. Replevin ⟸10—Negotiation relating to installment of property in building not accepted by defendants held not consent to installation by plaintiff preventing maintenance of replevin.

Where owners of elevator doors, which were misdelivered, agreed that, if defendants, into whose possession they had come, would pay for them, they would install them in building, to which defendants replied that they had not bought doors of him, and would be unable to do so until released from present contract and certain money was returned to them, plaintiff did not consent to installation of doors in building so as to be prevented from recovering them in replevin.

7. Replevin ⟸79—Allowing interest on value of property converted and plaintiff's expenditures incurred in pursuit thereof held proper.

Under Civ. Code, § 3336, allowing interest on value of property converted and plaintiff's expenditures incurred in pursuit thereof was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Replevin by the Waterhouse-Wilcox Company against Betz & Mabrey, a copartnership composed of F. H. Betz and C. S. Mabrey and others. With consent of plaintiff, nonsuit was granted as to all except the named defendants. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Elliott & Atkinson, of Sacramento, for appellants.

George L. Popert and H. W. Zagoren, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The defendants Betz and Mabrey, copartners, have appealed from the judgment herein in favor of plaintiff for the value of 16 elevator doors.

The original complaint, which was filed November 18, 1922, alleged that on the 9th day of November, 1922, the plaintiff was the owner and in possession of the doors and certain appliances, which were of the value of $2,500; that on that day the defendants, "without the consent of plaintiff, wrongfully took such goods and chattels from the possession of plaintiff"; that subsequently and prior to the commencement of the action the plaintiff demanded possession thereof, but that defendants refused to deliver possession thereof, and "still unlawfully withhold and detain said goods and chattels from the possession of plaintiff, to its damage in the sum of $2,500." The prayer was "for the recovery of the possession of said goods and chattels, or for the sum of $2,500, the value thereof, in case the delivery cannot be had, together with $500 damages and costs of suit."

It appears that the plaintiff claimed the immediate delivery of such property, as provided in part 2, title 7, chapter 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to the claim and delivery of personal property. A deputy sheriff testified that he served the "replevin papers" on the defendants; that he took possession of five of the doors, which were "in the new building being built by the John Breuner Company"; and that thereafter Betz and Mabrey filed a redelivery bond, and the five doors were then delivered to them.

April 11, 1923, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint, which was substantially the same as the original complaint, except that it was therein alleged:

"That the defendants, on or about the 9th day of November, 1922, * * * without the consent of plaintiff, wrongfully took and carried away the said goods and chattels from plaintiff, and converted and disposed of the same to their own use. * * * That plaintiff has spent time and money in the pursuit of said property, and has incurred an expense and has expended $500 in an attempt to recover said personal property."

The answer of Betz and Mabrey was filed July 13, 1923. It is therein denied that plaintiff was at any time the owner or in possession of the property described in the complaint; that the defendants, "without the consent of plaintiff, wrongfully, or otherwise, took such goods and chattels from the possession of plaintiff, and converted them to their own use"; that "plaintiff demanded of these defendants possession of said goods and chattels, but to deliver possession thereof the said defendants, and each of them, have refused"; or that "defendants still unlawfully withhold * * * or detain said goods and chattels." The answer alleges that at all times mentioned in the complaint defendants Betz and Mabrey "were then and there building and erecting a five-story building * * * under a contract with defendant John Breuner Company; that in the course of construction of said building * * * said defendants long prior to the commencement of this action entered into a contract with defendant Norman W. Tatterson, as agent for and representing the Peelle Company, of New York, manufacturers of elevator doors, for the manufacture and erection within said building of eight double Peelle elevator doors; that under the terms of said contract * * * said doors were manufactured by said Peelle Company, and were delivered in said building by said Tatterson, and erected and placed therein in accordance with said agreement, and fully paid for as therein provided; that after the delivery of said doors to these defendants, as above set forth, eleven pieces thereof, constituting five and one-half doors, were forcibly taken from said Breuner building, and it became necessary for these defendants to, and they did, begin an action in replevin to recover said doors, so taken, and said action is still pending in this court; that said eleven doors were, by due and legal process, taken into the custody and control of the sheriff of Sacramento county under a writ duly issued out of this court, in said action, and the said doors were at the commencement of this action in the custody and under the control of said sheriff of the county of Sacramento."

With plaintiff's consent, a nonsuit was granted as to all defendants except Betz and Mabrey. The court found that all the allegations of the complaint are true; that on or about the 18th day of November, 1922, defendants Betz and Mabrey "unlawfully withheld and detained all of said personal property, with the exception of the electrical interlocks, above mentioned, from the possession of this plaintiff"; that prior to the commencement of this action plaintiff demanded the return of such property, but said defendants refused to return the same; that "the said personal property has been installed, as a permanent fixture to real property, and delivery thereof cannot be made by the defendants above named to this plaintiff"; that the reasonable market value of the property on November 18, 1922, was $2,018; that the plaintiff expended $50 in locating said property. Judgment was entered accordingly with interest on the value of the property from November 18, 1922.

Appellants urge five grounds for a reversal of the judgment, as follows: First, that it was error to grant a nonsuit as to Tatterson and the John Breuner Company; second, that the evidence is insufficient to show a demand for the return of the property; third, that eleven of the doors were in the possession of the sheriff at the commencement of the action, and "hence were not subject to recovery by plaintiff in this action"; fourth, "that the evidence does not justify the court's finding as to the value of the doors"; fifth, "that after the commencement of this action the doors were installed in the Breuner building with plaintiff's consent and by its order, and hence plaintiff was estopped by its own conduct from recovering said doors in this action, or from any recovery from defendants Betz & Mabrey."

[1] If it be conceded that plaintiff had a cause of action against all the defendants jointly, it does not follow that all of them were necessary parties. "In the prosecution of actions for causes ex delicto all persons concerned in the commission of the tort may be joined as defendants, or either or any of them may be sued severally." Gosliner v. Briones, 187 Cal. 557, 563, 204 P. 19, 22. Appellants asked for no relief against their co-defendants, and made no objection to the granting of the nonsuit. Plaintiff had the right to dismiss the action as against one or more of the defendants and proceed against the remainder. This it did, in effect, by consenting to the nonsuit.

[2] The plaintiff made no formal demand for the return of the property, but in his discussions with appellants its president asserted plaintiff's ownership and right to possession in such manner as to constitute a demand. Appellants' taking was tortious, and in their answer they denied plaintiff's ownership, and alleged that their possession was lawful, thus showing that a demand would have been clearly useless. Under such circumstances no demand is necessary. 5 Cal. Jur. 169.

[3-5] It is not contended, and under the evidence it could not be maintained, that the plaintiff was not the owner and entitled to the possession of the property. It had purchased the same from Peelle Company, and had paid for it. Plaintiff had consigned the property to Waterhouse-Wilcox Company, Sacramento. Through a mistake on the part of the carrier the property was delivered to a company in Sacramento which is not a party to this action. Plaintiff notified Tatterson that the doors would be delivered to him upon his making payment of the contract price therefor. He demanded delivery without first making such payment. Tatterson finally took the doors wrongfully from the place where they had been delivered through the aforesaid mistake and delivered them to appellants at the Breuner building. At the time of and prior to such delivery appellants knew of plaintiff's claim of ownership of the property. Upon dicovering its mistake in the delivery of the property the carrier succeeded in regaining possession of eleven of the doors. The appellants then brought an action against the carrier alone for the recovery of the eleven doors, and, in that action, the sheriff took the eleven doors into his possession on the 16th of November, 1922, and stored them in the Breuner building, placing John Breuner Company in charge of them as keeper. The carrier made no defense in that action. The president of the plaintiff company testified that the property was "in Mr. Breuner's building, or the Breuner job, at the time we started our replevin proceedings. * * * The doors themselves were in the Breuner warehouse. Now who had possession of them, I don't know, whether they were in the sheriff, in Betz & Mabrey, or anybody else. I know where they were located." Several months later the complaint was so amended as to allege directly that the defendants "converted and disposed of" the property "to their own use." In Henderson v. Hart, 122 Cal. 332, 54 P. 1110, it was held proper to permit an amendment to the complaint in an action of replevin to be made after the close of the evidence, so as to change the action into one of conversion. The court said:

"It was not an abuse of discretion in the court to allow plaintiff to amend her pleading so that it might support a recovery for the conversion of the property when it was shown that she could not have judgment for its possession because defendant had disposed of the same before the action was begun. Riciotto v. Clement, 94 Cal. 105 [29 P. 414]. If it appeared that plaintiff knew, when she brought her action, that defendant no longer had possession of the property, the conclusion might be different; but it was not shown that she had such knowledge."

Since the president of the plaintiff found the property in a building which appellants were constructing, his testimony to the effect that he did not know it was in possession of the sheriff is not unreasonable. The original complaint was substantially in the form of that considered in Faulkner v. First National Bank, 130 Cal. 258, 262, 62 P. 463. At page 267 (62 P. 466) it is said:

"The averments in the complaint of the demand by respondent of the appellant that it deliver to her the property, and appellant's refusal to do so, are sufficient averments of conversion; and the action may therefore be considered in the nature of trover."

See, also, Commercial Credit Co. v. Peak (Cal. Sup.) 231 P. 340; New Liverpool, etc., Co. v. Western, etc., Co., 151 Cal. 479, 91 P. 152; Benzler v. Van Fleet, 28 Cal. App. 389, 152 P. 736. The undersheriff who, in the action of Betz & Mabrey against the aforesaid carrier, placed the eleven doors in the possession of John Breuner Company as keeper, testified that he had never terminated the authority of such keeper or released the property to any one else, yet the doors were installed in the building prior to the trial of the action. When they were taken from the possession of the keeper does not appear. Appellants' third contention is without support.

The president of the plaintiff testified in detail as to the market value of the property. This testimony stands uncontradicted, and it fully supports the finding as to the value of the property.

[6] It remains to be determined whether the doors were installed "with plaintiff's consent" or "by its order." It is to be observed that appellants did not plead the estoppel here claimed, although their answer was filed long after they had acquired knowledge of the facts upon which such claim is based. The evidence, however, does not support the contention that plaintiff so consented or gave such order. The president of plaintiff testified that a meeting of the various parties and their attorneys was held on the 21st of November, 1922, apparently in an effort to compromise the dispute between them; that "at that time the agreement was made which I assumed was the binding one upon which I had sold those goods to Betz & Mabrey. As a result of that assumed sale, I relinquished—I withdrew my objection to having the doors installed, as shown by the letter." November 22d plaintiff wrote Betz and Mabrey as follows:

"I am inclosing copy of our letter of this day to C. E. Hague & Co., from which you will note that I informed Mr. Hague by phone early this morning that he was at liberty as far as we are concerned to proceed with any arrangements he had made to install the materials in question. I also requested Mr. Hague to notify you of this release by phone at our expense, and I presume that he has done so."

The copy of the letter referred to contains the following:

"While in Sacramento yesterday I sold the above-mentioned goods to Betz & Mabrey. We therefore hereby withdraw our recent written notification not to install these goods for anybody until you received our release from such instructions. In other words, this sale has entirely removed our objections, and you are therefore at liberty as far as we are concerned to proceed with the installation under any arrangements you have made with orders for such work."

November 24th appellants wrote plaintiff as follows:

"We are just in receipt of your letter of Nov. 22d, also a copy of letter which you wrote to C. E. Hague & Co. Referring to the second paragraph of your letter to C. E. Hague & Co., you state that you sold the doors to Betz & Mabrey. This matter was thoroughly discussed with you at the time you were in Mr. Devlin's office and we have no recollection of buying the doors from you, in fact we told you at the time that we would be unable to do so until we were released from our present contract and the money we had advanced was returned to us."

It thus appears that appellants knew that the plaintiff's apparent consent was based upon the assumption that it had sold the property to appellants. Appellants' denial of the sale by plaintiff to them left the parties in the same position they were in prior to the attempted compromise. Under such circumstances appellants' contention that plaintiff consented to the installation of the doors and that it estopped by its conduct cannot be upheld.

[7] The court did not err in allowing interest on the value of the property converted and plaintiff's expenditures incurred in pursuit thereof. Civ. Code, § 3336.

The judgment is affirmed.

RANEY v. MERRITT et al. (Civ. 5110.)

1. Public lands ⟸39(8)—Conveyance by town authorities of part of lot previously conveyed gave grantee no additional land.

Under Act Cong. March 1, 1867, providing for grant of land in town of Petaluma to corporate authorities thereof with authority to convey land in actual occupancy of parties, where city trustees conveyed lot to person in actual occupancy of whole thereof on March 1, 1867, subsequent conveyance of 10 feet thereof, which official map erroneously included in street, to one of such occupant's successors in interest gave grantee no additional land, but merely confirmed original deed, and quieted the title as against the city, if it had any effect.

2. Boundaries ⟸46(3)—When line agreed on as true boundary line becomes conclusive stated.

Mere acquiescence in the existence of a fence and the occupancy of land up to it does not amount to an agreement that it is on the accepted boundary line, but, where a dispute exists as to the true line, and the parties are uncertain as to its exact location, and they agree upon it, mark it upon the ground, or build up to it, and acquiesce in the location for a period equal to the statute of limitations, such line becomes in law the true line, regardless of accuracy of agreed location as it may subsequently appear.

3. Boundaries ⟸46(2)—Agreement fixing boundary line theretofore uncertain binds all parties consenting to it.

Agreement fixing boundary line theretofore uncertain binds all parties consenting to it.

4. Boundaries ⟸37(3)—Inference from conduct and long acquiescence supports finding parties acquiesced in certain line as true boundary line.

A finding that adjoining property owners have acquiesced in a certain agreed line as the location of the true boundary line is fully supported in the absence of direct evidence upon the subject, when it may be inferred from their conduct and long acquiescence in such line as the true boundary line.

5. Boundaries ⟸37(3)—Evidence held to show uncertainty as to true boundary line and that parties fixed certain line as true line, in which their successors in interest acquiesced.

Evidence held to show error in Stratton map, made pursuant to Act Cong. July 1, 1864, for the town of Petaluma, incorporated by special act of Legislature (St. 1858, p. 140), occasioned uncertainty as to a boundary line of properties, and that predecessors in interest of the parties fixed a certain line, and that their successors in interest at all times acquiesced therein.

6. Adverse possession ⟸90—Taxes assessed against lands is payment on lands as determined by agreed line.

Taxes assessed against lands as to which certain line is agreed as being true boundary line is payment on lands as determined by such agreed line as respects adverse possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Suit by Grace M. Raney against John T. Merritt and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. A. Meyer, Frank J. Burke, and Fred S. Howell, all of Petaluma, for appellant.

Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action to enjoin defendants from interfering with the use of certain real property alleged by plaintiff to be owned by her. The property in dispute is situated in the city of Petaluma, and forms a part of what is known and designated as block 517. The complaint alleges plaintiff to be the owner of two separate parcels of land located within said block. The first is described as beginning at the southeast corner of said lot 517 at the corner of Oak and Main streets, and running thence northerly along the line of Main street 82½ feet; thence running westerly at right angles to Main street 130 feet; thence southerly at right angles 82½ feet to Oak street; thence at right angles along Oak street in an easterly direction 130 feet to the place of beginning.

The second parcel is described as being a strip of land 10 feet in width and 130 feet in length on Oak street in front of and adjoining that portion of said lot No. 517, according to Stratton's official map of the city of Petaluma extending in an easterly and westerly direction and in a northerly and southerly direction on Main street a distance of 10 feet.

At the outset it may be well to state that the southeast corner of lot No. 517 is the northwest corner of Main and Oak streets, and that the width of Oak street, as laid out and delineated on Stratton's Official Map of the City of Petaluma, is 70 feet, when in truth and fact that street is but 60 feet in width. Plaintiff contended at the trial that her first tract begins at and the point of commencement is at the southeast corner of lot No. 517 and not at the northwest corner of Main and Oak streets (which would be 10 feet farther south) as contended for by defendant, and that she, plaintiff, should have the southerly 82½ feet off of said lot No. 517, and in addition thereto the northerly 10 feet off of Oak street, making a total of 92½ feet on Main street.

Defendants contended that plaintiff was only entitled to 82½ feet frontage on Main street lying immediately north of and along and adjacent to said Oak street, as said street is upon the ground, for the reason that the point of commencement set out in the deeds in the various chains of title of plaintiff and defendants was intended to and contemplated by reason of their acts and those of their predecessors to commence at the northwest corner of Oak and Main streets (as it is on the ground).

The question which was presented for determination by the trial court, therefore, was whether plaintiff was entitled to 82½ feet or 92½ feet fronting on Main street lying immediately north of Oak street as it now exists. The discrepancy in the official map has given rise to the controversy.

In support of their asserted title defendants claimed that a board fence, located 82½ feet north of the northern boundary line of Oak street, as it exists upon the ground, became by acquiescence an established and agreed line between the parties. They also relied upon adverse possession. The findings of the trial court were in conformity with their claim.

Appellant here contends that nowhere does it appear in the evidence that the parties ever made such an agreement, or that any line was ever established. They also claim that the evidence does not support the finding as to adverse possession.

For a clear understanding of the different conveyances involved it may be well to state the history of land titles in the city of Petaluma. They are set forth in Gervasoni v. City of Petaluma, 189 Cal. 306, 208 P. 120.

In the year 1858 the town of Petaluma was incorporated by a special act of the Legislature, which defined the exterior limits of said town, but did not embrace any details as to its interior lots, blocks, or streets. Stats. 1858, p. 140. In 1864 an act of Congress was adopted (13 Stats. at Large, 343) providing for a survey of the town, which act embodied a method for acquiring title to the lands held by bona fide occupants at the time of the adoption of said act. The survey provided for in the act was made, and a map drafted and adopted known as the "Stratton map." This map contained a detailed description of the lots and width and location of the streets, and was approved by the trustees of the town.

On March 1, 1867 (14 Stat. 418), an act of Congress was passed providing that all the right and title to the land situated within the corporate limits of certain towns, including Petaluma, as defined in the act of the Legislature of the state of California, be granted to the corporate authorities of said towns and their successors in trust for and with authority to convey so much of said lands as was in the bona fide occupancy of parties. In the following year the state Legislature adopted an act authorizing the trustees of the town or city of Petaluma to execute the trust provided for in the act of Congress mentioned by the execution and delivery of deeds to the persons entitled thereto under the Congressional act.

The Stratton map, above referred to, indicates that the portion of Oak street here involved is a street 70 feet in width, when, as before stated, in truth and in fact, it was and is a street of but 60 feet in width.

In conformity with the acts above mentioned the board of trustees of the city of Petaluma conveyed to one Brady, lot No. 517 of said city, describing it by number, and reciting that it fronted 253.4 feet on Main street, and contained 13,880 square feet. Through mesne conveyances one John D. Scott acquired this lot, and on January 17, 1885, he conveyed a portion thereof to B. F. Cox, D. F. Connolly, William Ayers, and Thomas Kyle.

The portion so conveyed was described as being a part of lot No. 517, according to Stratton's official map. The description by metes and bounds recites its beginning to be "at the southeast corner of said lot numbered 517 at the corner of Oak and Main street, running thence northerly along the line of Main street 82½ feet; thence westerly at right angles to Main street 130 feet; thence running southerly at right angles 82½ feet to Oak street; thence at right angles along Oak street in an easterly direction 130 feet to the place of beginning."

Thereafter, on August 22, 1887, Scott (the common grantor and predecessor in interest of both plaintiff and defendants) conveyed to John Merritt (father of defendants and their immediate predecessor in title) all of lot No. 517, saving and excepting from the conveyance the 82½ feet fronting on Main street by 130 feet fronting on Oak street, heretofore conveyed to Cox et al.

On May 2, 1906, the trustees of the city of Petaluma, acting under the authority vested in them under the acts hereinabove mentioned, conveyed to one Albert R. Charles, one of the predecessors in interest of plaintiff, title to the northerly 10 feet fronting on Main street by 130 feet in depth, off of the northerly side of Oak street, as being a bona fide occupier through his grantors on the 1st day of March, 1867. Plaintiff's asserted chain of title therefore to the two claimed parcels of land is the deed from Scott to Cox et al., through which he deraigned title to the first parcel and the deed from the trustees of the city of Petaluma to Albert Charles granting the 10-foot strip.

Defendants, on the other hand, deraign their title by decree of distribution through the deed of Scott to John Merritt by which all of lot 517 was conveyed to him, saving the 82½ feet conveyed by Scott et al.; John Merritt having died, and his estate being succeeded to by defendants under such decree.

[1] It is clearly manifest to us that plaintiff never acquired through her predecessors in interest any additional frontage on Main street by reason of the deed in 1906 executed by the city trustees to Charles. The trustees had already executed a deed to the entire tract to Brady, who was entitled thereto as being in possession of all of lot 517, and no other person than Brady could have procured this deed, as he was the bona fide occupant of the entire lot on March 1, 1867. The action of the trustees, therefore, if it had any effect, was to merely confirm the original deed, and thus, in effect, quiet the title of the successors in interest of Brady as against any claim of the city of Petaluma in and to the northerly 10 feet of Oak street as erroneously depicted on the Stratton map with respect to the width of that street.

In support of the findings respondents claim that, by the error in the Stratton map with respect to the width of Oak street, Scott, while the owner of the balance of the lot, and Cox et al., grantees of Scott, agreed that the northerly line of the lands conveyed by Scott to Cox et al. should commence at a point on the west side of Main street, 82½ feet north of the northerly property line of Oak street, and thereafter Scott and Cox et al., and their respective successors in interest, acquiesced in said line, and built to it, and no further.

There is evidence to show that prior to the execution of the deed from Scott to Cox et al., on January 17, 1885, these grantees were engaged in the express business in the city of Petaluma, and were at the date of the deed just mentioned leasing from Scott the identical property which they subsequently acquired. Upon this property while so leased was situated along the north property line of Oak street for a considerable distance of the 130 feet, marking the north line of the land, a fence, which had been constructed by Scott. Shortly after their purchase Cox et al. built barns and sheds to the line of the old fence and to the line of the property they had leased, which was a line running west 130 feet from a point on the west side of Main street 82½ feet north of the north property line of Oak street. Kyle, one of the grantees, testified that, when the sheds and barns were built to that line, Scott, himself, and his associates, believed it to be the northerly line as conveyed to them, and that they designated it as such.

It also appeared that all parties interested therein acquiesced in and maintained the line so established by Scott and Cox et al., and that during all of the times since 1885 and down to the year 1919, when appellant acquired the property, John Merritt, through whom defendants claim, and his successors in interest enjoyed all of lot 517 without interruption of claim of right therein to a point 82½ feet north of the north property line of Oak street. Other evidence is to the same effect, and we deem it sufficient to support the findings of the trial court.

[2] While the mere acquiescence in the existence of a fence and the occupancy of the land up to it does not amount to an agreement that it is on an accepted boundary line (Huddart v. McGirk, 186 Cal. 386, 199 P. 494; Staniford v. Trombly, 181 Cal. 372, 186 P. 599), still, where, as here, a dispute exists as to the true line, and the parties are uncertain as to its exact location, and they agree upon it, mark it upon the ground, or build up to it, and acquiesce in the location for a period equal to the statute of limitations, such line becomes in law the true line called for by the respective descriptions, and this is so, regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location as it may subsequently appear. Silva v. Azevedo, 178 Cal. 495, 173 P. 929; Board of Trustees v. Miller, 54 Cal. App. 102, 201 P. 952.

[3] The doctrine of an agreed boundary line and its binding effect upon conterminous owners rests fundamentally upon the fact that there is, or is believed by all parties to be, an uncertainty as to the true line. When that uncertainty exists, or is believed by them to exist, they may among themselves by agreement fix the boundary line, and that agreement will bind all the consenting parties. Clapp v. Churchill, 164 Cal. 741, 130 P. 1061.

[4] Whether adjoining property owners believe that an uncertainty as to the location of the boundary line dividing their properties exists at the time they agree upon a location is a question to be proven by direct evidence or deduced from circumstances in evidence (Hill v. Schumacher, 45 Cal. App. 362, 187 P. 437), and a finding that the parties have so acquiesced is fully supported, in the absence of direct evidence upon the subject, when it may be inferred from conduct, and especially, as here, from long acquiescence. Board of Trustees v. Miller, 54 Cal. App. 102, 201 P. 952.

[5] Upon the question, therefore, we conclude that there was an uncertainty occasioned by the error in the Stratton map, and that Scott and Cox et al., predecessors of the parties in interest, had fixed the true line as commencing on the west side of Main street at a point 82½ feet north of the north property line of Oak street, and that their successors in interest had at all times acquiesced in the line so fixed until the claim made by plaintiff.

[6] Equally without merit is the contention that adverse possession to the 10-foot strip was not proven, for the reason that taxes had not been paid thereon by defendants for the necessary period.

In this connection the evidence shows that both parties have paid all taxes assessed upon their holdings as conveyed to them by their respective conveyances. The findings of the trial court as to the agreed boundary line had the effect of extending and diminishing the limits of the deeds to include and exclude the parcel of land in dispute. Under such circumstances the payment of taxes assessed in this manner is a payment on the land in the possession of the parties. Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 489, 119 P. 893.

In conclusion it may be stated that to us it seems beyond all question that the predecessors of the parties in interest plainly intended and contemplated that the property to which plaintiff has succeeded should commence at the northwest corner of Oak and Main streets as it appeared upon the ground, and that plaintiff never acquired any additional or greater frontage than the deed of his predecessors in interest called for.

Judgment affirmed.

Evidence held to warrant inference that accused received stolen car for his own gain, and thus to prevent owner from repossessing it.

6. Criminal law ⟸696(3)—Motion to strike, stating no grounds, and supported only by objection to incomplete preliminary question, properly overruled.

Motion to strike evidence of defendant's pleas of guilty to other offenses held properly overruled, where it stated no grounds, and the only objection on the grounds of incompetency, immateriality, and irrelevancy, was made before completion of preliminary question, as the court's remarks, when objection was made that "the question is not finished yet, but you can make it, and I will overrule it," was not as claimed notice that objections would be useless, and the objection did not dispense with statement of grounds in the motion.

7. Criminal law ⟸696(5)—Motion to strike evidence is unavailing, unless addressed to evidence received over objection.

Motion to strike evidence is availing only when addressed to evidence received over an objection, unless there was no opportunity to make the objection.

8. Criminal law ⟸695(4) — Specification of ground of objection to admission of evidence is unnecessary, if evidence is inadmissible for any purpose.

Specification of ground of objection to admission of evidence is unnecessary, if evidence is inadmissible for any purpose.

9. Witnesses ⟸350—Accused having been impeached by admitting plea of guilty, it was proper for prosecuting officer to show name of offense.

Accused having testified on direct examination to plea of guilty, and on cross-examination that crime was a felony, he was impeached, and it was proper for prosecuting officer to go further by showing on cross-examination the name of the felony, especially in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2051.

10. Witnesses ⟸350—Prosecutor held entitled to show interposition by accused of plea of guilty to charge of grand larceny, and not to different charge testified to by accused.

Prosecution held entitled to show on cross-examination that accused's plea of guilty was interposed to charge of grand larceny, and not to charge of receiving stolen property as testified to by accused.

11. Witnesses ⟸350—Reading of information in prior criminal prosecution held permissible to refresh accused's erroneous memory.

Reading, on cross-examination, of information in prior criminal prosecution, held permissible to refresh accused's erroneous memory as to crime to which he pleaded guilty, and crime with which he was charged.

12. Criminal law ⟸695(2)—Objection to evidence, stating no grounds, held not good.

It having been proper to use information in a prior prosecution on cross-examination to refresh accused's memory, a general objection to its admission, stating no grounds, was not good.

13. Witnesses ⊂⊃350 — Questions propounded to accused pertaining to former prosecutions held not misconduct, but proper cross-examination.

Questions propounded to accused pertaining to former prosecutions, to refute accused's testimony that charge against him in a former prosecution was that of receiving stolen goods, and not robbery, and that he had pleaded guilty of former charge, and not to charge of grand larceny, held not misconduct, but proper cross-examination.

14. Criminal law ⊂⊃1169(11) — Question whether accused knew persons with whom he was jointly charged with having committed crime in prior prosecution held not harmful.

Question whether accused knew two other persons with whom he was jointly charged with having committed crime in prior prosecution held not harmful, where fact that he pleaded guilty had already been shown, especially in the absence of a showing that such other persons were disreputable.

15. Criminal law ⊂⊃1144(12) — Not assumed that question on cross-examination did not relate to matter referred to on direct examination.

Where accused for claimed purpose of showing persecution by police testified to various arrests on suspicion, it cannot be assumed that question on cross-examination, whether on the day of one of such arrests he stole an automobile with two other boys, did not relate to the matter out of which the arrest on that day sprang.

16. Criminal law ⊂⊃1036(2) — Question propounded to accused held improper, but, having been withdrawn on objection, not reversible error.

A question propounded to accused on cross-examination, whether he had been in the courts every year since 1917, held improper, but, having been withdrawn, on objection, not reversible error, in absence of a request to admonish jury to disregard such question.

17. Criminal law ⊂⊃782(5)—Refusal of instruction as to considering all evidence held not error.

Refusal of instruction that jury's deliberation must be based upon, and they must take into consideration all the evidence admitted, and that they were to determine whether the written or documentary evidence together with the rest of the testimony tended to prove the allegations of the information, held not error, as instruction contained nothing but what every person qualified for jury duty knows.

18. Criminal law ⊂⊃829(12)—Essence of requested instruction held covered by instruction given.

Essence of instruction as to considering all the evidence, etc., held covered by instruction given.

19. Criminal law ⊂⊃783(1)—Instruction held properly refused as misleading as to question of consideration of plea of guilty, as impeachment of accused.

Requested instruction that jury must not consider accused's plea of guilty to a felony charge in deliberating upon the issue of guilt or innocence held properly refused as being misleading, in view of rule that plea of guilty is proper to be considered as an impeachment of accused as a witness.

On Appellant's Petition for Rehearing.

20. Criminal law ⊂⊃562—Not the law that acquittal must result under each of two inconsistent charges merely because evidence, in theory, would equally justify verdict of guilty under either.

It is not the law that where the evidence in a criminal case positively demands a conviction under one or the other of two inconsistent charges, such as a charge of grand larceny and of having received stolen property, an acquittal must result under each merely because the evidence, in theory, would equally justify a verdict of guilt under either.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Frank Jacobs was convicted of receiving stolen property, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. J. Clark, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and H. H. Linney and John W. Maltman, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendant was tried under an information in two counts. Under the first of these the charge was grand larceny. Under the second the charge was receiving stolen property. The property concerned in both charges was a Ford automobile—a coupé. The evidence at the trial showed without dispute that the car was stolen one evening between 8:30 o'clock and 9:15 o'clock from a place on a public street where it had been parked by the owner. It was also shown without dispute that the vehicle was placed in a certain private garage on the same evening and that it remained there continuously for a period of about 6 weeks, at the end of which time it was removed by police officers. Other facts will be stated as we proceed with a discussion of the various points involved in the cause. Defendant was acquitted on the charge of grand larceny, but was convicted on the charge of receiving stolen property. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] One of the contentions of appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to show that he ever received the stolen property. The garage in which the car was found was upon the property of a Mrs. Johnson. This individual testified that appellant came to her residence, which was located on the same property, at about 7:30 o'clock on the evening on which the car was stolen; that he was accompanied by another man who was unknown to Mrs. Johnson, and whose identity was never ascertained by her; that the two came to the place in a Ford touring car; and that appellant inquired whether she had a garage for rent. Upon being informed that she had, appellant said, according to Mrs. Johnson, that—"They were looking for one, and they would be back later to let me know if they would take it."

The witness further testified that on the same evening, between 9 and 9:30 o'clock, she heard a car driven into the garage. On the next morning she saw there the Ford coupé, which afterward turned out to be the stolen property. On that same day, Mrs. Johnson further testified, appellant came to her place, and she said also that he thereafter came to the premises about once each week during the time the car was in the garage. On these various occasions she testified she talked with him only about the weather, except that at one time, which she did not identify particularly, he said that there was something wrong with the car and that it needed repairing. She further testified that on these various visits to her place appellant usually came "with some one else," and also:

"What did he do when he came there, if anything? A. Well, he talked to my husband, I think, two or three times; he went in the garage; and the other times he stayed out in the machine [in which she testified he came]. * * *

"Q. What do you mean by saying that he went into the garage? * * * A. He unlocked the door and went in [using a key which was in his possession].

"Q. Unlocked the door and went in. Did he stay any length of time? A. No.

"Q. Other times he would drive in there with the car, and not go to the garage at all, you say? A. Yes."

The garage had been rented by the month. The rent for the first month was handed to a daughter of Mrs. Johnson, at the front door of the family residence, on the night and at the time when the stolen car was driven into the garage. The girl testified that the money was paid to her by a man whom she did not know, and not by appellant. About 2 weeks after the rent for the second month fell due, appellant made one of his visits to the Johnson place, according to the testimony of Mrs. Johnson, and said to her "that he was sorry he was late in paying his rent." He then handed her his check for the amount. Prior to this occasion the stolen car had been located by the police and an officer was lying in wait upon the Johnson premises at the time of the delivery of the check. He then made his appearance and took appellant into custody. The officer testified that he said to appellant, immediately preceding the arrest, "We have got you on the ground at last," and that before anything further was said appellant responded, "That ain't my car." In order to show that no unfavorable presumption is to be indulged against the prosecution for its failure to produce Mrs. Johnson's husband as a witness, it is to be observed that he died before the action came to trial. We think the jury was justified in drawing from the testimony above recited the inference that appellant came into possession of the stolen car on the night of the theft or soon thereafter.

The further point is made by appellant that there is in the record no evidence that he acquired possession of the Ford coupé with knowledge of the fact that it was stolen. It having been established by uncontradicted evidence that the car was stolen, respondent sees evidence of guilty knowledge upon the part of appellant in the evidence above recited as to his possession of the property. It is said that, in the absence of a satisfactory explanation by appellant, his possession of the stolen car was sufficient to support a conviction on the charge of receiving stolen property. The question is evidently one of first impression in this state, for we are referred to no California cases on either side of it, and have found none. There is, however, abundant authority upon the point, and upon related questions, elsewhere. We shall cite many of these cases, but we desire it to be understood that in doing so we are continually having in mind what is termed in the cases the recent possession of stolen property; that is, the possession of it immediately or soon after it was stolen, and not a possession acquired after a considerable length of time following the theft. It has been decided in a few cases that the possession of stolen articles, while warranting an inference of guilt of larceny, will allow no such inference where the charge is that of receiving stolen goods. Among these cases are Sartorious v. State, 24 Miss. 602, and State v. Adams, 133 N. C. 667, 45 S. E. 553, although it is remarked in the opinion in the first of the two that—

"There might be cases where recent possession of stolen goods, united with other circumstances, would warrant the presumption of a felonious reception, and not of a larceny of the goods."

In another case the dogmatic assertion is made that the "recent possession of stolen property is not evidence" of knowledge that it was stolen. People v. Lardner, 296 Ill. 190, 129 N. E. 697. Doubtless, however, it was not intended by the adjudication to announce such an extreme rule, for authorities are cited in support of the statement which decide only that possession alone is not evidence of guilty knowledge of the theft. There are many cases which state this latter rule. Among them are Durant v. People, 13 Mich. 351; People v. Weissenberger, 73 App.

Div. 428, 77 N. Y. S. 71; State v. Richmond, 186 Mo. 71, 84 S. W. 880; State v. Malvarosa, 30 Del. (7 Boyce) 451, 108 A. 95; Grant v. State, 87 Tex. Cr. R. 19, 218 S. W. 1062; State v. Lippman (Mo. Sup.) 222 S. W. 436; Rosen v. United States (C. C. A.) 271 F. 651; Sellers v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 299 F. 258, and Stuart v. State, 97 Tex. Cr. R. 652, 263 S. W. 928. Several of these cases, however, and some others, state as a fixed rule the proposition so grudgingly mentioned in Sartorious v. State, supra; that is, that the possession of stolen property, when attended by other suspicious circumstances, will justify a conviction upon a charge of receiving stolen property. These decisions are Goldstein v. People, 82 N. Y. 231; Jenkins v. State, 62 Wis. 49, 21 N. W. 232; State v. Freedman, 3 Pennewill (Del.) 403, 53 A. 356; State v. Malvarosa, supra; Grant v. State, supra; Rosen v. United States, supra; Sellers v. United States, supra, and Stapleton v. Commonwealth (Va.) 124 S. E. 237. A number of adjudications adhere to the rule contended for by respondent, that, as in the case of charges of larceny, the possession of stolen articles, when not satisfactorily explained by the possessor, is sufficient to justify a conviction under a charge of receiving stolen goods. These are People v. Weldon, 111 N. Y. 569, 19 N. E. 279; State v. Guild, 149 Mo. 370, 50 S. W. 909, 73 Am. St. Rep. 395; State v. Miller, 159 Mo. 113, 60 S. W. 67, and Boyd v. State, 150 Ala. 101, 43 So. 204.

[2] If we take as a guide the cognate rule in this state concerning charges of larceny, we should possibly be justified in adopting as principles of our criminal jurisprudence each of the two rules last stated in the preceding paragraph; that is, that either, first, the possession of stolen property, when attended by other suspicious circumstances; or, second, the possession of such property, when not satisfactorily explained, will support a conviction on a charge of receiving stolen property. If we take the rule in California in cases of larceny as a guide, there is apparently no difference between the first and second principles just stated as applying to charges of receiving stolen property, for it has been determined, in larceny cases, that, where there is no explanation of his possession by a possessor, the possession alone will not justify a conviction, but that there must be other incriminating circumstances. People v. Reed, 58 Cal. App. 7, 207 P. 1025. It is to be noted also that where the possessor attempts to explain, but the explanation is unsatisfactory, that is in itself a suspicious circumstance. Without, however, adopting both the rules stated above as first and second, and assuming, but not deciding, that there is a difference between them, we are satisfied that it is a correct principle that the possession of stolen articles, together with suspicious circumstances, will justify the action of a jury in convicting upon a charge of receiving stolen property. From this rule there is but little dissent, and we are in accord with the reasoning of the opinions which in such great number adhere to it.

In making an application in the present case of the principle which we have just stated, and to which we have expressed our determination to assent, there is a circumstance which requires a special consideration. Running through the decided cases on the subject, there is constant mention of the fact that the rule is not to be applied in a given case, unless there is evidence that the property charged to have been feloniously received was stolen by some person other than the individual charged with illicitly receiving it. This is, of course, a proper limitation upon the rule, for, if the person charged with receiving unlawfully is really the thief, the charge of receiving must fall. The two crimes are inconsistent when sought to be fastened upon the same individual, if the charges arise out of the theft of particular property and the felonious receiving of the same property following that theft. Under such a condition, possession of the stolen property, with attending suspicious circumstances, is evidence of larceny, and not evidence upon the charge of receiving stolen goods. This principle inheres in many of the cases cited above to the various propositions stated, and it is evident that it is a just one.

[3] We are to inquire, then, what evidence there was in the present case to show that the car was not stolen by appellant. He himself accounted for his whereabouts on the evening of the theft in such a manner as to demonstrate, if the jury believed him, that he was not the thief. He, in effect, therefore denied that he was the thief. The alibi thus laid by his testimony was directly and positively supported by the oath of four other witnesses. Appellant also gave testimony which cast grave suspicion on one Shattuck as the thief, if, in fact, it were not sufficient to support a verdict against that individual if given upon a trial had under information charging him with the theft. Moreover, Shattuck, who, according to the testimony, was known to several of the witnesses other than appellant, was seen by none of them, nor by appellant, after the day of appellant's arrest, although seen often before. There was also testimony that Shattuck had been sought as a witness at the trial of appellant, but that he could not be found. Again, it is to be remembered that Mrs. Johnson's daughter testified that some person other than appellant placed the coupé in the garage on the night of the theft. We think this evidence was ample to support a finding by the jury that the coupé was stolen by some person other than appellant. In fact, as already observed, the jury acquitted appellant upon the charge of larceny which was contained in the information.

[4] It is plain, from the evidence which we have stated during our discussion of the point that it was not shown that appellant ever received the stolen car, that his acquisition of the possession of it was "recent," within the meaning of that term as it is employed in the cases above cited. In determining whether there was evidence that he received the vehicle with knowledge that it had been stolen, it remains only to detail the suspicious "circumstances" disclosed by the evidence and which were proper to be considered by the jury in connection with the fact of appellant's possession. A part of the evidence touching this subject has been stated already. It was testified, in any view of the evidence, that appellant made his tentative arrangement for the use of the garage within 1¾ hours before the theft of the car and that it was placed in the garage within an hour after the theft. The evidence shows, without dispute, that the coupé was a new one, having been bought by its owner but 10 days before the theft, and having been driven but 223 miles. The owner testified that when it was stolen it was in good condition. The police officer testified that he drove the car from the garage on its own power and that there were then in it 4 or 5 gallons of gasoline. Despite these facts, it appeared without contradiction that the car was secreted in the garage, not once being taken outside the doors, for 6 weeks. The evidence showed, also without dispute, that when the police found the vehicle the license plates and the certificate of registration had been removed from their places on it and that the latter was found under one of the seats. The license plates were never found. The police officer testified that when appellant was arrested he denied ownership of the car before being told that the vehicle bore any relation to his arrest. We think this evidence supported the finding implied in the verdict that appellant received the car with knowledge that it was stolen.

[5] It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to show that appellant received the stolen car either for his own gain or to prevent the owner from again possessing it. This point is concluded by the state of the evidence shown in the discussion of the two questions of which we have above made disposition. There being evidence that appellant received the car with knowledge that it was stolen property and that he secreted it for 6 weeks, the jury was justified in drawing the inference that he received it for his own gain—for the purpose of making it or its proceeds his own if he could—and thus, also, for the purpose of preventing the owner from again possessing it.

[6, 7] The defense of appellant in the trial court was conducted—not, however, by the same counsel who represents him on the appeal—with an amazing degree of timidity, indecision, and lack of skill. We make mention of that state of affairs now, as it appears to some extent in connection with a point about to be considered, but we shall have occasion later to dwell on it more at large. As a prelude to the question now to be discussed, we quote a portion of the record, a police officer being on the witness stand, purposely omitting the name of the counsel for defendant:

"Q. Calling your attention to the People's Exhibit No. 1, being the superior court files No. 15102, charging William—

"Counsel for defendant: Just a moment; I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

"The Court: Well, I don't know; the question is not finished yet, so I cannot possibly determine. Finish the question.

"Mr. Costello: Q. —charging William Rose, Frank Jacobs, and Harold Kirtner with the offense of robbery, dated February 11, 1920?

"Counsel for defendant: At that point, I want to raise the objection, if your honor please.

"The Court: Raise it; the question is not finished, but you can make it, and I will overrule it. Go ahead and make your objection; the question is not finished. Proceed, Mr. Costello.

"Q. —charging the defendant with the offense of robbery; I will ask you now if you were the arresting officer in that case, or the investigating officer? A. Both.

"Q. * * * —is this the same Frank Jacobs that was charged with that offense at that time? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And were you present * * * when this defendant was called for trial? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And were you present when he entered his plea to the charge in this information, charging him with robbery? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And were you present when he entered a plea of grand larceny [sic] to this charge, an offense included in that robbery— * * * A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And this is the same Frank Jacobs that entered his plea to the offense of grand larceny, on June 14, 1920? A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Costello: You may cross-examine.

"Counsel for defendant: I move, may your honor please, that the entire testimony of this witness be stricken, and the jury admonished to pay no attention to same.

"The Court: Motion denied."

What is above set forth was the entire testimony of the witness, except for a preliminary question or two asking for his occupation, and excepting a cross-examination which followed the denial of the motion to strike. It is now insisted that the trial court erred in permitting the testimony to stand after the objection which was interposed and after the motion to strike was made. Appellant's present counsel frankly concedes, as of course he must, that the record on which he seeks to present his contention is not ideal. He voluntarily points out that the objection came too soon; that no objections were made to questions interposed after what were really but preliminary questions had been answered; and that the motion to strike specified no grounds. He seeks to avoid in various ways the dilemma in which he finds himself. He first says that the court treated the objection which was made in such a manner that notice was conveyed that all "objections to such questions would be overruled," and that it would have been useless and therefore it was unnecessary to interpose them. We cannot accede to this view. There was no such notice conveyed by the court's attitude. The only objection which was made was futile for two reasons: It was interposed to an incomplete question and as far as the question had proceeded it was apparently but a preliminary question. In fact, when it was completed it was actually but a preliminary question. In form, also, the only notice conveyed by the court's attitude toward the objection was that it must be overruled because the question was not complete. He said, "The question is not finished yet, so I cannot possibly determine." This was a very proper attitude and the objection should have been overruled for the reason stated, although the court did not overrule it. Appellant insists that, while the motion to strike stated no grounds, the court was sufficiently apprised, by the objection which had been interposed, of the grounds intended. This cannot be so. No objection having been made to any substantive question, the court could not have guessed what point was in the mind of counsel when he objected to a mere preliminary question. In truth, the court could not have imagined, and appellant's counsel probably did not know, what questions of substance would follow the preliminary question which the prosecution was finally allowed to complete. Further, the court was justified in assuming for the time being, when no objections were made to substantive questions, that the objector, having learned the nature of those questions, and making no objection to them, had none to make. Surely there was nothing in the record to apprise the court of the point sought to be presented by the motion to strike the testimony, and such a motion is never good unless it is addressed to evidence which has gone in under objection, unless opportunity to make the objection is absent. People v. Bradley, 23 Cal. App. 44, 136 P. 955. The point which is now pressed is without merit.

[8] The district attorney offered in evidence the information found in the files on the superior court in the action mentioned above, No. 15102, which charged appellant, together with two others, with the crime of robbery. To this offer an objection was made thus:

"I object to its being introduced in evidence in respect to this case."

The objection was overruled and the information was received in evidence. It is contended that the ruling was error. It will be observed that no ground was specified in the objection, but none was necessary if the evidence was inadmissible for any purpose. In one case the record showed only, after stating a question which was put to a witness, that "counsel here objected to the question." The Supreme Court said:

"The defendants claim that the evidence was not admissible for any purpose, and that a statement of the grounds upon which it was objected to would have been superfluous and, was not therefore required. This view is based upon what appears to us to be the proper rule in such cases, and we see no good result to be accomplished by holding parties to a more strict and rigid practice in these matters." Nightingale v. Scannell, 18 Cal. 315.

In a later adjudication an order granting a motion for a nonsuit was upheld upon a ground not mentioned in the motion; this upon the theory that the defect in plaintiff's proof was one which could not have been cured and that therefore it was not necessary to give him the opportunity to supplement his evidence through the making of a specific objection notifying him of the nature of the defect. Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 P. 867. It is to be observed that the opinion in the case last cited did not proceed upon the theory that the order involved was one granting and not one denying a motion for nonsuit. The case was decided solely upon the question arising from the form of the motion. We make specific mention of the two cases noted for the reason that apparently in all adjudications later than Daley v. Russ which cite Nightingale v. Scannell the general objection of immateriality, irrelevancy, and incompetency was made. The latest of these cases appears to be Scott v. Times-Mirror Co., 181 Cal. 345, 184 P. 672, 12 A. L. R. 1007. Under all the decisions, in the matter now under discussion, there seems to be no difference between "I object to the question," and "I object to the question on the ground that it is immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent." The entire reasoning of Nightingale v. Scannell supports that view, and the continual citation of the opinion in that case in the later adjudications would seem to carry the doctrine to the present moment.

It becomes necessary then to determine whether the information in cause numbered 15102 was admissible for any purpose. The information was filed when appellant was a minor, and was therefore subject to the provisions of the Juvenile Court Act. Replying to questions propounded to him by his counsel on his direct examination, appellant testified that in the action in which the information was filed he was charged with receiving stolen property; that he was not found guilty, but that "the attorneys fixed it" and he pleaded guilty; and that he was sentenced to 11 months' imprisonment at the reform school at Ione, he being that near the age of 21. On cross-examination appellant testified that he had been convicted of a felony, referring to his plea of guilty just mentioned, and that the felony was receiving stolen property; that he was not charged with robbery; and that he did not plead guilty of grand larceny as a lesser offense included within the charge of robbery. It was at this juncture that the information was offered, showing that the charge against appellant was robbery.

[9-12] When appellant testified on his direct examination that he had pleaded guilty to a charge of receiving stolen property, and on his cross-examination that the crime to which he had so pleaded was a felony, he stood impeached as a witness, for under the law concerning impeachment the showing of a plea of guilty is beyond doubt equivalent to proof of a conviction. This impeachment having been fixed partially on the direct examination—and the district attorney might have ascertained the whole situation on cross-examination if it had not been brought out on the direct (Code Civ. Proc. § 2051; People v. Chin Mook Sow, 51 Cal. 597; People v. Arlington, 123 Cal. 356, 55 P. 1003)—it was proper for the prosecuting officer to go further. He was entitled to show on the cross-examination the name of the felony of which appellant had been convicted (People v. Fouts, 61 Cal. App. 242, 214 P. 657). Appellant having testified that the conviction was upon a charge of receiving stolen property, it seems plain that on the cross-examination the prosecutor was entitled to show that the conviction—appellant's plea of guilty—was of the crime of grand larceny. The testimony of appellant was not only that he had pleaded guilty of the crime of receiving stolen goods, but was also to the effect that it was with the commission of that crime that he had been charged. It seems to us that, for the purpose of refreshing appellant's recollection, the prosecutor very properly read to him the information in an endeavor to draw from him the fact that he had pleaded guilty of the crime of grand larceny, a crime lesser than and included within the charge made by the information, a charge of robbery. It having been proper to use the information for that purpose—and that was really the manner in which it was "offered"—the very general objection interposed by appellant's counsel at the trial was not good.

[13-16] A reversal is contended for upon the ground of the alleged misconduct of the district attorney during the progress of the trial. In considering the point, it becomes necessary again to refer to the manner in which appellant's defense was mismanaged, as an introduction to the matters concerning which the charge of misconduct is made. The plea of guilty which had carried appellant to Ione for a detention of 11 months' duration was entered in June, 1920, a fact which, as we have observed, was brought out by his counsel on direct examination. This circumstance was not as bad as some of the other items in the mismanagement of the defense, as it might perhaps be justified upon the theory that the same showing would have been made by the prosecution on the cross-examination in any event, and that no harm could therefore come from it. However, in addition to this item, appellant's counsel at the trial brought out from him on direct examination these facts: On July 5, 1917, appellant was arrested on a charge of "suspicion of grand larceny" and was later "released." On September 19, 1917, he was arrested on a charge of grand larceny, with the same result. August 8, 1919, he was arrested again on a charge of grand larceny, but was "turned loose" when his mother produced a bill of sale for the automobile which he was charged with stealing. On February 3, 1920, he was arrested "on suspicion of robbery," but was again "turned loose." On February 26, 1920, he was again arrested "under suspicion of robbery," and was again released. On November 2, the year apparently having been 1920, he was arrested on a charge of robbery, and was again "turned loose." Appellant says in his brief on this appeal that these facts were drawn out for the purpose of convincing the jury that, consistently and continually, he had been persecuted by the police, and that the present action was but a continuation of the oppressive treatment to which he had been subjected. That the effect on the jury was quite the contrary may readily be imagined. On the cross-examination of appellant the district attorney asked him the following questions, which we number for convenience:

(1) "The case being 15102. * * * Shelby Jacobs, Frank Jacobs, Domenick Antone, C. Shipley, and E. L. Lapway were sworn and testified on behalf of the defendant, do you remember that?"

(2) "Now, at the time that those proceedings in the superior court, you were charged with the offense of robbery, and pleaded guilty to grand larceny, along with another young man by the name of Rose and another young fellow by the name of Klackner, isn't that true?"

(3) "Well, you were in on the charge of robbery, with these two defendants?"

(4) "At the time that you pleaded guilty in the superior court, weren't you charged with the offense of robbery, and through Mr. Dominguez you accepted a plea of grand larceny, and the offense, including that, of robbery [sic]?"

(5) "Did you go, in company with two other boys, and steal an automobile on July 5, 1917, which was standing in front of the Los Angeles high school, and take it to Venice and abandon it?"

(6) "Now, since July, 1917, you have been in the courts every year since 1917, haven't you?"

(7) [After reading the information in cause No. 15102] "I am just asking you the simple question, were you not charged with robbery with those two other boys, and that you afterwards pleaded guilty to grand larceny, and went to Ione?"

(8) "You did know those two boys?"

(9) "And you were charged in this information with robbery of the man that is alleged in there."

It is contended that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in propounding these questions. The claim is met, as to questions numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 7, 8, and 9, by what we have said in disposing of the contention that the trial court erred in permitting the district attorney, in the presence of the jury, to read to appellant the information in cause No. 15102, with the possible exception of question 8. All the interrogations mentioned, if we except No. 8, were surely parts of a proper cross-examination. The putting of so many queries along the same line was justified by the fact that appellant persisted to the end in asserting in his answers that the charge against him in the action mentioned was receiving stolen goods and not robbery, and that he had pleaded guilty to the former charge and not to a charge of grand larceny. If we concede that question 8 was not proper cross-examination, it at once appears that the question was not harmful. It having transpired that appellant had pleaded guilty to some charge under the information making complaint jointly against him and the two others mentioned in the pleading, we cannot perceive that he could have been contaminated, or his defense in this action injured, by the mere question whether he knew the others. This is especially true for the reason that there is nothing in the record, aside from the fact that they were charged with crime jointly with him, to show that they were disreputable characters. Question 5 doubtless related to one of the charges against appellant, concerning which he had testified on his direct examination. At any rate it touched upon an alleged occurrence on a date upon which appellant testified that he had been arrested upon a charge of "suspicion of grand larceny," and we cannot assume that the question was unconnected with the matter out of which sprang the arrest. Question 6 should not have been asked, but, upon objection being made, it was immediately withdrawn by the district attorney. Defendant's counsel did not, however, ask that the jury be admonished to disregard the fact that the question had been propounded. If he had made the request, the injurious effect of the question could have been removed by the admonition. As bearing generally upon the charge that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in asking the nine questions, it is to be observed that defendant's counsel sat supinely by and made no objection whatever to any of them except question 6. Not only so, but he asked no admonition concerning any of them. Under all the circumstances incident to the claim of misconduct, we are convinced that it cannot be upheld.

[17, 18] The trial judge refused to instruct the jury:

"That your deliberation must be based upon, and you must take into consideration in arriving at a verdict, all the evidence submitted to you by the prosecution and by the defendant, including documentary evidence that has been introduced as such, and you are to determine whether or not the written or documentary evidence, together with the rest of the testimony tends to prove the allegations of the information."

It is contended that the refusal was error. The giving of the instruction would have done no harm, but we think it was unnecessary. It contained nothing but what every person qualified for jury duty knows. Moreover, the judge told the jury, in an instruction which he gave, that in discharging its duty the sole guide was to be "the evidence introduced in this trial and the law as given you by the court." This language covered the essence of the instruction which was rejected.

[19] The trial judge refused to give the following instruction:

"* * * There has been some evidence introduced in the trial of this cause tending to show that the defendant has been arrested on numerous occasions on suspicion of having committed various offenses, and on one occasion that he pleaded guilty as a juvenile to a felony charge. In this connection you are instructed that in your deliberations on the guilt or innocence of the charges for which he is now on trial, you are to totally disregard such testimony and to confine yourself to just such evidence as has been introduced on behalf of the people and the defendant relative to the crime alleged in the information filed against him."

This proposed instruction was properly refused for the reason that it is misleading in part, if it does not actually contain a misstatement of the law. It was sought by the proposed instruction to have the court tell the jury that its members were not to consider appellant's plea of guilty to the felony charge in deliberating upon the issue of his guilt or innocence. It is practically certain that this language would have been understood by the jury to mean that the plea of guilty was not to be considered for any purpose. In this respect then it was misleading. As to the possibility that the proposed instruction contained an erroneous statement of the law, this is to be said: The plea of guilty was proper to be considered as an impeachment of appellant as a witness. Was not this matter of his impeachment a factor in the determination of the ultimate question as to whether he was guilty or innocent? At any rate, the instruction was properly refused on the ground that it was misleading in the respect mentioned.

Judgment and order affirmed.

On Appellant's Petition for Rehearing.

WORKS, J. Appellant petitions for a rehearing of this cause. The principal ground upon which the request is based is this: It is said that the evidence which we have recited as supporting the verdict of guilty on the second count would as well have sustained a conviction on the first count, and that therefore there could properly have been a conviction on neither count. This sounds startling, but it is indubitably the ground which is taken in the petition. Not only so, but authorities are cited which it is insisted uphold the contention. In order that there may be no misapprehension as to the exact point made by appellant, we append two sentences from the petition, occurring immediately preceding the citation of authority, with his italics:

"The true rule is that, where circumstantial evidence is relied upon for a conviction of any crime, the evidence must, not only be consistent with the guilt of the defendant of that specific offense, but absolutely inconsistent with any other rational hypothesis. Where the evidence is equally consistent with the defendant's having committed either one of two crimes the proof does not measure up to the standard which the law has fixed."

In support of his contention, appellant first cites People v. Fagan, 98 Cal. 230, 33 P. 60. That case in no way sustains his argument. The defendant there was charged with grand larceny alone and the court held that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict of guilty which was rendered against him. In connection with the determination of that point, the only point discussed by the court, it was remarked that perhaps the evidence would have sustained a charge of receiving stolen goods. The only other California cases which are cited are People v. Dick, 32 Cal. 213; People v. Ward, 105 Cal. 652, 39 P. 33; People v. Smith, 106 Cal. 73, 39 P. 40; and People v. Eagan, 116 Cal. 287, 48 P. 120. We are unable to perceive that any of these decisions supports the contention which appellant makes. Leaving now the decisions in this state, we shall refer to but one authority relied upon, as an examination of its text will enable us to ascertain the true rule upon the question now under scrutiny. Appellant quotes a part of the text under rule 4, in chapter 6, of Wills on Circumstantial Evidence. The rule itself is thus stated, italics ours:

"In order to justify the inference of guilt, the inculpatory facts must be incompatible with the innocence of the accused, and incapable of explanation upon any other reasonable hypothesis than that of his guilt."

In a portion of the text set forth under the statement of the rule, and within a quotation therefrom upon which appellant relies, occurs the following, italics again ours:

"It is not enough * * * that a particular hypothesis will explain all the phenomena. Nothing must be inferred merely because, if true, it would account for the facts; and, if the circumstances are equally capable of solution upon any other reasonable hypothesis, it is manifest that their true moral cause is not exclusively ascertained, but remains in uncertainty, and they must therefore be discarded as conclusive presumptions of guilt. Every other reasonable supposition by which the facts may be explained consistently with the hypothesis of innocence must therefore be vigorously examined and successively eliminated; and only when no other supposition will reasonably account for all the conditions of the case can the conclusion of guilt be legitimately adopted."

We have italicized the word "innocence" in these two quotations for the purpose of laying a foundation upon which to expose the difference between appellant's position and the rule so succinctly stated and illustrated by Justice Wills. Before we proceed thus to lay bare the fallacy in appellant's argument, let us state his attitude in the extreme to which it is logically to be carried. Appellant says this: If an individual is charged with two inconsistent crimes and the evidence at his trial is undisputed, and would demand a verdict of guilty of either offense if he were on trial for the commission of either alone, he could not, upon a trial under the dual charge, be convicted of either, because of the rational hypothesis that he may be guilty of the other; that is, although he is a manifest lawbreaker, the jury may not make choice as to his guilt—that is, again, although the mystery as to which crime he has actually committed is not susceptible of positive and absolute solution under the evidence he must go scot free. These sentences, placed beside the language of the text-book, will indicate the difference between the argument of appellant and the rule of Justice Wills. The text-writer deals with the hypothesis of innocence of a particular crime, as opposed to the hypothesis of guilt in the matter of the same crime. Appellant deals with the hypothesis of guilt, upon a charge of the commission of one crime, as opposed to a like hypothesis, upon a charge of the commission of a second and different crime. Although manifestly guilty of a crime, under evidence which would without cavil, and equally, support a verdict of guilt upon each of two charges like those here made, appellant contends that a verdict of innocence under each charge is the only possible result. This result seems not to be possible, and it is certainly not directly determined to be possible by any authority presented to us. Nor do we think appellant has brought himself within the principle of any authority cited by him. We have ourselves not located authority bearing specifically upon the question.

[20] In what we have said in the preceding paragraph, we have not forgotten that the jury in a criminal case may not convict, unless its members be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant is guilty of the specific offense charged. The extreme of appellant's position, however, as above stated, allows no reasonable doubt to the jury when considering each charge which is made, entirely apart from the other. When charge 1 is viewed alone, the evidence positively demands a conviction. When charge 2 is viewed alone, the same result is unavoidable. Does this aspect of the question satisfy the law as to reasonable doubt, or does it not? We believe it does. It is difficult to perceive, where the evidence in a criminal case positively demands a conviction under one or the other of two inconsistent charges, that an acquittal must result under each merely because the evidence, in theory, would equally justify a verdict of guilt under either. This would appear to be a perversion of the law as to reasonable doubt.

If it be conceded for the sake of argument that the authorities cited by appellant, as bearing upon the question just discussed, are in point and do support the theory advanced by him, it would seem that their application must be limited to cases in which the evidence would equally support a conviction on either of the two charges made. In fact, the entire argument of the question by appellant seems to proceed upon that theory. Here, however, the jury was justified, so far as we may ascertain from the record, in taking the view that the evidence was not of equal weight as applied to the two charges. Appellant gave testimony which, if believed, showed that he did not actually participate in driving the car away from the place at which it was parked on the street. In this alibi he was directly supported by the testimony of four other witnesses. The jury may well have credited this apparently formidable array of evidence. If the trial body did accord credit to the testimony laying the alibi, there was left on the charge of larceny only the question whether appellant aided and abetted the actual commission of the theft and was thereby a principal. It is upon a comparison of this possibility with the possibility of guilt upon the charge of receiving stolen goods that the jury might justly have resolved the evidence toward a conviction upon the latter charge. If appellant and a confederate—he who actually drove the car away from its parking place in the street—were together guilty of the theft, the jury might reasonably have inferred that both would have shown a solicitude as to the safety of the car while it was stored in the garage. No such anxiety was shown, however, by any other person than appellant, and the attention he paid to the vehicle during the 6 weeks of its occupancy of the garage was according to some of the testimony, quite marked. It is true that some of the evidence was to the effect that another person sometimes came to Mrs. Johnson's place with him, but it was not shown who this person was, nor, in fact, whether it was always the same person, nor that he paid any attention to the car when he came. In truth, there was nothing in the record to indicate that the person who upon each occasion accompanied appellant on his trips to the place was more than a casual and volunteer visitor. There was some testimony that one Shattuck was the person who stole the car, but there was no evidence that he ever appeared at the Johnson place after the car was stored there, or that he displayed the least solicitude concerning its safety. The jury might justly have reasoned that he would have been anxious as to the car, along with appellant, if they were both guilty of the theft. The jury might justly therefore have concluded that appellant was not an aider and abetter; that he was guilty of receiving stolen goods; and that he was not guilty of grand larceny. See People v. Crane, 34 Cal. App. 599, 168 P. 377.

In his petition for rehearing, appellant persistently rings the changes upon the fact that, in reciting in our original opinion the evidence upholding the verdict of guilt upon the charge of receiving stolen property, we referred to testimony that appellant arranged for the use of the Johnson garage before the car was stolen. This inadvertence, if we admit without deciding that it was one, does not affect the result arrived at in the opinion, nor does it affect anything we have said in the present opinion upon the petition for rehearing.

Other points are made by petitioner, but they do not require a specific consideration.

Rehearing denied.

STATE COMPENSATION INS. FUND et al. v. SCAMELL et al. (Civ. 5120.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊜705(10)—Constant lookout for automobiles behind unnecessary.

One using a street traveled by automobiles, in absence of warning, is not required to constantly keep sharp lookout behind for approaching machines.

2. Municipal corporations ⊜706(7)—Street sweeper not contributorily negligent as matter of law in failing to keep lookout for automobiles.

Street sweeper, engaged in his duties, and struck without having heard any warning of approach of automobile, held not contributorily negligent as matter of law in failing to keep constant lookout for approaching cars.

3. Municipal corporations ⊜706(7)—Care required of street sweeper question of fact.

Due care required of a street sweeper, engaged in performance of his duties, cannot be determined by rules applicable to pedestrians generally, but is a question of fact to be determined from all facts and circumstances surrounding the case.

4. Statutes ⊜121(1)—Motor Vehicle Act, creating liability on parent signing child's application for drivers' license, not unconstitutional.

Motor Vehicle Act, § 24, imposing liability upon a parent who has signed application of child for automobile operators' license, for injuries caused by that child, held not unconstitutional.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Ross Campbell, Judge.

Action by the State Compensation Insurance Fund and another against J. W. Scamell and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, Leo A. Sullivan, of Oakland (A. W. Hollingsworth, of Santa Rosa, of counsel), for appellants.

F. J. Creede, of San Francisco, for respondent State Compensation Ins. Fund.

R. M. Barrett and C. W. Anderson, both of Santa Rosa, for respondent McNulty.

TYLER, P. J. Action to recover the sum of $10,000 as damages for personal injuries alleged to have been suffered by plaintiff on account of having been run down by an automobile driven by the defendant William Wilson Scamell, a minor son of J. W. Scamell. Plaintiff McNulty was employed as a street sweeper by the city of Santa Rosa at the time of the accident in question, and the state compensation insurance fund, having paid compensation as the insurance carrier of the city, it is here joined as plaintiff.

Defendant J. W. Scamell was made a party defendant by reason of a statutory liability incurred by signing the application of his minor son, William Wilson Scamell, for an operator's license, under the terms of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1919, p. 223).

The complaint alleged negligence on the part of the defendant William Wilson Scamell as the proximate cause of the injury. Defendants, answering, denied generally the allegations of the complaint, and in addition set up the affirmative defense of contributory negligence. The cause was first tried before a jury, and resulted in a disagreement. Thereafter it again came on for trial before the court sitting without a jury, and by stipulation it was submitted upon the testimony had upon the first trial, together with certain additional testimony. The court entered findings and judgment in favor of plaintiffs, awarding damages in the sum of $2,000, from which judgment defendants have appealed.

They contend that the findings are not supported by the evidence, and that the judgment is not supported by the findings, and in connection with the latter claim the constitutionality of section 24 of the Motor Vehicle Act, imposing a liability upon a parent for the tortious act of his minor child, is attacked.

From the evidence it appears that on July 29, 1921, at about the hour of 11:30 p. m., plaintiff McNulty, while performing duties growing out of and incidental to his employment as a street sweeper, was walking on Fourth street in the city of Petaluma in an easterly direction, shoving a cart used in connection with his work in front of him. Fourth street runs in an easterly and westerly direction. The portion of the street where the accident occurred is approximately 48 feet between the curbs. An electric car line follows the center of the street, and is of standard gauge; the rails being 4⅞ feet apart. The distance, therefore, from the curb line to the nearest rail on each side of the track is about 22 feet. The street is lighted by street lamps suspended in pairs from the trolley poles on either side of the street. In the block where the accident occurred were four poles on each side of the thoroughfare, from each of which was suspended what was described by a witness to be two 100 candle power electric lights. On the evening in question they were lit, and illuminated the street to such an extent that objects were visible for a considerable distance.

At the time and place mentioned defendant William Wilson Scamell was operating and driving an automobile, the property of defendant J. W. Scamell, along the line of Fourth street in an easterly direction and on the southerly side of the street. Accompanying him was one Stewart, a boy friend. Just prior to the accident they had picked up two strange girls, one of whom occupied the front seat with young Scamell, the other the rear one with Stewart. The party then proceeded up Fourth street at a speed variously estimated at from 15 to 20 miles an hour. On approaching the intersection of Davis with Fourth street, Scamell, according to his testimony, blew his horn, although he saw no one in the path of the machine. Another car was approaching on the northerly side of Fourth street some 30 or 40 feet distant, which Scamell testified he did not see. At this time McNulty was performing his duties in company with one Seegelken. They had commenced work at the westerly end of Fourth street, and Seegelken was sweeping north of the car tracks while McNulty was sweeping south. As McNulty worked he kept his street sweeper's cart about 6½ feet from the gutter, following a painted line which ran parallel to the curb, marking a space within which automobiles might park. At this moment he was struck from the rear by defendant's automobile and rendered unconscious. Just before the impact he had pushed his cart right into the gutter. The injuries which plaintiff suffered consisted of the crushing of his left hand, the tearing of the flesh of his left arm, the throwing of his left knee out of joint, and the cutting of the left ear, which was partially torn from his head. He also suffered severe abrasions of the scalp, the bruising of both legs, and injuries to his neck, spine, shoulder, and arms. Some of the injuries are permanent in their nature. Prior to being run down McNulty had heard no sound from a horn, nor had he seen anything that might indicate to him that a car was approaching. After striking plaintiff, Scamell, so he testified, thought he had run over a tin can. He "stepped on the gas," and drove down Washington street one block, and the two girls left the car. He was followed by a witness to the accident, and, when attempting to turn his automobile around on the street last mentioned, was arrested and placed in custody. At the jail the statements of Scamell and his companion were taken by the district attorney, and defendant Scamell admitted that he knew he had hit something, but got all excited, and "stepped on the gas."

The driver of the car who had been approaching defendant's machine just prior to the accident observed McNulty at work on the south side of the car track at a distance of some 200 feet away. As he proceeded onward his attention was attracted to the collision by the sound of a crash, whereupon he looked around and saw the Scamell car 25 or 30 feet away, and he also saw McNulty's body being hurled through the air toward the curb, and the cart used by him in connection with his work being thrown toward the car tracks.

Another witness testified that he had heard the crash while he was some 400 feet away and around a corner.

The trial court found that the collision and the resulting injuries to plaintiff was caused solely and entirely by reason of the carelessness, want of care, and lack of due caution on the part of defendant William Wilson Scamell. It further found that the accident was not caused through any negligence or fault on the part of the plaintiff McNulty.

In support of their contention that these findings are not supported by the evidence, the appellants claim the evidence shows as a matter of law that the contributory negligence of the plaintiff was the proximate cause of the injury.

Respondents on the other hand claim that the evidence shows that defendant did not sound his horn or in any manner indicate his presence as he approached McNulty; that he was driving far over on the right-hand side of the street; and that the obvious reason why he did not see plaintiff in the glare of his headlights and by the lights of the street immediately overhead was that he was not looking in the direction in which he was traveling, and that there was a clear space to his left between himself and the center line of the street within which the Scamell car could have passed in safety.

[1, 2] At the trial plaintiff testified that at times during the course of his employment he looked for the approach of automobiles, but that he could not do so on all occasions and properly perform his duties, and that he had not done so at the time he received his injuries. Appellant claims that this omission on plaintiff's part constituted contributory negligence as a matter of law, which prevents a recovery. Plaintiff testified, however, that he had heard no horn sounded or other warning given of the approach of the car, and at the time he was struck he was bending over, putting a pile of dirt in a sack. It also appeared that plaintiff was working near the curb of the street and adjacent to the space reserved to the parking of cars, and that there was ample room for defendant's car to pass without colliding with plaintiff had he been exercising the care required of him. One using a street traveled by automobile, in the absence of warning, is not required to constantly keep a sharp lookout from behind to see whether a machine is approaching (Sheldon v. James, 175 Cal. 474, 166 P. 8, 2 A. L. R. 1493; Devecchio v. Ricketts [Cal. App.] 266 P. 11; Deputy v. Kimmell, 73 W. Va. 595, 80 S. E. 919, 51 L. R. A. [N. S.] 976, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 656, 696), and his failure so to do does not constitute negligence as a matter of law (3 Cal. Jur. 884; Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 143 P. 743; Berry on Automobiles [3d Ed.] § 297).

Much less so is a laborer whose duties require him to be in the street in the performance of his occupation. Pedestrians are not continuously in the street, and their attention is devoted to a safe passage, while the attention of a street laborer must be to a considerable extent devoted to his task. There can be and there is no duty imposed on a workman to be constantly on the lookout for motor vehicles; on the contrary, it is the duty of drivers of vehicles to observe the street laborers and to avoid contact with them. It is not negligence as a matter of law for a workman to keep his mind on his work or to fail to look and listen for approaching vehicles. He may properly assume that the automobilist will not be guilty of negligence in running him down without warning (King v. Green, 7 Cal. App. 473, 94 P. 777), and especially is this true where he remains within a space established for the parking of cars (Medlin v. Spazier, 23 Cal. App. 242, 137 P. 1078).

One so employed may also assume that a driver will give a signal or warning so that an accident may be avoided. Regan v. Los Angeles Ice Storage Co., 46 Cal. App. 513, 189 P. 474.

A man who is engaged in work upon the streets cannot, if he performs his duty, spend a large part, if not all, of his time looking for the approach of vehicles. In most streets, if he did so, he would accomplish little or nothing.

[3] We do not wish to be understood as holding that one so engaged is not bound to use ordinary care, but his rights cannot be determined by the same rules applicable to pedestrians generally. His care or want of care is a fact to be determined from a different standpoint. Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 55 P. 908; King v. Green, 7 Cal. App. 473, 94 P. 777.

The question of negligence under such circumstances is one for the jury or trial court. Berry on Automobiles (3d Ed.) 465; Blackwell v. Renwick, 21 Cal. App. 131, 131 P. 94. In King v. Green, just cited, it appeared that the plaintiff was engaged in oiling street car tracks; that he was facing in the direction from which a car or vehicle obeying the law of the road would approach; that he was walking backward while at work; that he heard no warning; that defendant's automobile approached from behind and injured him, and it was held that the jury was justified in finding for the plaintiff.

So, also, in Cecola v. Cigar Co., 253 Pa. 639, 98 A. 775, the evidence showed that plaintiff was struck by defendant's automobile while he was engaged in picking up a paving brick. There was also evidence to show that the driver of the automobile had given no warning of his approach, and it was there held that the question of plaintiff's negligence was one for the jury, and a judgment in plaintiff's favor was affirmed.

Again, in Latham v. Harvey, 203 Mo. App. 363, 218 S. W. 401, it appeared in evidence that plaintiff, a street sweeper, was on the street performing his duties with his back turned to the west and in full view of the driver of an approaching automobile coming from that direction, but defendant, nevertheless, ran the laborer down, and injured him, and it was held that the case was a proper one to be submitted to the jury. See, also, Burger v. Taxicab Motor Co., 66 Wash. 676, 120 P. 519; Cloonan v. Brooklyn Heights Ry. Co., 87 Misc. Rep. 177, 149 N. Y. S. 481; Berry on Automobiles (3d Ed.) 468.

The mere fact, therefore, that plaintiff did not look behind him for the approach of automobiles at the moment he was struck, but was engaged in his employment, does not constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law, but the question as to whether he has exercised the care enjoined upon him is a question of fact to be determined from all the facts and circumstances surrounding the accident.

As above indicated, it here appears that plaintiff, at the time of the injury complained of, was where he had a legal right to be. He was attending to his work, and was under no legal compulsion to keep constantly looking behind to ascertain if he was likely to be run down. No warning or signal was given, or at least he heard none, nor did certain other witnesses, of the approach of the car. The testimony also shows that he was working near the curb adjacent to the space reserved for the parking of cars, and there was more than ample room for the driver to have passed him without danger of collision. These were facts for the trial court to consider in determining the question of negligence, and its finding cannot here be disturbed.

[4] Appellants' attack upon the constitutionality of that portion of the Motor Vehicle Act creating liability upon a parent for the reason that it is not covered by the title of the act is disposed of contrary to appellants' contention in Buelke v. Levenstadt, 190 Cal. 684, 214 P. 42.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

RUDY et al. v. SLOTWINSKY. (Civ. 5114.)

1. Judgment ⊂⊃444—Judgment, obtained by false allegations, not set aside.

Equity will not relieve against a judgment obtained by false allegations.

2. Pleading ⊂⊃221 — Notice of right to plead over, after demurrer overruled, held sufficient.

Service of notice of overruling a demurrer and granting leave to answer, on one whose office adjoined that of plaintiff's attorneys and who, though not authorized to accept service, had done so many times, held sufficient to satisfy Code Civ. Proc. § 1011.

3. Judgment ⊂⊃443(2)—Remarks of counsel, that action would be dropped, held not to constitute fraud.

Statement by counsel to opposing counsel, indicating that case would be abandoned, held not sufficient to warrant counsel in ignoring further proceedings, so as to constitute a fraud on party against whom judgment was obtained.

4. Judgment ⊂⊃138(2)—Judgment by default, through neglect of party, not set aside, though unwarranted relief was granted.

Judgment by default obtained against a party by his own neglect will not be set aside, though adversary obtained relief to which he may not have been entitled.

5. Judgment ⊂⊃445—No relief against judgment based on matters tried or put in issue.

Equitable relief will not be granted against a judgment, founded on matters tried or put in issue, however unjust the judgment may be, such matters being res judicata.

6. Judgment ⊂⊃407(1)—Statutory method of setting aside judgment not exclusive, where facts justify aid of equity.

Relief provided for in section 473, Code Civ. Proc. for setting aside of a judgment is not exclusive, but where facts justify it, relief may be had in equity, if party exercises due diligence.

7. Judgment ⊂⊃456(1)—Failure to exercise due diligence held to bar suit to set aside judgment.

A delay of over two years after default and one year after judgment, before party, against whom judgment was taken, took any action, held not to constitute due diligence necessary to invoke aid of equity in setting aside judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by R. L. Rudy and another against M. F. A. Slotwinsky to enjoin enforcement of a judgment. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Knight, Justice pro tem., not participating.

Carl W. Mueller, of San Francisco, for appellant.

H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, and J. W. Clarke, of Oakland, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs granting a permanent injunction against defendant from proceeding to enforce a certain judgment and setting aside and canceling the same.

The complaint alleges that defendant herein on April 17, 1920, commenced an action against the above-named plaintiffs, R. L. Rudy and E. D. Hopper and one Garbini, as directors and incorporators of Chateau Bellevue Vineyard Company, a defunct corporation, and that on May 21, 1920, Rudy and Hopper demurred to the complaint, which demurrer was sustained; that an amended complaint was filed on the 20th day of August, 1920, to which Rudy and Hopper again demurred and this demurrer was, on September 10, 1920, overruled with 10 days' leave to answer.

Proceeding, the complaint then alleges that on September 14, 1920, plaintiff Slotwinsky in that action, by and through his attorney, attempted to serve notice of the overruling of the demurrer upon Clark & Clark, attorneys for said defendants Rudy and Hopper.

In this connection it is alleged, in substance, that the notice of the overruling of the demurrer was served on one Ellison, who occupied an adjoining office to Clark & Clark, but who was in no manner connected with the business of said attorneys and not authorized to receipt for or give admission of service of any legal papers or documents, but notwithstanding this fact said Ellison signed an admission of service of the notice of the overruling of the demurrer as follows: "J. W. Clark, per E. Ellison." That Ellison, so it is alleged, at no time informed Clark & Clark of the fact that he had signed an admission of such service.

It is then alleged that at the time of the filing of the demurrer by Hopper and Rudy, the attorney for plaintiff, Slotwinsky, had remarked to J. W. Clark, one of the attorneys for the defendants, that he supposed he would have to collect from the estate of one F. D. Burr, deceased, he being the party with whom Slotwinsky had had the transaction which was the subject-matter of the litigation. That due to this remark Clark & Clark concluded that the action would be discontinued as to their clients, and, not having heard any more concerning the demurrer which they had interposed, they considered the case closed. Nothing further was heard of the matter, so it is alleged, by either Hopper or Rudy or their attorneys Clark & Clark until about 2½ years thereafter and on the 6th day of March, 1923, when a letter was addressed by one Carl W. Mueller, acting attorney for Slotwinsky (his original attorney having been killed September 28, 1921), to Hopper informing him that his real estate was about to be sold under writ of execution upon a judgment secured in the action referred to.

The complaint in the original action is then set forth in full. It appears therefrom that it was one based upon a claim of liability against the directors of Chateau Bellevue Vineyard Company, under section 309 of the Civil Code, it being alleged in said action that the directors of that corporation had incurred an indebtedness in the sum of $1,200 at a time when the total amount of the subscribed capital stock of the corporation did not exceed the sum of $60, thus making them individually liable for debts created beyond the subscribed capital stock. Proceeding, the complaint in the instant case charges that the complaint in the original action, in which the judgment was procured and here sought to be set aside, was predicated on the false and fraudulent misstatement of the total amount of the subscribed capital stock of the corporation, as the statement that the same did not "exceed the sum of sixty dollars" was falsely and fraudulently made with the object and intent of unjustly obtaining a judgment against defendants in said action.

Further allegations are to the effect that on the 28th day of April, 1922, judgment was rendered by default against Rudy and Hopper for the sum of $1,200, interest and costs of suit, which judgment was entered on April 29, 1922.

Plaintiffs then allege that had they knowledge of the entry of their default, or had they knowledge of the trial, they would have taken steps in said case to have protected their rights; that they would have proved to the court upon the hearing of the case, that it was not true no more than $60 of the capital stock of the corporation had been subscribed and thus have avoided liability.

The complaint concludes with a prayer for a cancellation of the judgment. To this complaint, defendant filed a demurrer alleging that it did not state facts constituting a cause of action, nor a cause for equitable relief, nor did it state facts sufficient to justify the issuance of a restraining order or injunction. The demurrer was overruled.

Defendant answering alleged in effect that the notice of the overruling of the demurrer was legally served. It also denied that any statements had been made to the attorneys in the original action which would justify them in concluding that the action would not be further prosecuted, and it also denied that the statement contained in the original complaint concerning the amount of the subscribed capital stock of the corporation was false. As an additional defense, it set forth certain facts charging that defendants, as directors of the corporation named, had fraudulently obtained a certain tract of land of the value of $1,200 in exchange for a note executed by the corporation, which was worthless.

Laches on the part of defendants was also pleaded. The trial court found, among other facts, that the attorneys for defendants in the original action had relied upon statements made by the attorney for the plaintiff that the case would not be further prosecuted, and also that the attorneys for the defendant had never been properly notified of the overruling of their demurrer. It also found that the complaint in the action in which the judgment was obtained had been predicated upon a false statement concerning the total amount of the subscribed capital stock of the corporation, and that plaintiff herein had unjustly recovered the judgment sought to be set aside, and the relief prayed for was granted. In support of the judgment, respondents claim that the facts as found by the court constitute extrinsic fraud justifying the setting aside of the judgment.

[1] We cannot subscribe to this contention. The mere fact that defendant herein may have obtained the judgment here sought to be set aside upon allegations that may have been untrue, did not authorize the setting aside of the judgment. Equity will not relieve by injunction against a fraudulent judgment, unless the fraud in obtaining it is extrinsic to the merits. It will grant no relief, even in cases where a judgment is obtained through perjured testimony. Steen v. March, 132 Cal. 616, 64 P. 994; Eisenmayer v. Thompson, 186 Cal. 538, 199 P. 798; Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 135, 25 P. 970, 27 P. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159; Borland v. Thornton, 12 Cal. 440.

This rule, however, seems to be conceded by respondents' counsel, as they state that the evidence upon the subject is important only as showing that their clients possessed equities upon the merits in the original action, which it was necessary for them to do in making an application to set aside the default judgment.

The extrinsic fraud relied upon therefore consists in the alleged remarks of the attorney for defendant in the original action indicating that the case would be abandoned, and in the taking of the default without giving a legal notice of the overruling of the demurrer, where time had been given to answer, and in proceeding to trial and having a judgment entered when the attorney was kept in ignorance of the proceedings.

[2, 3] Assuming that these facts, if true, would constitute extrinsic fraud, we do not think the evidence upon the subject justifies the conclusion that defendants were prevented from fully presenting their claims in the original suit by reason thereof. The original judgment recites that notice of the overruling of the demurrer was given. Ellison, who signed the admission of service on the notice, testified in the instant case that the admission was in his handwriting. He further testified that he had offices together with Clark, and that it was necessary to go through his office to enter Clark's office; that his name was on the door with the name of Clark & Clark, and that he was in the habit of and had signed hundreds of different papers for Clark. Clark himself testified that he had at times done so. Assuming that Ellison never gave the copy of the notice to Clark, nevertheless the service under these circumstances was sufficient to satisfy the requirements of section 1011, Code of Civil Procedure. Nor was there any evidence to support the finding that the attorneys for defendants in the original action (plaintiffs herein) were prejudiced or kept away from the trial by anything the former attorney had said, giving such remarks their full force and effect. All that is proved to have been said is that plaintiffs' attorney, during a discussion in relation to Burr's property, stated to Clark that "he was not concerned much with the other defendants, because he did not think he had a case against them of any particular merits." This statement did not justify Clark in concluding that the case would be discontinued against his clients, nor warrant him in completely ignoring any further progress of the proceedings.

[4, 5] Where a judgment by default is obtained against a party through his own neglect, it constitutes no ground for equitable intervention that his adversary obtained relief to which he may not have been entitled. Equity will not entertain a bill for relief against a judgment founded on any matters which were tried and determined in the action at law, or which were there so put in issue that they might have been adjudicated, however unjust the judgment may appear to be. Such matters have become res judicata. This rule assumes that there has been a trial in which the respective parties have had an opportunity fully to present their claims. 34 Corpus Juris, 466.

[6, 7] There must be some end to litigation. Here plaintiffs had appeared in the action through their attorneys. The exercise of the slightest diligence on their part would have acquainted them with the fact that a judgment had been rendered against them. It was a matter of public record. They could have proceeded under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, where relief might have been granted them. They did not do so, but waited over two years and three months after their default had been entered on November 29, 1920, and about a year after the judgment had been rendered on April 28, 1922, before taking any steps whatsoever. While it is true that one seeking to set aside a judgment is not limited to the relief provided for by section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, but may, where the facts justify it, invoke the aid of a court of equity, he must, in doing so, exercise due diligence. The instant case in our opinion, however, does not present such a situation. Here, as stated, the default was a matter of public record, open to inspection at all times to the plaintiffs and their attorneys. This fact should have put them upon inquiry which would have led to the discovery of the alleged fraud in the procurement of the judgment. The contention that they had a right to rely upon a service of a notice of the overruling of the demurrer can avail them nothing, when it is considered that the judgment sought to be set aside recites that such a notice was served and the evidence in the instant case shows that it was in fact made. Nor did the remarks of plaintiffs' former counsel justify them in practically abandoning their case. The mere expression of an opinion, as to the merits of a case by an attorney, could not possibly warrant opposing counsel in believing that no further action would be taken, and it does not constitute fraud practiced upon a party seeking relief against a judgment which prevented him from presenting his case to the court. Solemn judgments cannot be set aside upon such a showing.

The judgment is reversed.

RENOWDEN v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (Civ. 4505.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 25, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 24, 1925.)

1. Negligence ⟸141(11) — Injured automobile passenger held entitled to instruction on defenses of joint enterprise and of agency between driver and passenger.

In action for injuries to passenger in an automobile hit by train, where there was no proof that he was engaged in joint enterprise with driver, nor that he had made driver his agent, plaintiff was entitled to instruction that, where evidence does not support allegations of joint enterprise or of agency, jury must disregard such defenses, particularly where instructions had been given which might lead jury to believe that such defenses were part of case submitted for decision.

2. Negligence ⟸141(11)—Injured automobile passenger held entitled to instruction negligence of driver could not be imputed to him.

In action for injuries to passenger in an automobile struck by train, where court instructed that if driver was guilty of contributory negligence plaintiff could not recover, plaintiff was entitled to instruction that driver's negligence could not be imputed to plaintiff, and refusal to so instruct constituted reversible error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by Thomas Renowden against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John C. Miles and B. J. Wellman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and W. R. Millar, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover damages for personal injuries which the plaintiff claims to have received as the result of negligence of the defendant in the operation of a train of freight cars at a street crossing. The case was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment. The principal errors assigned relate in part to the refusal of instructions requested by the plaintiff, and in part to instructions given by the court to the jury.

It is alleged in the complaint that on the 18th day of January, 1922, the defendant was engaged in the switching of freight cars in a southerly direction upon its tracks, across a public street; that at that time the plaintiff was riding in the automobile of one Ross L. Putnam in an easterly direction along said street; that the plaintiff was so riding solely as the guest of Putnam without exercising any control over the driving of the automobile by Putnam. The complaint charges that the defendant negligently failed to maintain any gates, wigwag, or flagman at said crossing; that while said automobile was crossing said railroad track the defendant carelessly and negligently backed a train of freight cars in a southerly direction at a high and dangerous rate of speed, to wit, 20 miles an hour, without sounding any whistle or other warning of its approach, and without having any flagman upon the rear end of the train; that by reason thereof the train was driven against said automobile, thereby causing the plaintiff to suffer the injuries described in his complaint.

The answer denied the alleged negligent conduct of defendant, and alleged negligence upon the part of the plaintiff. The answer further alleged that, at the time and place of said accident, the plaintiff was engaged in a joint and common enterprise and undertaking with each and every other occupant of said automobile, including the driver thereof, and that riding and traveling in said automobile was a part thereof; that neither of the occupants of the automobile, nor the driver, nor the plaintiff, exercised ordinary care, caution, or prudence in the premises, and that the collision, injury, and damage, if any, sustained by the plaintiff were directly and proximately contributed to by the fault, carelessness, and negligence of the plaintiff and of each and every occupant of said automobile in and about said joint and common enterprise and undertaking, and by the failure of them and each of them to exercise ordinary care, caution or prudence in the premises. The answer further alleged that the plaintiff at and immediately prior to the said accident carelessly and negligently rode and traveled in said automobile while the same was, to his knowledge, being carelessly and negligently managed and operated by the driver thereof; that said plaintiff then and there constituted and made the driver of said automobile his agent for the purpose of driving same and of conveying said plaintiff therein; and that said automobile was then and there, to the knowledge of plaintiff and by his agent in the premises, so negligently and carelessly operated as to bring same into collision with said train of defendant, thereby directly and proximately contributing to the said accident and the injury and damage, if any, by plaintiff sustained.

Under points 1 and 2, appellant claims that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that the negligence, if any, of the driver of the automobile could not be imputed to the plaintiff, and in refusing certain instructions requested by the plaintiff on the question of agency and of what constituted a joint enterprise.

[1] It is stated by counsel for appellant, and appears to be conceded, that there was an entire absence of proof either that the plaintiff while riding in said automobile was engaged in a joint enterprise with the driver, or with any of the occupants of the car, or that the plaintiff constituted the driver Putnam his agent in the driving of the car. On this condition of the evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to have the jury instructed that in the absence of any evidence tending to support the allegations of the answer relating to the alleged agency or the alleged joint enterprise, the jury must disregard those defenses.

This error might not be prejudicial, if there had been no instructions given which would probably lead the jury to assume that these alleged defenses were a part of the case submitted for decision. But there was a series of instructions given at the request of the defendant, which, however correct they may be in themselves as statements of law (and as to this we express no opinion), might easily have been applied by the jury in such manner as to hold the plaintiff responsible for negligence of the driver of the automobile, in the absence of any instruction that negligence of the driver could not be imputed to the plaintiff. This is well illustrated by certain instructions to which we will give the numbers found in appellant's brief. In the transcript the instructions have no numbers. We further assume that these numbered instructions were given at the request of the defendant. In the transcript each of them is marked (D). The use of the letters (P) and (D) as found in the transcript constitutes, with one exception, the only indication of the party by whom instructions were requested. It is not denied by respondent that those letters were used for that purpose.

Instruction 19: "It was the duty of the driver of the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding to approach said defendant's tracks, on which the car was running, in such manner that he could control the movements of the automobile in case the crossing of the tracks should appear dangerous, and to look with ordinary care at the last moment before going upon the tracks to ascertain if there was any danger approaching. It was his duty to look with ordinary care at the last moment before going upon the tracks, or so close thereto as to be in danger of being struck down by a passing car, and if, just before driving upon the tracks upon which he was struck, or so close to it as to be in danger of being struck, he could have seen and known of the approach of the train by looking and listening with ordinary care, and could have known thereby that it was dangerous to attempt to drive upon or across said tracks, then the driver would be guilty of negligence, and if such negligence was alone the direct or proximate cause of the accident, then plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be for the said defendant."

Instruction 21: "Even though you might believe from the evidence that no whistle or bell was sounded on said defendant's train, it was still the duty of the driver of the automobile before going on the tracks to look for the purpose of ascertaining if a train was approaching. He had no right not to look because he may not have heard any bell or whistle from said train, or because none may have been rung or blown. It was his duty, in the exercise of ordinary care, which the law requires at a railroad crossing, to look for the purpose of seeing that which may have been visible to one looking with ordinary care, and if you find from the evidence that the driver failed to exercise ordinary care in these particulars, and that such failure on his part was the sole proximate cause of the accident, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be for said defendant."

Instruction 31: "I instruct you that defendant had a lawful right to operate a freight train backward over the crossing in question, and that it is as much the duty of persons traveling on the highway to look and listen for such a train, so operated, as for any other train which may be operated on railroad tracks."

[2] Upon reading the foregoing instructions, and taking into consideration that the court struck out from instruction No. 28, requested by the plaintiff, a direct statement "that the driver's negligence cannot be imputed to the plaintiff," we think that there was prejudicial error in the refusal of the court to give at least some of the instructions requested by the plaintiff on the subject of imputed negligence and the subjects of joint or common enterprise and agency. This refusal is further illustrated by instruction (G) requested by the plaintiff and refused by the court:

"To constitute a joint or common enterprise within the meaning of the law, each must have some voice and authority in the management and control of the same. If Thomas Renowden and those riding in the auto had no voice or authority over how Putnam should drive, it was not a joint or common enterprise, and the negligence of any of the party cannot be imputed to either or any of the rest."

We deem it unnecessary to consider closely the other numerous assignments of error, nearly all of which relate to instructions given or instructions refused. It may be that, aside from the matters which we have discussed, there would be no sufficient reasons for reversal of the judgment. But there was evidence quite sufficient to have warranted a finding that the defendant was negligent in the management of its train. This being so, it is reasonable to infer that the verdict may have rested upon an implied finding that the accident was caused by the concurrent negligence of defendant and the driver Putnam, and that the jury understood that for that reason alone the plaintiff was barred from any right to recover damages.

The judgment is reversed.

GREGORY v. HECKE, Director of Department of Agriculture. (Civ. 2814.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 19, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 17, 1925.)

1. Poisons ⟸2—Court will consider language, mischief to be avoided, and remedy intended in construing Economic Poison Act.

In construing the Economic Poison Act of 1921, court will consider clear import of language used, together with mischief sought to be avoided, and remedy intended to be afforded by the statute.

2. Poisons ⟸2—Economic Poison Act manifests legislative intent to regulate sale of poison, and to protect horticultural interests.

Economic Poison Act of 1921 manifests a legislative intention not only to regulate manufacture and sale of economic poison, but to protect the large and valuable state orchard and horticultural interests against fraud, imposition, and misrepresentation as to the efficiency of antidotes for germ and fungoid diseases.

3. Evidence ⟸13 — Judicial notice taken of germs infesting orchards, and that sprays and germicides are effective in eradicating them.

Court will take judicial notice that innumerable germs and pests infest orchards, vineyards, and gardens of the state, and that certain sprays and germicides are most effective in eradicating such pests, thereby increasing productiveness of trees and vines, to profit of farmer and welfare of the public.

4. Evidence ⟸5(2)—Judicial notice taken of evils demanding legislation.

Judicial notice will be taken of evils demanding legislation, mischief intended to be remedied, and importance of public interests affected thereby.

5. Constitutional law ⟸81 — Public welfare may be preserved under police powers.

Public health, morals, and general welfare may be preserved under the police powers vested in the state.

6. Constitutional law ⟸81—Property may not be used to detriment of equal rights of others.

While legislation under police powers must not be unreasonable or oppressive, all property within jurisdiction of state is subject to reasonable regulation, so that it may not be used to detriment of equal rights of others.

7. Poisons ⟸4—Disposal of germicide held to constitute a violation of Economic Poison Act of 1921.

Advertising, labeling, and selling a germicide as "most efficacious remedy known, an absolute remedy for, and the greatest remedy known, for mildew, fungus, etc," when in truth such compound was not efficacious for any of such purposes, and was of little or no use therefor, constituted a violation of the Economic Poison Act of 1921.

8. Equity ⟸65(1)—Will not intervene to sanction fraud or gross imposition on the public.

Even though an act may be unconstitutional, equity will not intervene to sanction fraud or gross imposition on the public.

9. Constitutional law ⟸48—Statute not declared unconstitutional unless clearly so.

Court should not declare a statute unconstitutional unless it is clearly and palpably so, and is incapable of reconciliation.

10. Statutes ⟸71—"Uniform operation" provision of Constitution construed.

Const. art. 1, § 11, providing that all laws of a general nature shall have a "uniform operation," does not mean that the law shall operate alike on all persons, but that it shall affect all persons uniformly who stand in the same category, or all those who stand in the same relation with respect to particular privileges and immunities conferred by the act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Uniform Operation of Laws.]

11. Statutes ⟸77(1)—Economic Poison Act held not to constitute special legislation and to be based on a valid classification.

Economic Poison Act of 1921, regulating manufacture and sale of economic poisons, and purporting to operate uniformly on all persons who manufacture, sell, or use economic poisons, held to be based on a natural and valid classification, and not to be unconstitutional as special legislation.

12. Statutes ⟸77(1)—Factors to be considered in determining legality of classification for legislative regulation stated.

In determining legality of classification for legislative regulation, there should be considered the general subject to be regulated, its character, extent, and purpose, together with those who would be naturally affected thereby.

13. Constitutional law ⟸80(2)—Poisons ⟸2—Economic Poison Act held not unconstitutional by conferring on director of agriculture duty of regulating manufacture and sale.

Economic Poison Act of 1921, regulating sale and manufacture of economic poison, held not a delegation of judicial power, violative of Const. art. 3, or article 6, § 1, by conferring on director of agriculture duty of regulating manufacture, sale, and use of economic poisons, together with means of enforcing act by licensing or revoking licenses of dealers.

14. Poisons ⟸2—Power conferred on director of agriculture to regulate economic poisons held not arbitrary and final.

Power conferred on director of agriculture, by Economic Poison Act of 1921, to regulate manufacture, sale, and use of economic poisons, together with means of enforcing act by licensing or revoking licenses of dealers, held not arbitrary and final, since he can act only pursuant to law after notice, and he acts in quasi judicial capacity, and his decisions are subject to review on certiorari.

15. Constitutional law ⟸296(1) — Economic Poison Act held not unconstitutional as taking of private property without due process of law.

Economic Poison Act of 1921, regulating manufacture, sale and use of economic poison, held not violative of Const. art. 1, § 14, or Const. U. S. Amend. 14, prohibiting taking of private property without due process of law.

16. Constitutional law ⟸251—"Due process of law" defined.

"Due process of law" does not necessarily mean that a person is entitled to a trial in a court before he may be deprived of what may be equivalent to property rights, but does mean that an orderly proceeding, adapted to the nature of the case, shall be accorded to the owner of property, in which he may be heard, and where he may defend, enforce, and protect his personal rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Due Process of Law.]

17. Constitutional law ⟸296(1)—Regulations for preservation of public safety do not deprive owner of property without "due process of law."

General right to engage in a trade, profession, or business is subject to the power inherent in the state to make necessary rules and regulations respecting use and enjoyment of property necessary for the preservation of the public health, morals, comfort, order, and safety, and such regulations do not deprive owners of property without due process of law.

18. Constitutional law ⟸92—No vested right acquired to continue in licensed business.

No person can acquire a vested right to continue, when once licensed, in a business, trade, or occupation which is subject to legislative control under the police powers.

19. Jury ⟸19(1)—Economic Poison Act held not violative of constitutional provision guaranteeing trial by jury.

Economic Poison Act of 1921, regulating sale and manufacture and use of economic poisons, held not violative of Const. art. 1, § 7, guaranteeing a trial by jury.

20. Jury ⟸10—Trial by jury assured in only such cases as existed at common law.

Trial by jury is assured in only such cases as existed at common law.

21. Jury ⟸19(1)—Trial may not be demanded in special proceedings, unless right given by statute.

A jury trial may not be demanded in special proceedings, unless the right is given by statute.

22. Poisons ⟸2—Economic Poison Act held not unconstitutional because providing for revocation of licenses.

Economic Poison Act of 1921, regulating sale, manufacture, and use of economic poisons, held not unconstitutional because providing for revocation of licenses and permits.

23. Constitutional law ⟸43(1)—Manufacturer held estopped to question validity of Economic Poison Act.

Economic poison manufacturer held estopped to question validity of Economic Poison Act of 1921, regulating sale, manufacture, and use of economic poison, where for several years he had registered his economic poison product, and had been licensed to manufacture and sell the same, and was enjoying protection of the statute at the time of challenging its constitutionality.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Petition by A. R. Gregory for a writ of prohibition, directed against G. H. Hecke, as Director of the Department of Agriculture of the State of California. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellant.

B. M. Aikins, of San Francisco, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment by default entered against defendant for failure to answer the petition for a writ of prohibition, after a general demurrer thereto had been overruled.

The writ prohibits appellant from proceeding, pursuant to the provisions of the California Economic Poison Act of 1921 (St. 1921, p. 1259), to hear or revoke respondent's license to manufacture and sell a compound known as "Qua-Sul," a germicide intended for the purpose of eradicating mildew, aphis, codlin-moth, germs, and fungoid diseases of plants and trees.

The petition alleges that for a number of years the petitioner has been engaged in the manufacture and sale of this "Qua-Sul;" that it is intended for use as a germicide for treatment of diseases of trees and plants, and for the destroying of the larvæ of various pests; that he had established a large demand and market for this germicide of the value of several thousand dollars; that for several years he had been licensed to conduct this business, and on June 4, 1923, he had paid appellant the required license fee of $50 for registration for the ensuing year; that subsequently, on August 13, 1923, appellant instituted proceedings against petitioner to cancel his said license on the ground that the germicide was of little or no value for the purposes for which it was intended to be used; that pursuant to said proceedings appellant had procured a citation to be served upon petitioner, requiring him to show cause at a time and place fixed why his said license should not be revoked for the reasons stated in the citation. It was alleged that the proceedings and threatened revocation of license would cause petitioner great and irreparable damage, and that there was no speedy or adequate remedy at law. The petition then prays for an order restraining appellant from proceeding with said hearing, or revoking his license.

The citation or order to show cause is made a part of the petition. It demands of the petitioner that he appear at the office of the director of agriculture in Sacramento on August 27, 1923, and show cause why his license to manufacture and sell the economic poison called "Qua-Sul" should not be canceled under the authority conferred by section 14 of the California Economic Poison Act of 1921, on the ground that it was of little or no value for the purpose for which it was intended to be used.

The citation then proceeded in detail to state the result of expert investigation as to the properties and efficiency of said germicide. It further set out petitioner's advertised claim of efficiency in his printed pamphlets and upon his labeled packages, as follows:

"Qua-Sul, the most efficacious remedy known for mildew, rust, smut, fungus, black-spot, wilt, curl-leaf, red-spider, thrip, aphis, codlin-moth. Qua-Sul is a germicide and fungicide. It is an absolute remedy for mildew, and fungoid diseases, and is the greatest germicide in the world. It will kill the eggs of different pests that deposit their eggs or larvæ in the ground. If sprayed on the trees and fences in a weaker solution of 1 to 200 it has the same effect there. It is the greatest germicide known, and kills all insect eggs in the soil."

The citation attached to the petition then specifically denies that said compound will "as alleged in the printed circular and labels attached to the containers" effectively control millipedes, wireworms, angleworms, slugs, argentine ants, mildew, rust, smut, fungus, black-spot, wilt, curl-leaf, red-spider, thrips, aphis, or codlin-moth; and denies that the solution when applied to the soil as advertised will destroy insects or eggs, larvæ or pests at a greater depth than one-eighth of an inch from the surface.

To this petition the director of agriculture demurred, on the ground that it failed to state a cause of action for the remedy of prohibition. The demurrer was overruled. The defendant saw fit to rest upon the record, and failed to answer. Whereupon judgment was entered against him. From this judgment he appeals.

The petitioner supports his writ of prohibition on the ground that there is no authority of law to withhold or cancel a license to manufacture or sell a commodity upon the mere ground that it is of little or no value for the purpose for which it is intended to be used; that he is not charged by the citation with adulteration, misbranding, or misrepresentation of the economic poison in question; and that the California Economic Act of 1921 is unconstitutional and void, because it purports to confer illegal judicial powers upon the director of agriculture, an executive officer, because it is special legislation, because it denies the right of trial by jury, and because it deprives one of property without due process of law contrary to section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Other claims of the unconstitutionality of the act in question are made in the petition, but not urged in the briefs, or upon oral argument.

The appellant insists that the California Economic Poison Act of 1921 is a valid statute under the police powers inherent in the state Legislatures; that the police powers not only authorize the regulation of business in the interest of public health, public peace, and public morals, but in the interest of public welfare, may legislate to prevent fraud, misrepresentation, and imposition.

Under the provisions of this Economic Poison Act, any manufacturer, agent or dealer in any economic poison must file with the director of the agricultural department of California an application for registration of such poison, together with a correct statement of the brands, trade-marks, and kinds of economic poisons to be marketed, specifying the correct names and percentages of all active and inert substances contained in the poison, or in lieu thereof must furnish a sample of the compound; he must procure a certificate of registration and license from the director of the agricultural department, and pay the annual fee therefor. He may then manufacture and sell such economic poison only in conformity with the provisions of said act, and such reasonable regulations as the department may enforce.

The title to this act is "An act to regulate the manufacture, sale, and use of economic poisons; to prevent the adulteration, misbranding, and misrepresentation of economic poisons," etc. The term "economic poison" as used in this act is defined as including "any substance, or mixture of substances intended to be used for preventing, destroying, repelling, or mitigating any and all insects, fungi, weeds, rodents, or other plant or animal pest, * * * which may infest or be detrimental to vegetation. * * *"

It is provided that economic poisons shall be deemed to be misbranded "if the package or label * * * shall bear any statement, design, or device regarding such article or the ingredients or substances contained therein which shall be false or misleading; * * * if it be labeled or branded so as to deceive or mislead the purchaser; * * * if it consists partially or completely of any inert substance or substances which do not prevent, destroy, repel, or mitigate insects, fungi, weeds, rodents, or other plant or animal pests, and does not have the names and percentage amounts of each and every one of such inert ingredients plainly and correctly stated on the label. * * *" Section 7.

This act makes it unlawful for any person to "manufacture, deliver, or offer to deliver, sell, offer or expose for sale in this state any adulterated or misbranded economic poison."

The director of agriculture is authorized and directed by this act to regulate the manufacture and sale of all such economic poisons within the state of California; and to license or revoke licenses for such purposes. To this end rules and regulations may be adopted and the procedure for hearing applications for registration, or revocation of licenses is also provided for.

Section 14 of this act provides that:

"The director of agriculture shall have the power after hearing, as provided for in this act, to cancel or to refuse to register any economic poison which has been shown to have little or no value for the purpose for which it is intended to be used, or has been shown to be generally detrimental or seriously injurious to vegetation. * * * Said director shall * * * have the power to cancel the registration of, or refuse to register, any manufacturer, importer, agent of, or dealer in economic poisons who repeatedly violates any of the provisions of this act."

It is apparent from the petition that, after scientific investigation, the director of agriculture was charging petitioner with violation of the Economic Poison Act in (1) manufacturing and selling an economic poison which was of little or no value for the purpose for which it is intended to be used; and (2) misbranding and misrepresenting the compound.

The citation served upon petitioner does not specifically charge him with "misbranding or misrepresenting" the germicide. But it does state facts which, if true, would constitute both misbranding and misrepresenting under the definition of misbranding above quoted and found in section 7 of the act. For it is alleged that the labels and the circulars distributed by petitioner to his customers represented that "Qua-Sul was the most efficacious remedy known; and an absolute remedy for; and the greatest germicide known to destroy mildew * * * aphis, codlin-moth * * * fungoid disease * * * eggs and larvæ of insects and pests," etc. These extravagant assertions are specifically denied by the director. And he adds that the germicide is of little or no use for the purpose for which it is intended to be used.

[1] The term "misrepresent" is not used in section 2 of the act, which prohibits one from manufacturing or selling adulterated or misbranded economic poison. The term "misbrand" certainly includes that of misrepresentation. The latter term is used in the title to the act. The evident intent of the Legislature was to prohibit the adulteration, misbranding, and misrepresentation in the use or sale of economic poisons. In construing the act, the court will take into consideration the clear import of the language used, together with the mischief sought to be avoided, and the remedy intended to be afforded by the statute. 25 R. C. L. 1015.

[2] Clearly, the Legislature intended by this act to not only regulate the manufacture and sale of economic poison, but it intended also to protect the large and valuable orchard and horticultural interests of California against fraud, imposition, and misrepresentation as to the efficiency of antidotes for germ and fungoid diseases.

[3, 4] The court will take judicial notice of the fact that innumerable germs and pests infest the orchards, the vineyards and the gardens of our state, and that certain sprays and germicides are most effective in eradicating these pests, and thus increasing the productiveness of the trees and vines to the profit of the farmer and the welfare of the public. Judicial notice will be taken of the evils demanding legislation, the mischief intended to be remedied, and the importance of public interests affected thereby. Ex parte Kohler, 74 Cal. 38, 15 P. 436.

[5, 6] It is not disputed that the public health, public morals, and general public welfare may be preserved under the police powers vested in the state. 5 Cal. Jur. 696. While it is true that legislation under the police powers must not be unreasonable or oppressive, yet all property within the jurisdiction of the state is held subject to reasonable regulations so that it may not be used to the detriment of the equal rights of others. 6 R. C. L. 193. And so it has been held to be a valid regulation of business under the police powers to prohibit fraud, deceit, and imposition. 12 C. J., 920; 6 R. C. L. 208. In Cofman v. Osterhous, State Dairy Comm., 40 N. D. 390, 168 N. W. 826, 18 A. L. R. 219, upholding the constitutionality of an act regulating dairy interests, and licensing and authorizing the withholding of licenses under specified conditions, the court said: "The police power of the state is not limited" to the mere regulation of affairs to preserve the good order, public health and safety. "The prevention of fraud and deceit, cheating and imposition, is equally within the power, and a state may prescribe all such regulations as in its judgment will secure, or tend to secure, the people against the consequences of fraud."

In the interest of public health, public morals and public welfare, statutes have been upheld in nearly every state of the Union regulating and licensing various businesses and professions, governing marketing associations of farm products; controlling the manufacture and sale of drugs, meat, milk, butter, cheese, cereals, medicines, beverages, sprays, fertilizer, germicide, and food products of nearly every variety consumed by beast and man. So, also, has the delegation of power to commissions and officers been held to be valid, authorizing them to regulate the business of handling and selling such commodities, specifying the weight, size, contents, and labeling of containers.

While it is true that statutes attempting to regulate the branding and labeling of packages must be reasonable and not impose onerous or unnecessary burdens upon private business under the guise of an exercise of the police powers (Ex parte Dietrich, 149 Cal. 104, 84 P. 770, 5 L. R. A. [N. S.] 873), yet numerous cases have held that misstatements and misrepresentation as to the contents, ingredients, weight, etc., in the labeling of the product constitutes a misbranding and a violation of the police regulations (11 R. C. L. 1106; United States v. Ten Barrels of Vinegar [D. C.] 186 F. 399; People v. Butler, 134 App. Div. 151, 118 N. Y. S. 849; State v. Intoxicating Liquors, 106 Me. 135, 76 A. 268; United States v. Scanlon [D. C.] 180 F. 485; United States v. 100 Cases of Apples [D. C.] 179 F. 985; Brina v. United States, 179 F. 373, 105 C. C. A. 558; United States v. 154 Sacks of Oats [D. C.] 294 F. 340.)

[7, 8] To permit one to advertise, label, and sell germicide as "the most efficacious remedy known; an absolute remedy for, and the greatest remedy known, for mildew, fungus, curl-leaf, thrips, aphis, codlin-moth, eggs and larvæ of pests and insects, etc.," when in truth such compound is not efficacious for any of such purposes, and is of little or no use for such purposes, would be a direct violation of the letter and spirit of the Economic Poison Act of California. Moreover, it would be encouraging fraud and imposition upon the public. Even though an act may be unconstitutional, equity will not intervene to sanction a fraud or gross imposition upon the public. Jose v. Utley, 185 Cal. 665, 199 P. 1037.

Respondent asserts that the Economic Poison Act confers an illegal and unconstitutional arbitrary power upon the director of agriculture to revoke a license to sell such commodity, and thus deprive him of the right to follow a lawful pursuit. He cites the case of Los Angeles v. Hollywood Cemetery Ass'n, 124 Cal. 344, 57 P. 153, 71 Am. St. Rep. 75, in which it was held that a city ordinance prohibiting the locating and maintaining of a cemetery for the burial of the dead within the county without permission of the supervisors was void. In the course of the opinion this language is used:

"The supervisors may impose a license, the payment of which shall be a condition to the enjoyment of the privilege of engaging in lawful occupations; they may regulate the manner of conducting the business if it be of a character tending to be injurious; but if the business be lawful, and having no injurious tendency, they cannot say who shall or who shall not exercise the right itself. Under the guise of regulating a business the municipality cannot make prohibition possible by committing to the officers of the municipality the arbitrary power to deny permission to engage in that business. We do not think it was ever intended by the people in ordering the section of the Constitution referred to, or of the Legislature in the statutory enactment, to include, in the power to make and enforce regulations a power purely personal and arbitrary. 'For,' as was said by Matthews, J., in Yick v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 [6 S. Ct. 1064, 30 L. Ed. 220], 'the very idea that one man may be compelled to hold his life, or the means of living, or any material right essential to the enjoyment of life, at the mere will of another, seems to be intolerable in any country where freedom prevails, as being the essence of slavery.'"

It will be noted that the language last quoted of Mr. Justice Matthews of the United States Supreme Court was used with reference to an ordinance of San Francisco prohibiting the maintenance of the lawful and useful business of a laundry, unless it be conducted in a brick or stone building. The cause for criticism of such an ordinance is quite apparent. And in the language used by the court in the Hollywood Cemetery Case, above quoted, it will be noted that the court says:

"The supervisors may impose a license, the payment of which shall be a condition to the enjoyment of the privilege of engaging in lawful occupation; they may regulate the manner of conducting the business if it be of a character tending to be injurious."

The "regulation of a business tending to be injurious" is precisely what the Legislature attempted to do by the enactment of the Economic Poison Act. The handling of poisons in nearly every form is recognized as dangerous and likely to become injurious unless carefully regulated. The economical poisons used to eradicate germs and pests from plants and trees, unless scientifically used, may be most injurious. On the contrary, for the benefit of the large and important fruit interests of California, such germicides are of inestimable value. It is for an alleged violation of the reasonable regulations and restrictions provided, not by the director of agriculture, but by the Legislature, that respondent was cited to show cause why his license should not be revoked. In this procedure there is nothing in conflict with the law announced by the court in the case of Los Angeles v. Hollywood Cemetery Ass'n.

So, also, the respondent cites with assurance the case of Hewitt v. State Board of Medical Examiners, 148 Cal. 590, 84 P. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750. Pursuant to the authority vested in the state board of medical examiners to revoke the license of a physician for "unprofessional conduct," which was defined, among other things, as consisting of "all advertising of medical business in which grossly improbable statements are made," the license of a Los Angeles physician was revoked. It appears that because this physician had advertised as follows, "cancer cured; the only sure cure known in the world," her license was revoked. The court held that the question as to what constituted "grossly improbable statements" was indefinite and uncertain; and that one should not be deprived of the right to practice the profession for which they had consumed a life time to prepare, merely because some commission might think the advertised statement was "grossly improbable." It is quite apparent that among the many different schools of medicine there would be bound to exist a grave difference of opinion as to what might constitute a cure for cancer or any other chronic disease.

But suppose the medical act in question had authorized the revocation of a physician's license for unprofessional conduct, and had defined such conduct as, for instance, prescribing for any disease a remedy supplied in a container upon which a false label as to its contents was used; and that the physician had supplied, in treatment for a malignant internal disease such as cancer, bread pills in a package labeled "cancer cure; the only sure cure known in the world"? Can it be said that the court, under such circumstances, would have held that such conduct would not justify the revocation of his license for unprofessional conduct? There would then be no uncertainty as to the deceit or the damage that would follow such conduct. A chemical analysis would disclose the fact that the alleged "cancer cure" was nothing but bread pills. There could be no diversity of opinion as to the lack of efficiency of the remedy supplied. While the credulous patient was slowly dying under the treatment of bread pills, except for the deceit of the physician the patient might have been receiving helpful treatment.

Advertising what may be "grossly improbable" is quite different from supplying a poison misbranded and misrepresented, particularly when the commodity is of "little or no value" for the purpose for which it is advertised and sold.

[9] The authorities are practically uniform to the effect that a court should not declare a statute unconstitutional unless it is clearly and palpably so, and is incapable of reconciliation. 5 Cal. Jur. 612.

[10-12] Article 1, § 11, of the Constitution, provides that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." This does not mean that the law shall operate alike upon all persons, but that it shall affect all persons uniformly who stand in the same category, or upon those who stand in the same relation with respect to the particular privileges and immunities conferred by the act. 5 Cal. Jur. 816. But this Economic Poison Act purports to operate uniformly upon all persons who "manufacture, sell or use economic poisons." It certainly is not special legislation. In the leading case of Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co., 184 U. S. 560, 22 S. Ct. 439, 46 L. Ed. 690, Mr. Justice Harlan says:

"Classification 'must * * * rest upon some difference which bears a reasonable and just relation to the act in respect to which the classification is proposed, and can never be made arbitrarily.'"

But in determining the legality of classification for legislative regulation there should be considered the general subject to be regulated, its character, extent, and purpose, together with those who would be naturally affected thereby. 6 R. C. L. 375; Ex parte Jentzsch, 112 Cal. 468, 474, 44 P. 803, 32 L. R. A. 664. The last case cited held an act purporting to make it a misdemeanor for any one to work in or conduct a barber shop on Sunday to be void. The reason is apparent. There is no natural reason for segregating barbers from other employments and prohibiting them from working on a particular day. But there is good and natural reasons for regulating the business of handling and selling economic poisons. This classificaton is natural and valid.

[13-15] Conferring upon the director of agriculture the duty to regulate the manufacture, sale, and use of economic poisons, together with the means of enforcing this act by licensing or revoking the licenses of dealers, does not violate the provisions of article 3 of the Constitution, nor article 6, § 1, of that document. It is well established that tribunals, such as the board of medical examiners and similar boards, empowered to regulate business and affairs under the police powers, are not exercising judicial authority within the meaning of said provisions. Statutes creating such authority and conferring such powers upon such officers are constitutional and valid. Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 250, 187 P. 965; Brecheen v. Riley, 187 Cal. 121, 200 P. 1042; Los Angeles v. Spencer, 126 Cal. 670, 59 P. 202, 77 Am. St. Rep. 217; Ex parte Whitley, 144 Cal. 167, 77 P. 879, 1 Ann. Cas. 13; Lanterman v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 472, 172 P. 625. Nor is the power so conferred upon the director of agriculture arbitrary and final. He can act only pursuant to law, after notice. He acts in a quasijudicial capacity only, and his decisions are subject to review on certiorari. Suckow v. Alderson, 182 Cal. 250, 187 P. 965; Lanterman v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 472, 172 P. 625. Nor does the power conferred by this act to revoke a license for violation of the provisions of the act infringe upon the inhibition of article 1, § 14, of the Constitution of California, or the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the taking of private property without due process of law.

[16, 17] Due process of law does not necessarily mean that a person is entitled to a trial in a court before he may be deprived of what may be equivalent to property rights. It does, however, mean that an orderly proceeding adapted to the nature of the case, shall be accorded to the owner of property, in which he may be heard, and where he may defend, enforce, and protect his personal rights. Santa Clara v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co. (C. C.) 18 F. 385. The general right to engage in a trade, profession or business is subject to the power inherent in the state to make necessary rules and regulations respecting the use and enjoyment of property necessary for the preservation of the public health, morals, comfort, order, and safety; such regulations do not deprive owners of property without due process of law. 12 C. J. 1272, § 1074.

[18-22] No person can acquire a vested right to continue, when once licensed, in a business, trade, or occupation which is subject to legislative control under the police powers. 6 R. C. L. 482, § 481; Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 4 S. Ct. 111, 28 L. Ed. 232. Nor do we think the Economic Poison Act is in violation of article 1, § 7, of the Constitution of California, guaranteeing a trial by jury. The trial by jury is assured in only such cases as existed at common law. Koppikus v. State Capitol Comm., 16 Cal. 248. A jury trial may not be demanded in special proceedings, unless the right is given by statute. 15 Cal. Jur. 342. Statutes are not unconstitutional which provide for the revocation of licenses and permits. 35 C. J. 185; Bowman v. Virginia State Entomologist, 128 Va. 351, 105 S. E. 141. Nor do we find that the act in question infringes upon any of the constitutional provisions relied upon by petitioner.

The regulation of the use and sale of economic poisons for the evident purposes intended by this statute of 1921 is akin to, and probably more important, than the statutes regulating fertilizers. Yet, in 1 R. C. L., at page 789, the able author says:

"One of the most common instances of the existence of the exercise of police powers in reference to agriculture is the regulation of the sale of commercial fertilizers. The controlling purpose of such statutes is to guard the agricultural public against the spurious and worthless compounds sometimes sold as fertilizers, and to fix on sellers a statutory guaranty that fertilizers sold by them shall contain the chemical ingredients as represented, thus furnishing to purchasers a reliable means of proving any deception thus attempted. As these statutes prevent fraud, and promote the prosperity of agricultural industry, they are strictly within the scope of legitimate police regulation." 2 C. J. 999.

[23] Even though the Economic Poison Act were open to attack as an unconstitutional delegation of power, this petitioner is estopped from making such defense. For several years past he has registered his "Qua-Sul" product, and has been licensed to manufacture and sell the same. He was licensed for the year 1923, and enjoying the protection of the very statute, at the time he challenges its constitutionality. One who elects to accept the benefits of a statute is estopped from denying its validity. In the case of Cofman v. Ousterhous, 40 N. D. 390, 168 N. W. 826, 18 A. L. R. 219, where a license to conduct a dairy was revoked under a statute, by the dairy commission, in an appeal to the district court on certiorari, it was said:

"Nor, in any event, can the relator question the right of the dairy commissioner to cancel the license on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the act. * * * It is clear, indeed, that a person who obtains a license under a law, and seeks for a time to enjoy the benefits thereof, cannot afterwards question the constitutionality of the act when the license is sought to be revoked." M. & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Nester, 3 N. D. 480, 57 N. W. 510; Hart v. Folsom, 70 N. H. 213, 47 A. 603; State v. Seebold, 192 Mo. 720, 91 S. W. 491; 19 Ann. Cas. 183.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgment is reversed. The trial court is directed to sustain the demurrer.

PEOPLE v. MERAVIGLIA. (Cr. 854.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1137(5)—Accused held not entitled to complain of testimony concerning prior conviction, brought out by cross-examination of prosecutrix.

In prosecution for statutory rape, accused is not entitled to complain of testimony that he had previously served sentence in state's prison, brought out deliberately by cross-examination of prosecutrix.

2. Criminal law ⟸1144(2)—In absence of evidence to contrary, it is presumed that grand jury was regularly and legally selected, impaneled, organized, and sworn, and that their proceedings were lawful and regular.

Where indictment for statutory rape was in form prescribed by Pen. Code, § 951, which does not require indictment to affirmatively show that grand jury was sworn, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15, it is presumed that officers performed their duty, and, in absence of evidence to contrary, that grand jury was regularly and legally selected, impaneled, organized, and sworn by oaths prescribed by Pen. Code, §§ 903 and 904, and that their proceedings were lawful and regular.

3. Indictment and information ⟸196(3)—By plea of not guilty, and failure to demur or move to set aside indictment, accused held to waive any objection as to irregularities in organization or impaneling of grand jury.

In prosecution for statutory rape, by plea of not guilty and by failure to demur and move to set aside indictment, accused waived any objection which he might have taken to any irregularities in organization or impaneling of grand jury.

4. Criminal law ⟸1032(1)—Accused may not reserve objection to irregularities in form of indictment or pleading for attack in appellate court for first time.

Accused may not stand trial on merits without objection, and reserve, in event of adverse judgment, objection which he may have to irregularities in form of indictment or pleading, for attack in appellate court for first time.

5. Rape ⟸35(2), 52(1)—Necessary to prove that prosecutrix was not wife of accused; proof need not be direct.

In prosecution for statutory rape, it is necessary element under statute to prove that prosecutrix was not wife of accused, but this need not be shown by direct evidence, but may be established by circumstances.

6. Rape ⟸52(1)—Evidence that prosecutrix was not wife of accused held sufficient.

In prosecution for statutory rape, where court instructed that proof beyond reasonable doubt that prosecutrix was not accused's wife was necessary, and throughout trial such fact was assumed by all parties and not questioned, and it appeared without conflict that prosecutrix was daughter of accused, was of school age and bore maiden name, and lived at convent apart from him, in view of Civ. Code, § 59, making marriage between parents and children absolutely void, evidence that prosecutrix was not wife of accused was sufficient.

7. Rape ⟸52(4)—Where prosecutrix testifies that she is 14 years of age, which is undisputed, proof of age is sufficient.

In prosecution for statutory rape, where prosecutrix testified that she was 14 years of age, which was not disputed, proof of age, taken in connection with appearance on witness stand, was sufficient.

8. Criminal law ⟸678(3)—Election by state as to offense on which it would rely held sufficient.

In prosecution for statutory rape, on proof of numerous offenses, in absence of demand for prosecution to make election for offense relied on, statement of court that he assumed prosecution elected to stand on offense of certain date, which was first offense testified to, was sufficient election, in absence of demand by accused for more specific election.

9. Criminal law ⟸678(3)—If no election made at trial, first evidence that tends to prove offense is deemed to be selection.

In prosecution for statutory rape, on proof of several offenses, if no particular offense is elected at trial, first evidence that tends to prove offense is deemed to be selection of state of offense on which it relies.

10. Criminal law ⟸678(1)—Where evidence discloses more than one offense, accused is entitled to require prosecution to elect to stand on some specific offense.

In prosecution for statutory rape, if evidence discloses more than one offense, accused is entitled to require prosecution to elect to stand upon some specific offense.

11. Criminal law ⟸371(9) — Admitting evidence of other offenses showing course of conduct of accused with prosecutrix held not error.

In prosecution for statutory rape, admission of evidence of guilt of crime, described in Penal Code, § 288a, with prosecutrix and other offenses prior to offense chiefly relied upon by prosecution, which show continuous course of lascivious conduct by accused to arouse passions of prosecutrix, was proper.

12. Criminal law ⟸371(9)—Rape ⟸40(2)—Lewd conduct and other offenses held admissible to corroborate prosecutrix, and show disposition of accused.

In prosecution for statutory rape, where prosecutrix is under age of consent, lewd conduct and other offenses between parties may be shown to corroborate prosecutrix, and to show disposition of accused.

13. Witnesses ⟸40(1)—Admitting testimony of child of 9 years held proper.

In prosecution for statutory rape, admitting testimony by 9 year old child, who on examination appeared to be intelligent, well able to express herself and give her impressions, and realized that she was expected to tell nothing but the truth, and was liable to be punished if she swore falsely, was proper.

14. Witnesses ⟸40(1)—Test of competency of child to testify stated.

Test of competency of children as witnesses is that they possess sufficient intelligence, understanding, and ability to receive and fairly accurately recount impressions, and that they have knowledge of nature of oath, and moral sense to realize they should tell nothing but truth, and are likely to be punished for telling falsehoods.

15. Criminal law ⟸696(2)—Admitting answer of witness that accused would not let witness go into room with accused and prosecutrix held not error, in absence of objection.

In prosecution for statutory rape, after witness testified that accused took prosecutrix into bedroom, her answer to question that she did not go in because accused would not let her was competent, and, in absence of motion to strike it out as conclusion, its admission was not error.

16. Witnesses ⟸372(2)—Sustaining objection to question which attempted to attack credibility of prosecutrix because of enmity towards accused held not error.

In prosecution for statutory rape of accused's daughter, where accused attempted to show enmity of prosecutrix because he punished her for leaving convent school, sustaining objection to question whether, on account of running away from school with prosecutrix, two other girls were not expelled, was proper; such testimony not being competent to impeach credibility of prosecutrix.

17. Rape ⟸54(1)—Uncorroborated testimony of prosecutrix is sufficient to warrant conviction.

In prosecution for statutory rape, uncorroborated testimony of prosecutrix is sufficient to warrant conviction.

18. Criminal law ⟸741(1), 742(1)—Weight and confidence to be given to testimony of prosecutrix is matter solely for jury.

In prosecution for statutory rape, weight and confidence to be given to evidence of prosecutrix is matter solely for jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Natale Meraviglia was convicted of statutory rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. The defendant was indicted by the grand jury of Nevada county for the crime of rape with his own 14 year old daughter, alleged to have occurred on or about January 1, 1925. No demurrer or motion to quash was filed. The defendant pleaded not guilty. He was tried by a jury, and convicted.

The circumstances of the case are extremely revolting. The defendant had been separated from his wife for a number of years. His daughter was living at a convent in Grass Valley. He was guilty of a course of immoral and lascivious conduct toward her for a period of time. This was for the apparent purpose of arousing her passions and intimidating her. His conduct and declarations were reprehensible and disgusting. Every necessary element of the crime was so conclusively proven, and the law affecting these questions is so well settled, that good faith in prosecuting this appeal may well be questioned.

From the judgment of commitment, and the order denying the motion for new trial, this appeal was taken. The defendant urges a reversal of the judgment upon a claim that the record fails to show (1) that the grand jury was sworn; (2) that the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant; (3) that her age was not proven; (4) that evidence of actual penetration was lacking; (5) that the prosecution failed to make an election as to the particular offense relied upon; (6) that evidence of prior lewd conduct of the defendant was admitted; (7) that a child of immature years was permitted to testify; (8) that defendant was not permitted to show a certain escapade of the prosecutrix; and (9) that there was a fatal lack of corroboration.

There is so little merit in most of these contentions, and the evidence is of such an offensive character, that little testimony will be quoted. This omnibus challenge to every essential feature of the case is answered by a cursory reading of the record.

[1] Appellant claims there is a lack of evidence sufficient to warrant his conviction. He charges his conviction to prejudice of the jury acquired from knowledge of the fact that he had previously served a sentence in state's prison. But this is not a matter of which he may complain, since this was brought out deliberately by his cross-examination of the prosecutrix.

[2] The indictment was in the form prescribed by section 951 of the Penal Code. Our statute does not require the indictment to affirmatively show that the grand jury was sworn. Upon the impaneling of a grand jury, sections 903 and 904 of the Penal Code prescribe the form and require the oath to be administered. It is presumed that the officers have performed their duty and that the grand jurors have been sworn. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15.

In the absence of evidence to the contrary, it will be presumed that the grand jury was regularly and legally selected, impaneled, organized, and sworn, and that their proceedings were lawful and regular. 10 Stand. Ency. of Proc., 662. In Rinkard v. State, 157 Ind. 534, 62 N. E. 14, it is said:

"The weight of modern authority, as well as sound reason, seems to sustain the proposition that where an indictment, regular upon its face, is returned into open court, and is received and acted upon by the court without objection, it will, in the absence of [any showing] to the contrary, * * * be presumed that the grand jury returning it was duly impaneled, charged, and sworn. If any objections to the organization of the grand jury * * * existed, such objections should have been presented to the trial court by motion or plea in abatement." State v. Broussard, 133 La. 884, 63 So. 390; State v. Vaughn, 132 Mo. App. 135, 112 S. W. 728; State v. Maupin, 196 Iowa, 904, 192 N. W. 828, 195 N. W. 517; People v. Dear, 286 Ill. 142, 121 N. E. 615; State v. Dorr, 139 La. 277, 71 So. 509.

[3] By his plea of not guilty, and by his failure to demur or move to set aside the indictment in this case, the defendant has waived any objection which he might have urged as to any irregularities in the organization or impaneling of the grand jury. 12 Stand. Ency. of Proc. 664.

[4] A defendant may not be permitted to submit to a trial on the merits without objection, taking his chances of obtaining a favorable verdict, and reserve, in the event of an adverse judgment, any objection which he may have to mere irregularities in the form of indictment or pleading, for an attack in the appellate court for the first time. 14 Cal. Jur. 88; People v. Rodney, 131 Cal. 240, 63 P. 351; People v. Monteith, 73 Cal. 7, 14 P. 373.

[5, 6] It is a necessary element of rape under our statute to prove that the prosecutrix was not the wife of the defendant. This need not be shown by direct evidence, but may be established by circumstances. In this case the indictment charged this fact. The court instructed the jury that it was a necessary element, and that they could not convict the defendant unless it was proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Throughout the trial it was assumed by all parties concerned to be a fact, and was not questioned. It appears without conflict that the prosecutrix is the daughter of the defendant, and is a mere school girl, bearing her maiden name, and living at a convent apart from the defendant. Moreover a marriage between parents and children, under the provisions of section 59, Civil Code, is absolutely void. Under such circumstances slight evidence of nonmarriage is sufficient. The evidence of that fact in this case is entirely satisfactory. In 22 R. C. L., at page 1221, it is said:

"It is generally held that it is not absolutely necessary to prove nonmarriage by direct and positive testimony; but, like any other fact, it may be proved by facts and circumstances from which the conclusion may be drawn. Thus where a case was tried apparently on the assumption that the marriage relation did not exist, but it did appear that the victim was a mere school girl, bearing her maiden name, and living with her parents, it was held that the fact of nonmarriage was clearly established." State v. May, 59 Wash. 414, 109 P. 1026, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 113; People v. Allison, 44 Cal. App. 118, 185 P. 992; People v. Bonzani, 24 Cal. App. 549, 141 P. 1062.

[7] Where the prosecutrix herself testifies that she is 14 years of age, and that fact is not disputed, it is sufficient proof of her age, taken in connection with her youthful appearance upon the witness stand. 22 R. C. L. 1201; 22 C. J. 171; People v. Elgar, 39 Cal. App. 78, 178 P. 168; People v. Pribnow, 61 Cal. App. 258, 214 P. 475. There is an abundance of evidence in the record of actual penetration.

[8] The first and chief offense testified to at the trial conformed with the allegation contained in the indictment, and occurred on January 1, 1925. Numerous other offenses of the same sort were afterward proven. There was no demand of the prosecution to make an election of the particular offense relied upon, although the court did suggest during the course of the trial:

"I assume that the prosecution has elected to stand upon the offense of January 1, 1925."

[9] If the defendant desired a more specific election, he should have said so. If no particular offense is elected at the trial, the first evidence that tends to prove an offense is deemed to be the selection. People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 165, 65 P. 323; 8 Cal. Jur. 230. Moreover, the trial court charged the jury that it must find beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed the offense on the specific date of January 1, 1925.

[10] Where the evidence discloses more than one offense, the defendant is entitled to demand that the prosecution elect to stand upon some specific offense. The reason for this rule is that the defendant is entitled to a unanimous verdict as to a specific offense. Otherwise some jurors might believe him guilty of one of the offenses proven, and other jurors might be convinced as to some other offense proven, and it is apparent that all must concur as to his guilt of one and the same offense. And so it follows that the defendant may demand an election as to the specific one relied upon. But it has been held that the defendant may not sit silent during the trial with respect to an election and speculate upon the outcome, and then for the first time complain of a lack of choice, on appeal. State v. Hamilton, 263 Mo. 294, 172 S. W. 593; 22 Stand. Ency. of Proc. 304. To meet this uncertainty our court has wisely said that, in the absence of a specific demand or selection, it will be presumed that the prosecution relies upon the particular offense as to which he first submits evidence. In this case the evidence is satisfactory as to election and conviction of a specific charge.

[11] The defendant claims that he was prejudiced by admission of evidence of his guilt of the heinous crime described in section 288a of the Penal Code, with the prosecutrix, and other acts of rape, with her, prior to the offense chiefly relied upon by the prosecution. The evidence does show a continuous course of lascivious and adulterous conduct with her, on his part, including the enforcement of the practice described in that section of the Code, but it was all necessarily involved in the story of his treatment of the child to show his lustful and amorous purpose, and the means by which he sought to arouse the passions of his daughter. If his conduct thus involved another distinct offense, it was nevertheless competent and admissible. In fact, such conduct only aids to aggravate the crime with which he was charged.

[12] Where the prosecutrix is under the age of consent, lewd and lascivious conduct and other acts of sexual intercourse between the parties may be shown for the purpose of corroborating the prosecutrix and showing the lustful disposition of the accused. 10 Ency. of Ev. 595; 22 R. C. L. 1207; People v. Wademan, 38 Cal. App. 125, 175 P. 791; People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 621, 76 P. 500.

[13] Nor was it error to permit the witness Maudie, a child of 9 years of age, to testify. The material circumstances to which she testified were that on one occasion she observed the defendant take the prosecutrix into a bedroom, lock the door, and pull down the blinds. Before permitting her to testify she was rather carefully examined as to her qualifications. She appeared to be intelligent, well able to express herself and give her impressions and appeared to realize that she was expected to tell nothing but the truth, and that she was liable to be punished if she swore falsely. As the trial judge aptly said:

"I think the child shows sufficient appreciation of the nature of an oath."

[14] The test of the competency of a child to testify in the trial of the case is that they may possess sufficient intelligence, understanding, and ability to receive and fairly accurately recount their impressions, and that they have knowledge of the nature of an oath, and the moral sense to realize they should tell nothing but the truth, and are likely to be punished for telling falsehoods. 28 R. C. L. 461–463. The record discloses no reason to believe that she did not possess these qualifications.

[15] After this witness had testified that her father and sister had gone into the bedroom, she was asked by the prosecution: "Why didn't you go into the bedroom?" Which was objected to on the ground that it was incompetent and calling for a conclusion. The objection was overruled and the witness answered: "He wouldn't let me." There was no motion to strike this out on the ground that it was a conclusion. The question and answer certainly are competent. They indicate secrecy and preparation for the commission of the offense. The answer may have been a conclusion, but the question did not indicate that it called for a conclusion. When the conclusion was stated the defendant should have moved to strike it out. This was not error.

[16] The escapade of the prosecutrix, which the defendant complains of being prevented from proving, consisted of an automobile ride with a number of other girls and boys. They left the convent and went to Nevada City and returned rather late. On cross-examination the defendant went into this affair to considerable length. He attempted to suggest that her relationship with some of the boys was improper. No impropriety was shown. He then attempted to prove that the prosecutrix held enmity toward her father, because he punished her severely at the convent because of this escapade. Indeed, the Mother Superior did interfere when he was beating her. She was asked if she didn't hate her father because he had punished her. She replied that she did not, but that she had said she would rather go to her mother who lived in San Francisco. After pages of examination relative to this episode, counsel for the defendant asked:

"Q. And on account of that running away that night, these two Lewis girls were expelled from the convent?"

An objection was sustained to this question on the ground that it was incompetent and not proper cross-examination. This was evidently an attempt to attack the credibility of the prosecutrix by showing that she had incurred hatred toward her father because he had punished her because of alleged indiscretions on this occasion. This was incompetent. In 25 R. C. L. 1211, it is said:

"It is the well-settled general rule that the bad reputation of the prosecutrix, on a charge of statutory rape, may not be shown to impeach her credibility. The law conclusively presumes that the girl could not give her consent, and every act of intercourse with her would be a crime * * * and her conduct, therefore, could not affect her credibility."

At least the evidence sought to be elicited to the effect that two other girls had been dismissed from the convent because of the escapade was too remote. There was no prejudicial error in it.

[17, 18] The uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix under the well-established rule of this state is sufficient to warrant a conviction. The weight and confidence to be given to her evidence is a matter to be determined solely by the jury. People v. Britt, 62 Cal. App. 674, 217 P. 767; People v. Rabbit, 64 Cal. App. 264, 221 P. 391; People v. Akey, 163 Cal. 54, 124 P. 718.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

VANASEK v. POKONNEY et al. (Civ. 5135.)

1. Husband and wife ⊂⊃270(1) — Nature of action to quiet title stated.

Action to quiet title by removal of a particular deed, valid on its face, as a cloud on alleged community status of land, is a proceeding under Civ. Code, § 3412, and not an action to quiet title as against adverse claims under Code Civ. Proc. § 738.

2. Husband and wife ⊂⊃270(9)—Finding as to wife's interest in community property held not to sustain judgment quieting title.

In an action to quiet title to community property, cross-complaint alleging wife had not authorized a deed given by her husband, a finding that wife had a present vested interest is erroneous, and will not support a judgment, in view of Civ. Code, § 172, her interest being only a contingent ultimate interest.

3. Husband and wife ⊂⊃267(1)—Deed given by husband will be set aside only so far as to protect ultimate interest of wife.

In action to quiet title, where wife seeks to set aside deed given by husband on theory that land is community property, held that, assuming that she might maintain an action to set aside the transfer by husband, such right was not to recover the land as her separate property, but only to the extent necessary to protect the ultimate interest of the wife.

4. Deeds ⊂⊃195—Supported by presumption of consideration.

A deed is supported by a presumption of consideration, and burden of proof is upon party seeking to avoid deed, and presumption applies to the pleadings as well as to the proof.

5. Husband and wife ⊂⊃270(7)—Action to quiet title as against husband's deed to community land must show lack of consideration or fraud.

In an action to quiet title to community property by a wife as against a deed given by her husband, the cross-complaint upon which action was founded not alleging want of consideration, a finding that husband's grantee had no interest was erroneous and would not support a judgment, because want of consideration or fraud must be alleged, in view of presumptions declared in Civ. Code, §§ 1614, 1615, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 39.

6. Husband and wife ⊂⊃270(5)—Husband necessary party to action by wife to set aside deed given by him.

In action by wife to set aside deed given by husband, and not making him a party, held, that the interest and rights of wife over community property are not connected with those of the husband as to make him a necessary party, and demurrer on such ground must be sustained, notwithstanding amendment to Code Civ. Proc. § 370, as amended by St. 1921, p. 102, and sections 382, 389, relative thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Dudley Kinsell, Judge.

Action by Edna Vanasek against Anton Pokonney, Erzsi Novak, Frank Strybl, and others, wherein second named defendant filed a cross-action. From a decree quieting title in second named defendant, defendant last named appeals. Reversed, as to defendant last named.

L. D. Manning, of Oakland, for appellant.

Harold Jacoby, of Oakland (Milton Shepardson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

CASHIN, J. The action was commenced by plaintiff, Edna Vanasek, to quiet title to certain land in Alameda county as against Frank Strybl, appellant herein, Erzsi Novak, respondent, Joe Novak, the husband of respondent, and others. Respondent filed her answer to the complaint, denying the alleged title of plaintiff, and therewith her cross-complaint against appellant, alleging therein her marriage to Joe Novak on June 1, 1914, and that at all times thereafter they continued to be husband and wife, the acquisition of the land by them on June 17, 1917, in the name of the husband as community property; that the land was acquired wholly with community funds; that on August 1, 1919, her husband, without her consent, by his several deed, executed and recorded on that day, conveyed the land to appellant, who took with knowledge of the existing marriage relation; that respondent, upon the transfer of the land to her husband, acquired, as the legal effect thereof, in her own right, and continued to own as a member of the matrimonial community, a present vested interest, estate, and property therein equally with her husband; that the Strybl deed was wholly void; that appellant was not and never had been the owner of any estate or interest in the land or any part thereof; that his deed was a cloud on "the title of said matrimonial community and of this cross-complainant thereto and therein," and asked the decree of the court adjudging the Strybl deed to be void, and that she be adjudged, as against plaintiff and the appellant, to be the owner of the land.

The cross-complaint contained no allegation of want of consideration for the transfer to appellant, or that there was fraud in the transaction, and no allegation of ownership or title in respondent other than as a conclusion from the community status of the land. Her husband was not made a party to the cross-complaint, was not served with summons in the action, and made no appearance therein.

Appellant demurred to the cross-complaint, alleging want of sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action and the nonjoinder of Novak, the husband, as a necessary party thereto.

The demurrer being overruled, appellant answered, alleging title in himself by virtue of the Novak deed; that a valuable consideration, to wit, $500, had been paid therefor to Novak, the husband, which was the reasonable value of the land, and that the purchase was made in good faith upon the representation by Novak that the land was his separate property.

After trial the court found generally that all the allegations of the answer and cross-complaint of respondent were true, and specifically that the land was community property purchased wholly with community funds; the conveyance thereof by Novak, the husband, to appellant; his knowledge of the community status of the land; the want of consent by respondent to the conveyance; that "at all of said times mentioned in said pleadings said matrimonial community was and now is the owner of said community real property, and that Joe Novak and the said Erzsi Novak, as members of said matrimonial community, each was and now is the owner respectively of an equal, certain, and definite and present interest in the property so purchased, and the court finds that said interest vested in them respectively upon the delivery of said deed to said Joe Novak, and that said interest ever since has been and now is so vested in them respectively"; and further that appellant "is not now and at none of the times mentioned in the pleadings in this action was he the owner of any estate, right, title, or interest in or to said real property or any portion thereof"; that appellant and plaintiff were asserting an interest in the property adverse to respondent, all without right, and concluded as the legal effect of the findings that the Strybl deed was wholly void, conveyed no interest in the land, and should be canceled of record; and thereupon entered a decree adjudging respondent as against appellant and plaintiff to be the owner in fee of the land, and that her title thereto be forever quieted against all and every claim of plaintiff and appellant and each of them.

Plaintiff did not appeal. The appeal taken by Strybl is upon the judgment roll, the evidence not being brought up.

Respondent contends that the findings are sufficient to support the judgment, and therefore that the judgment must be affirmed.

[1] The action, by fair construction of the allegations of the cross-complaint, is one to remove a cloud upon the alleged community status of the land—the deed to Strybl, which on its face is not void—and is thus a proceeding under the provisions of section 3412 of the Civil Code, and not simply an action to quiet the alleged title of respondent as against adverse claims of appellant, as provided in section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The distinction in purpose and the difference in requirements as to pleading between the two proceedings are pointed out in Castro v. Barry, 79 Cal. 443, 446, 21 P. 946, 947, wherein the court said: "The distinction between the two kinds of action is clear. They are different not merely in form (for we have no forms of action in the common law sense), but in purpose. In the former case the proceeding is aimed at a particular instrument, or piece of evidence, which is dangerous to plaintiff's rights, and which may be ordered to be destroyed in whosesoever hands it may happen to be. While in the latter, the proceeding is for the purpose of stopping the mouth of a person who has asserted or who is asserting a claim to the plaintiff's property, whether such claim be founded upon evidence or utterly baseless;" and that "in an action to remove a cloud there can be no question but that the facts which show the apparent validity of the instrument which is said to constitute the cloud, and also the facts showing its invalidity, ought to be stated." Hyatt v. Calkins, 174 Cal. 580, 582, 163 P. 1007; Hibernia Sav. & Loan Soc. v. Ordway, 38 Cal. 679, 681.

Such was the purpose of the pleader in the instant case so far as it was deemed essential to a right of recovery. After alleging the acquisition of the land as community property, and that a conveyance thereof was made without her consent, in a separate paragraph the conclusion is drawn therefrom, and alleged that respondent was, by reason of the community status of the land, the owner of a definite vested interest and estate therein equally with her husband; and in the same paragraph that appellant is not and never was the owner of any estate or interest in the land or any part thereof, no facts other than as above being alleged showing or tending to show that appellant's deed was invalid or that he did not acquire thereby and then own an interest in the land. While a general allegation of ownership in plaintiff or of the invalidity of an adverse claim of defendant is usually held to be one of ultimate fact and not a conclusion of law, yet the same averment may be one of fact or of a conclusion of law, according to the context (Levins v. Rovegno, 71 Cal. 273, 12 P. 161; Turner v. White, 73 Cal. 300, 14 P. 794; Heeser v. Miller, 77 Cal. 192, 19 P. 375); and in the instant case a consideration of the whole pleading makes it clear that the allegation that appellant owned no interest or estate in the land was not an allegation of ultimate fact, but a conclusion as to the legal effect of the facts, from which respondent also concluded that her interest therein was of the character alleged, and thus stated no issue of fact.

[2, 3] It is apparent from the record that it was the conclusion of the court that respondent was at all times after June 17, 1917, as the legal effect of the community status of the land, the owner of a present, vested, definite interest and estate therein. On June 17, 1917, section 172 of the Civil Code in form, as amended in 1891 (St. 1891, p. 425), was in force; and it follows, in accordance with the decisions in the cases of Spreckels v. Spreckels, 172 Cal. 775, 158 P. 537, and Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 191 Cal. 601, 218 P. 22, that respondent did not acquire a vested interest or estate therein by the conveyance thereof to her husband as community property; and, assuming that she might before the dissolution of the community maintain an action to set aside a transfer of the property by her husband whose act was not brought within the proviso enacted as an amendment to said section in 1891—a question suggested but not decided in the Spreckles Case, supra, and in Dargie v. Patterson, 176 Cal. 714, 719, 169 P. 360—such right is not to recover the land as her separate property or as a vested interest or estate in her, but as part of the community fund, the relief in such case going only to bind the property to the extent necessary to protect the ultimate interest of the wife in case the marriage should be dissolved by divorce or the death of the husband, and not to set aside the conveyance in its entirety. Dargie v. Patterson, supra.

[4] If the finding that appellant had no right, title or interest in the land was not intended by the court as a conclusion of law, thus inadvertently placed among the findings of fact, the only allegation in the cross-complaint in form supporting such finding was the conclusion to that effect alleged therein and hereinbefore considered. It may fairly be inferred from the cross-complaint that the conveyance to appellant was by deed of grant. Such a deed is supported by a presumption of consideration, the burden of proving want of consideration is upon the one seeking to avoid it, and the presumption in its effect applies to the pleadings as well as to the proof. Civ. Code, §§ 1614, 1615; Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 39; Blair v. Squires, 59 P. 211[1]; Boye v. Andrews, 10 Cal. App. 494, 500, 102 P. 551. There being no allegation that the transaction was tainted with fraud, unless the assumption of respondent that, having a vested interest, the execution of a deed by her husband without her consent would be equivalent thereto, it was necessary, in order to state a cause of action, to allege a want of consideration for the deed, or facts showing that the consideration was so inadequate as to support the conclusion that the transfer was made for the purpose of fraudulently depriving her of her rights. This defect in the pleading is to be considered in the instant case only in connection with the findings, the appellant not having been misled or prejudiced thereby, he having in his answer raised the issue. He was, however, entitled to a finding on the issue made. If the finding that he had no interest in the land was intended by the court not as a conclusion of law but as a finding against the allegation that there was a sufficient consideration for the deed—that being the only material issue upon which a specific finding was not made—such would be consistent with the other findings and the pleadings and responsive to the only remaining issue; and we are not warranted, in view of the record, in assuming that the court based such finding, considered as one of fact, on other issues, made at the trial but not pleaded, and on such assumption construe it as supporting negatively a judgment in favor of respondent or a judgment against appellant to the extent that respondent owned the whole and appellant no interest in the land.

If the conclusion mentioned be one of law, then the conclusions of law following the findings of fact and the judgment are not supported thereby.

[5] Considered as a conclusion from the other facts found, including inferentially a want of consideration for the deed, the findings do not support the conclusions of law or the judgment to the extent that the Strybl deed was wholly void, conveyed no interest in the land, or that respondent is the owner in fee thereof; but do, as the effect of the latter construction, support a judgment in form and effect binding the property to such an extent as will protect the interests of the wife in case the marriage should be dissolved by divorce or the death of the husband. Dargie v. Patterson, supra.

The question remains whether Novak, the husband, was a necessary party to an action seeking the relief asked, or which might, in view of the facts shown by the record, be properly granted.

[6] Whatever may be the correct theory on which to base the wife's right to sue, we are of the opinion that the husband is a necessary party to the action. While he may be estopped by his deed from maintaining the action, yet, in order that he may be bound by the judgment as between him and his wife as to the character of the property transferred, whether community or his separate property, and also in order that there may be a complete determination of the controversy, and where the judgment must in terms or effect revest in him the title to any interest therein recovered in the action, he should be joined. Bachman v. Sepulveda, 39 Cal. 688. The situation appears in principle analogous to the cases where an action is brought against third parties by a stockholder to recover or protect the property of a corporation, or by a cestui que trust for the recovery of property fraudulently conveyed by a trustee, where the trustee is estopped by his acts or refuses to sue, in which cases it has been uniformly held that the corporation or trustee is a necessary party defendant in order that they may be bound by the judgment. Cook on Corporations (7th Ed.) § 738; Beach v. Cooper, 72 Cal. 99, 13 P. 161; Wickersham v. Crittenden, 93 Cal. 17, 28 P. 788; Perry on Trusts, § 886; Butler v. Butler, 41 App. Div. 477, 58 N. Y. S. 1094; Le Gendre v. Goodridge, 46 N. J. Eq. 419, 19 A. 543. It is provided by section 382 of the Code of Civil Procedure that those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants, and, as provided in section 389 of said Code, as construed in Mitau et al. v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 84 P. 145, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275, all who are interested in the subject-matter of the litigation should be made parties thereto in order that complete justice may be done, and that there may be a final determination of the rights of all parties interested in such subject-matter.

The interest in or rights of the wife over community property, as defined by the decisions hereinbefore cited, seem to be so connected with the interest and rights of the husband therein and thereover, in origin, incidents and consequences, as to make it difficult to conceive of a situation where it could more reasonably be held that parties are united in interest; and where, as here, the action has for its purpose, and, according to the prayer of the cross-complaint, seeks the cancellation of the husband's deed and the quieting of the alleged title of the wife in what is, as the legal effect of the facts pleaded, community property, we are of the opinion that the husband was a necessary party, and that the demurrer on the ground of his nonjoinder should have been sustained.

Our conclusion in this respect is not affected by the amendment to section 370, Code of Civil Procedure (Stats. 1921, p. 102), removing with few exceptions the disabilities of married women as to suing and being sued alone, the provisions of sections 382 and 389 of the Code of Civil Procedure affecting and controlling all actions by those who stand in the relations therein defined to other persons and to the subject-matter of the action.

From the foregoing it is our conclusion that Joe Novak was a necessary party to the action between appellant and respondent, that the demurrer on the ground of his nonjoinder should have been sustained, and that the findings do not support the judgment as against appellant.

The judgment as against appellant Frank Strybl is reversed.

1. Intoxicating liquors ⊂=236(9) — Unlawful possession will not warrant nuisance conviction.

Unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor alone will not warrant a conviction, under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½jj), for maintaining a common nuisance, but there must be some evidence of facts or circumstances reasonably raising the inference of a purpose to sell.

2. Intoxicating liquors ⊂=143—Unlawful possession is not nuisance.

Private possession of intoxicating liquor in a private place, though unlawfully obtained and constituting crime of unlawful possession, does not constitute nuisance under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 21 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½jj).

3. Intoxicating liquors ⊂=239(8)—Instructions in nuisance prosecution held erroneous.

Instructions in prosecution for maintaining liquor nuisance, authorizing conviction without proof that place kept was place of common resort for sale and distribution of liquor, and defining the offense as unlawful possession inside of building, held erroneous.

4. Criminal law ⊂=200(4)—Plea of former jeopardy held not available in prosecution for maintaining common nuisance, because testimony used to in part establish offense was previously used in prosecution for possession of intoxicating liquors.

Plea of former jeopardy in prosecution for maintaining a common nuisance is not by Pen. Code, § 654, made available to defendant because he has been convicted of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors, and same testimony which was used to prove the former offense is employed to in part establish the offense of maintaining the common nuisance; such crimes being different offenses, and Const. art. 1, § 13, and Pen. Code, § 1017, subd. 3, guaranteeing defendant only against double jeopardy for same offense.

On Petition for Rehearing.

5. Criminal law ⊂=202(3)—Defendant prosecuted in superior court for identical offense of which he had been previously convicted in justice's court, should be discharged.

Where defendant was prosecuted in the superior court under information which purported to charge offense of maintaining common nuisance under Volstead Act, § 21 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½jj), but which in fact charged offense only of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors, defendant having been previously convicted in justice's court for the same act, is entitled, under Pen. Code, § 1262, to be discharged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

N. R. Mehra was convicted of maintaining a common nuisance, and he appeals. Judgment reversed, and defendant discharged.

Howe, Hibbitt & Johnston, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted under an information charging him with willfully and unlawfully maintaining a common nuisance at a certain building or house numbered 1109 Fifth street, in the city of Sacramento, state of California. From this judgment the defendant appeals and assigns as grounds for reversal the following, to wit: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to establish the charge of maintaining a common nuisance; (2) that the court erred in its instructions to the jury; (3) that the defendant had been once placed in jeopardy for the same offense.

We will consider the assignments of error in the order in which they are above set forth. The evidence upon which the defendant was convicted consists of the testimony of two arresting officers, and, in so far as it relates to the offense charged, we set forth the testimony in full.

Officer Nelson testified:

"I saw the defendant on the 28th day of October, 1924, at about 11 o'clock in the morning; it was at 1109 Fifth street, city of Sacramento. Officer Balsz went with me. Just as you come off the sidewalk at 1109 Fifth street—I don't know whether it is a clubroom, or dining room, or kitchen, or what you would call it, but Mehra was in there. I asked him where his room was, and he told me it was room 3, in back, and took me back to his room, which was in the rear of 1109 Fifth street. He had the key to the padlock that was on the door. We searched the room, and found the contents of that jug on the table there back of the dresser in a barley sack. The dresser was standing across the corner of the room. I do not know the defendant's business or occupation. He did run a kind of Hindoo Club, I believe it is."

Officer Balsz testified:

"I accompanied Officer Nelson on the 28th of October, 1924, to the premises, No. 1109 Fifth street, Sacramento. We asked the defendant where his room was. He accompanied us to the room. We searched the room, and found the jug of jackass brandy. The jug has been identified. We talked to the defendant while there, but discovered later he did not understand us—could not answer in our language. He did not just say that it was his room, he did not say anything, but he took us right to this particular room and opened the door with a key, and I took it for granted it was his room. We took the jug to the police station. We placed Mehra under arrest at that time."

The remainder of the testimony of these witnesses deals with the question of former jeopardy, and is not relevant to the first assignment of error.

Section 21 of title 2 of the Act of Congress (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½jj), having for its purpose the carrying into effect of section 1 of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, prohibiting the manufacture, sale, and barter of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, reads as follows:

"Any room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered in violation of this title, and all intoxicating liquor and property kept and used in maintaining the same, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance, and any person who maintains such a common nuisance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $1,000 or be imprisoned for not more than one year, or both."

The appellant contends that the testimony in this case, and which we have set forth, did not and does not establish any offense within the language of section 21 above quoted, in that the mere fact that intoxicating liquor is found in one's possession, whether upon the person or in a building, does not, in and of itself, constitute any crime denounced by the above section, or any other provision of the act of Congress prohibiting traffic in intoxicating liquors. To answer this contention requires consideration of both the language of the Constitution and of the act of Congress in question. Section 1 of the Eighteenth Amendment reads:

"After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within * * * the United States * * * for beverage purposes is * * * prohibited."

Section 21 of the Enforcement Act must be read in the light of the constitutional provision, and the words "manufactured, sold, kept or bartered" interpreted in the light thereof. The words "manufactured, sold and bartered" have a clear and certain meaning, and need only to be mentioned to be understood. It is the word "kept" that calls for a legal definition. Should it be read as part of the sentence in which it is found, or does it denominate an offense itself, in and of itself, irrespective of the purpose for which liquor may be kept? In considering this question, and determining what is meant by the use of the word "kept," the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Street v. Lincoln Safe Deposit Co., 254 U. S. 88, 41 S. Ct. 31, 65 L. Ed. 151, also reported in 10 A. L. R. 1548, after quoting the portion of section 21 which we have hereinbefore set forth, said:

"The word 'kept' in this section is the only one of possible application to the case at bar and the words with which it is immediately associated are such that as here used it plainly means kept for sale or barter or other commercial purpose."

That case decides that there is a distinction between the mere fact of possessing liquors and keeping liquors, contrary to the provisions of said section 21, that is, while the possession, in and of itself, may be unlawful, unless that possession is coupled with the purpose of selling, bartering, or other commercial use, the offense of maintaining a common nuisance is not committed. In Singer v. United States, 288 F. 695, the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Third Circuit thus deals with the same question:

"The words 'sold' and 'kept' in this section are the ones applicable to the case at bar. [Section 21, supra.] The word 'sold' tells its own meaning. The word 'kept,'" read in connection with the words with which it is immediately associated, 'means kept for sale or barter or other commercial purpose,'" citing Street v. Lincoln Safe Deposit Co., supra.

"The test of the statutory nuisance, therefore, is not the number of sales or the length of time liquor is kept upon the premises, but is whether the place is maintained for the keeping and sale of liquor in the sense of the statute. Other essentials being present, a single sale may establish the fact. Young v. United States (C. C. A. 9th) 272 F. 967; Wiggins v. United States (C. C. A. 2d) 272 F. 41; Gray v. United States (C. C. A. 6th) 276 F. 395; United States v. Eilert B. & B. Co. (D. C.) 278 F. 659. And the keeping of liquor for this unlawful purpose for a single day may constitute the offense. Feigin v. United States (C. C. A.) 279 F. 107."

In this case, both offers to sell and sales were established by the testimony.

In Reynolds v. United States, 282 F. 256, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth District considered the question with which we are dealing, and said:

"Maintaining a nuisance, however, as punished by section 21, implies a continuity of action for a substantial period. One might be guilty of manufacture in a room, and yet not guilty of maintaining a nuisance therein. It follows that the landlord may be prosecuted under either section, according to the facts of the case."

This ruling was again affirmed by the same court in Hattner v. United States, 293 F. 381. It is there said:

"The National Prohibition Act, tit. 2, § 21, penalizing as a nuisance the maintaining of premises on which liquor is manufactured and sold, implies a continuity of action for a substantial period."

In the case of Fassolla v. United States, 285 F. 378, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth District, in considering what evidence is necessary to establish the crime of maintaining a nuisance, held as follows:

"Evidence that defendant made a sale of liquor for beverage purposes on his premises, and that he had a quantity thereon, held sufficient to sustain a conviction on three counts charging respectively unlawful sale, unlawful possession, and maintaining a 'common nuisance.'"

In this case there was evidence that the officer went to the front door of the premises, gave the password, secured admission, paid $3 for a half gallon of wine, and, on searching the premises, found and seized a quantity of intoxicating liquor, consisting of a number of bottles, several demijohns containing various quantities of wine from 1 gallon to 3 or 4, and, in answer to the contention that it did not make the defendant's residence his place of business and maintained as a common nuisance, the court further said:

"The plaintiff in error relies on the fact that the liquor was manufactured and kept at his dwelling place, and not at a place of business; but by selling it he made it a place of business, and by keeping it there for sale he made his residence a common nuisance, within the provisions of the Prohibition Act, and his possession of the liquor was unlawful."

In Barker v. United States, 289 F. 249, the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals held as follows:

"Though a single sale of liquor, or the mere unlawful possession, does not under all circumstances violate National Prohibition Act, tit. 2, § 21, making it punishable to maintain a nuisance by keeping a place for the violation of the act, the circumstances surrounding the sale or the single act of possession may be such as to warrant the inference that the single act was part of a habit, and therefore sufficient to sustain a conviction for nuisance."

In that case the evidence showed the possession of 2 gallons of corn whisky, a part of which was found in his residence, and a part under the counter of his store close by, and at his barn on the same premises were about 100 gallons of mash fit for distillation into whisky. No sale was proved. The court was of the opinion that the attendant circumstances were sufficient to show the purpose for which the liquor was being kept, and that it was being kept, as well as manufactured, for commercial purposes, and constituted maintaining the premises as a common nuisance.

In Scott v. State, 37 N. D. 90, 163 N. W. 813, A. L. R. 1917F, 1107, the Supreme Court of North Dakota held that a single sale would warrant a conviction on an information for keeping and maintaining a common nuisance by keeping a place where intoxicating liquors are sold as a beverage in violation of the prohibition law of this state. The act under which the defendant was prosecuted defined common nuisance as: (1) A place where intoxicating liquors are sold, bartered, or given away, in violation of law; (2) where persons are permitted to resort for the purpose of drinking intoxicating liquors as a beverage; and (3) where intoxicating liquors are kept for sale, barter, or delivered in violation of law. It was held that evidence of one sale was sufficient to show the keeping of a place for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, although the evidence did, in fact, establish more than one single act, and also established the drinking of liquor on the premises.

[1] In Barngrover v. State, 229 P. 301, the Court of Criminal Appeals of Oklahoma had before it the identical question presented to us in this case. The Oklahoma statute, among other things, specified that all places where any such liquor is kept, or possessed by any person, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, constituted a public nuisance. In construing this statute and the word "kept" it was held that to sustain a conviction of such a charge there must be proof tending to show that the place was a place of public resort, where intoxicating liquors were consumed, or from which distribution was made. In that case there was no testimony of sale other than that a certain person who apparently came from the place kept by the defendant had in his possession a bottle of whisky. A search of the place disclosed a small quantity of whisky, and also in the upper stories of the building a quantity of hay, which, by the odor emitted, indicated that whisky had been poured thereon. There was some testimony also as to the reputation of the place, indicating that intoxicating liquors were kept there for sale. Under this state of the evidence the court held that, even though the jury found that there was or had been whisky in the house, it did not necessarily follow that the defendant had it there for the purpose of sale, or for any illegal purpose, constituting a necessary element of maintaining a public nuisance. In other words, there must be something in addition to the mere unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor before a conviction for keeping a common nuisance could be had.

[2] In an extended note appended to the case of Scott v. State, supra, as reported in L. R. A. 1917F, beginning with page 1110, are collated a large number of cases dealing with the proof necessary to support a conviction of keeping a common liquor nuisance. An examination of these cases reveals the fact that not a single case holds that the mere showing of illegal possession is sufficient to establish such charge. A number of the cases do hold that a single sale, taken in connection with the attendant circumstances indicating a purpose and intent to conduct the business of unlawful selling intoxicating liquors, will support such a conviction, while a large number of the cases hold that a single sale is insufficient, and that there must be a series of sales. The better reasoning, we think, supports the holding that, in addition to possession, where the law raises, as in California, no presumption of purpose, from the mere fact of possession, there must be shown to establish the fact of maintaining a common nuisance, a series of sales or a single sale, accompanied by such attendant circumstances as reasonably raise the inference of the purpose for which the possession of the intoxicating liquor is had, or possession, in connection with surrounding circumstances, such as the large quantity of liquor on hand, the various kinds of liquor, the containers in which it is kept, the character of the place, the manner in which it is fitted up, the use of passwords in gaining access to the premises, evidence of people visiting the place in unusual numbers or at unusual times, all of which may reasonably raise the inference of a purpose to sell and sufficiently support the charge of maintaining a common nuisance. But we have found no case which upholds a conviction upon a lesser degree of evidence. Any other holding would lead to the conclusion that, wherever a bottle of liquor may be unlawfully in any one's home, a conviction for maintaining a common nuisance may be had. It is not the crime of keeping, but the purpose for which the intoxicating liquor is is unlawfully kept, that is aimed at in the statute prescribing punishment for maintaining a nuisance. In the case at bar there is no testimony whatever of maintaining room No. 3 at No. 1109 Fifth street, in the city of Sacramento, for any purpose. The testimony simply shows the finding of a jug of whisky or jackass brandy in the bedroom unlocked by the defendant. If it were there for his own use, even though unlawfully obtained, it is evident that nothing within the language of a common nuisance was being maintained. Private possession in a private place may constitute the crime of unlawful possession, but that act, in and of itself, does not constitute any other criminal offense, under section 21 of the act of Congress usually known as the Volstead Law. In People v. Frankovich, 64 Cal. App. 184, 221 P. 671, this court had before it the prosecution for maintaining a nuisance under section 21 of title 2 of the Volstead Act, and we refer to the facts set forth in the opinion in that case as a good illustration of what constitutes maintaining a public nuisance. Even where the statute provides that the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor is prima facie evidence that such intoxicating liquor is possessed for the purpose of unlawful sale or disposition, the presumption does not arise that the place or establishment where the liquor is kept is conducted as a common nuisance, or is maintained as a place for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor. In State v. Lesh, 132 Wash. 309, 232 P. 302, the Supreme Court of Washington under such a statute held that the possession of liquor creating presumption of intent to unlawfully sell or dispose of it does not create presumption of intention to sell it at a place maintained for sale of liquors, and refusal to so instruct was error. This case bears upon all three assignments of error herein. The trial court was asked to give the following instruction:

"While the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor is prima facie evidence that such intoxicating liquor was possessed for the purpose of unlawful sale or disposition, the mere fact of the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor in any place or establishment does not raise any presumption of law that such place or establishment was a place or establishment opened up, conducted, or maintained for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor. * * *"

The refusal to give this instruction was held error. The Supreme Court further said:

"We think appellant was entitled to have this request or the substance of it given. Its meaning is that, while there flows from the mere possession of intoxicating liquor a presumption of intention to unlawfully sell or dispose of it, there is no presumption flowing from mere possession that there is an intent to sell or dispose of the liquors at a place opened up, conducted, or maintained for that purpose. While we do not hold that the request was wrong, we are of the view that it would have been better and more complete had it contained the idea that the proof of possession might be considered by the jury, together with other facts in determining whether appellant was a jointist. [Maintaining a nuisance.] The instruction given, unless qualified as suggested, might easily mislead the jury into the belief that an inference of guilt as a jointist would arise from the mere fact of possession."

This latter sentence refers to the instructions which were given by the court to the effect that possession was prima facie evidence that the liquor was kept for purposes of unlawful sale, etc.

Upon the first assignment of error, we hold that the evidence in this case is not sufficient to support a conviction of maintaining a common nuisance. As the case must go back for a new trial, it is necessary to pass upon both the second and third assignments of error. At the request of the people, the court gave two instructions, which we have numbered 7 and 8, as follows:

Instruction No. 7: "The provisions of the National Prohibition Act of October 28, 1919, commonly called the Volstead Act, forbids the possession of intoxicating liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent. or more of alcohol by volume for beverage purposes, and, if you believe from the evidence in this case to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant did, at the time and place charged in the information, to wit, at No. 1109 Fifth street, maintain the house at said number, and did then and there knowingly have in his possession intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, and that said liquor then and there contained more than one half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, then I instruct you that the house in which said intoxicating liquor was kept and possessed is, under the law, a common nuisance, and the person maintaining such common nuisance is guilty of a misdemeanor."

Instruction No. 8: "Upon the plea of once in jeopardy and former conviction, the court instructs the jury that evidence sufficient to convict for unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor under the Volstead Act would not alone support a conviction for maintaining a nuisance. A person may be unlawfully in possession of intoxicating liquor without being guilty of maintaining a nuisance.

"In order to convict the defendant for maintaining a common nuisance under section 21 of title 2 of the Volstead Act, there must be evidence of the keeping or possession of the house where the liquor was unlawfully kept, which element is not necessary to the proof of the crime of unlawfully possessing intoxicating liquors.

"The court further instructs you that the conviction of defendant in the police court of the city of Sacramento on November 6, 1924, of the crime of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors, as charged in the complaint in the police court, as a matter of law, does not bar a prosecution of defendant for maintaining a nuisance at 1109 Fifth street, as charged in the information on file in this case, and upon defendant's plea of once in jeopardy and former conviction, it is your duty to return a verdict for the people."

[3] By instruction No. 7 the jury is expressly told that the having in possession at house No. 1109 Fifth street of intoxicating liquor containing more than ½ per cent. of alcohol by volume constituted the crime of maintaining a common nuisance. This interpretation excludes from section 21 of title 2 of the Volstead Act the very gist of the offense denounced by the act of Congress, to wit, the maintaining of a place of common resort for the sale and distribution of intoxicating liquor—a place where people may go and buy the prohibited article.

By the eighth instruction the jury is advised that the offense of unlawful possession is transformed into a different crime, if that unlawful possession is inside instead of outside of a building. The statute makes no such distinction. Unlawful possession, as unlawful possession, is simply unlawful possession whether the forbidden article is upon the person or within a building. The mere fact that the defendant takes a flask of whisky or a bottle of jackass brandy into his residence does not, in and of itself, constitute his home a common nuisance. Such an interpretation of section 21 of title 2 of the Volstead Act would make the offense of unlawful possession and maintaining a common nuisance one and the same, and therefore amenable to the plea of once in jeopardy, where conviction has first been had on account of the unlawful possession. Neither one of the instructions comply with the cases which we have cited holding that the liquor must be kept for sale or barter, or, as said in most of them, for a commercial purpose. Where the testimony shows only unlawful possession, whether in or out of a building, conviction can be had only for the offense of unlawful possession, and instructions based thereon and advising that conviction can be had upon such testimony in a prosecution for maintaining a common nuisance are erroneous, and do not correctly state the law.

Both instructions permit of conviction upon testimony showing simply unlawful possession. In the case of Key v. State (Okl. Cr. App.) 234 P. 791, where the defendant was charged with willfully and unlawfully having in his possession certain intoxicating liquors, with intent to sell, barter, etc., the trial court instructed the jury as follows:

"If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, Gus Key, did in Carter County, Okl., on or about the 31st day of January, 1922, have possession of Jamaica ginger, you will find the defendant guilty," etc.

In passing upon this charge, the Supreme Court ruled as follows:

"The instructions given by the court are fundamentally deficient. Possession alone of intoxicating liquor is not a crime against the laws of this state, much less the possession alone of a medicated alcoholic compound in a drug store; there must be coupled with such possession an unlawful intent to convey, sell, or otherwise furnish the same in violation of the prohibition ordinance and laws of the state. While the statute makes the possession of more than one quart of spirituous liquor in one's place of business 'prima facie evidence of an intent to violate the law,' this phase of the case was not submitted to the jury, as the trial court refused to give the defendant's requested instruction based on his theory of defense in rebuttal of any such presumption, if any, arising from the quantity of the compound possessed. The court not only failed to instruct the jury on this theory of defense, but the instructions given make evidence of possession conclusive proof of guilt."

While the statute under which this case was being prosecuted differs in its wording from section 21 of title 2 of the Volstead Act, its meaning, as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States, is the same, as is held by the Oklahoma court, that the word "kept" means kept for sale, which makes the ruling of the Oklahoma Supreme Court directly applicable, in that mere unlawful possession alone is not sufficient to sustain or support the charge given to the jury in that case, and likewise the holding must be that the charge given to the jury in this case that proof of possession in a house is sufficient to establish the offense of maintaining a common nuisance is not a correct statement of the law. There must be proof, and a correct statement of the law requires the proving and finding that the liquor kept is kept for the purpose of barter or sale, and an instruction which permits of a conviction without including this element in a nuisance charge is not a correct statement of the law.

Is the plea of once in jeopardy well founded? To support this plea the defendant introduced in evidence a record of his conviction of the unlawful possession of the intoxicating liquor mentioned in the testimony, which we have hereinbefore set forth, and a large number of authorities have been cited to support appellant's contention. Appellant's argument rests upon section 654 of the Penal Code, which reads:

"An act or omission which is made punishable in different ways by different provisions of this code may be punished under either of such provisions, but in no case can it be punished under more than one; an acquittal or conviction and sentence under either one bars a prosecution for the same act or omission under any other. In the cases specified in sections six hundred and forty-eight, six hundred and sixty-seven, and six hundred and sixty-eight, the punishments therein prescribed must be substituted for those prescribed for a first offense, if the previous conviction is charged in the indictment and found by the jury."

We have no controversy and take no exception to the rulings had in the different cases cited by appellant, but we think the whole argument is founded upon a misapprehension of the plain wording of this section. As we have seen, the first clause of that section, "an act or omission which is made punishable in different ways by different provisions of this Code," may be punished under either of such provisions, but in no case can it be punished under more than one. The error of appellant lies in the failure to apprehend the fact that the act or omission constituting the crime known as the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor is a separate and distinct offense from that of maintaining a nuisance for the sale of such liquor. The act or omission is not made punishable in different ways. The Volstead Act names different acts constituting different offenses, and punishes each act separately. There is not a word in the Volstead Act, as we read it, which makes an act punishable in different ways. They are all different acts, different offenses, and different punishments. In People v. Arnarez, 230 P. 193, in a case where the defendant was charged with unlawfully manufacturing liquor, and the jury returned a verdict of unlawful possession, this court held:

"A reference to the Volstead Act, the penal provisions of which were incorporated into the law of this state, shows that the offense of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors and the manufacture of intoxicating liquors or sale for beverage purposes are separate and distinct offenses, even though they are so connected that, under the procedure admissible to be followed and ordinarily followed in the federal courts, said offenses are set forth in distinct and separate counts, and the jury authorized to find the defendant guilty upon the particular count or counts sustained by the evidence. See Fassolla v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 285 F. 378, in which the defendant was prosecuted under a count charging unlawful sales, and under a count charging unlawful possession. * * * The offense of unlawful possession in the crime of unlawful manufacture are separately and distinctly defined in the Volstead Act, and separate and distinct penalties for the separate offenses fixed and particularly set forth. We see no difference in the application of the principle concerning distinct offenses in this case from that which was applied by the federal court in the cases of Bell v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 285 F. 145; Massey v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 281 F. 293; Singer v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 288 F. 695, and Page v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 278 F. 41, where it was held, as set forth in 33 C. J. 617, that 'the offense of unlawfully possessing liquor is a distinct offense from that of the unlawful transportation of liquor, and the offense of unlawfully possessing liquor is a distinct offense from that of maintaining a nuisance for the unlawful sale of liquor.'"

In Panzich v. United States, 285 F. 871, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals held:

"Acquittal on a charge of selling liquor is not inconsistent with conviction for maintaining a common nuisance by keeping a place where liquor was unlawfully kept for sale."

In State v. Wold, 96 Me. 401, 52 A. 909, the Supreme Court of Maine ruled that—

"Having liquors in possession with intent to sell in violation of law, and maintaining a common nuisance are distinct offenses, and an acquittal of the former is no bar to a conviction on the latter, even upon the same facts," citing Com. v. McCauley, 105 Mass. 69; Morey v. Com., 108 Mass. 433; Com. v. Sullivan, 150 Mass. 315, 23 N. E. 47.

In Singer v. United States (C. C. A.) 288 F. 695, supra, summing up the cases on the question of alleged double prosecutions, the court used the following language:

"They have held specifically that the offense of unlawfully possessing liquor is a distinct offense from that of the unlawful transportation of liquor, and that the offense of unlawfully possessing liquor is a distinct offense from that of maintaining a nuisance for the unlawful sale of liquor. For these several offenses, separate convictions may be had and separate sentences imposed," citing the cases which we are considering herein.

The mere fact that testimony showing the unlawful possession of liquor and a prosecution had upon such a charge is used in part as the testimony to establish the offense of maintaining a common nuisance, which must go further and establish an additional and, as said by the foregoing authorities, a different offense from that of unlawful possession of the liquor, does not constitute a second prosecution for the same offense. It is simply using the testimony applicable to one offense as a part of the testimony for establishing a distinct and separate offense. That these offenses are separate see Ferry v. U. S. (C. C. A.) 292 F. 583; Beyer v. United States (C. C. A.) 282 F. 225. In Ex parte Moore, 233 P. 805, the District Court of Appeal of the Second District of this state, considering the question of the Volstead Act defining separate and distinct offenses, approved the rule which we are considering in the following language:

"However, we do not find it necessary in this case to determine whether the evidence is sufficient to show probable cause for believing petitioner guilty of selling the liquor, for it unquestionably suffices to show probable cause for believing him guilty of possessing it unlawfully. 'Possession,' says the court in Beyer v. United States (C. C. A.) 282 F. 226, 'is a crime separate and distinct from the crime of the sale of liquor.' In title 2, § 3 (section 10138½aa) of the National Prohibition Law, it is expressly declared that 'no person shall * * * possess any intoxicating liquor except as authorized in this act.' Possession, therefore, except as authorized by the Volstead Act, is one of the acts which the Wright Act, by its adoption of the 'penal provisions' of the federal statute, denounces as a criminal offense."

In People v. Townsend, 214 Mich. 267, 183 N. W. 177, 16 A. L. R. 902, the Supreme Court of Michigan in dealing with the plea of once in jeopardy, sets forth the following test:

"The test is not whether the defendant has already been tried for the same act, but whether he has been put in jeopardy for the same offense. A single act may be an offense against two statutes; and if each statute requires proof of an additional fact which the other does not, an acquittal or conviction under either does not exempt the defendant from prosecution and punishment under the other."

In the case at bar, as we have seen, a prosecution and conviction of the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor simply does not and would not support a conviction for maintaining a common nuisance for the sale or barter of such liquor. Some additional facts must be made to appear before a conviction on a nuisance charge can be had. This case is identical with the test here imposed. The additional fact to be proven, i. e., the keeping for sale, etc., is necessary. That the testimony, sufficient in a former care, is used in part to prove the case upon the prosecution of the nuisance charge, which must go further and establish what in some states has been held to be a continuous and persistent intent to violate the law by maintaining a place for the unlawful sale of liquor, does not, in any sense, subject the defendant to a double prosecution for one offense. The offense and the acts are separate. In State v. Marchindo, 65 Mont. 431, 211 P. 1093, the Supreme Court of Montana, passing upon a similar question, held that the offenses are separate and distinct, and a prosecution for one does not bar a prosecution for what is denoted as a separate and distinct offense. After reviewing a long list of authorities, that court thus expresses its view:

"Our opinion is that the authorities cited herein sustain the principle that the true test to be applied in cases of this nature is whether the same evidence would sustain a conviction under each count, or does each count require proof of an additional fact which the others do not. Or, to state it in another way: Would the evidence required to support a conviction upon one of the counts have been sufficient to warrant a conviction upon the others? Applying this test, it is apparent that in the information in this case the same evidence would not sustain a conviction under each count; that each count required proof of an additional fact which the others did not.

"It is apparent that evidence sufficient to convict for unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor would not alone support a conviction for either the unlawful possession of such liquor or for maintaining a nuisance. A person may be unlawfully in possession of intoxicating liquor without making any sale thereof or being guilty of maintaining a nuisance, and be convicted of such unlawful possession. In order to convict for maintaining a common nuisance under section 19 of the act, there must be proof of the keeping or possession of the place where the liquor is either unlawfully kept or sold, which element is not necessary to the proof of either the crime of unlawfully selling or unlawfully possessing intoxicating liquor."

In the case at bar the gravamen of the charge is the keeping of a place for the unlawful sale of liquor, as heretofore defined, and the mere unlawful possession of such liquor is not sufficient to sustain the nuisance charge.

In People v. Brannon, 233 P. 88, the District Court of Appeal for the Second District of this state, in a very carefully prepared opinion, clearly draws the distinctions between acts punishable differently and different offenses to prove which the testimony introduced may, in part, show the same acts. We quote therefrom the following:

"The prohibition of the Constitution is against putting a person twice in jeopardy for the 'same offense.' Article 1, § 13. See, also, Pen. Code, § 1017, subd. 3. It is the identity of the offense, and not of the act, which is referred to in the constitutional guaranty against putting a person twice in jeopardy. The Supreme Court of Ohio, in an opinion of exceptional vigor and rugged forcefulness, repudiates the tendency of some courts to construe the words 'same offense' as meaning the same act or transaction. 'The constitutional provision,' says that court in State v. Rose, 89 Ohio St. 383, 106 N. E. 50, L. R. A. 1915A, p. 256, 'uses the word "offense." Layman and lawyer alike understand the word "offense" to here mean simply a crime. * * *

The words "same offense" mean same offense, not the same transaction, not the same acts, not the same circumstances or same situation. * * * It is not enough that some single element of the offense charged may have a single element of some other offense as to which the defendant had theretofore been in jeopardy, but the constitutional provision requires that it shall be the "same offense." * * * Numerous decisions can be cited to sustain the contention of the defendant as to his former jeopardy. Some of these decisions may be accounted for by a difference in the constitutional provisions, but more of them are accounted for by the fact that the courts have usurped the power of the law maker and the constitution maker and have added something to or subtracted something from the plain provisions of the laws and constitution. * * * Courts too frequently fall into the very common error of assuming to interpret everything in the line of legal language. The utter folly and wholesale abuse of construing words that need no construction and of interpreting language that needs no interpretation has led to much of the judicial confusion and most of the irreconcilable diversity of court decisions. There can be no stability about law until there be certainty about law, and when the constitution maker or statute maker uses a plain phrase, a simple sentence and a workaday word, with a clear, simple and unmistakable meaning, it is almost criminal in a court to scramble what is simple and confuse what is clear, under the mask of its right to construe.' "

[4] From what has been said there is no escape from the conclusion that there is no merit in the plea of former jeopardy in this case. The law carefully and distinctly defines the offenses of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor, and the maintenance of a common nuisance. These offenses are all separate and distinct. They are distinct offenses, not simply different punishments affixed to the same act. They are separately defined, set forth, and made punishable by the Volstead Act, and the mere fact that the evidence or testimony used in one case to prove the crime there charged may be used, in part, to prove a different offense upon a different charge does not support the plea of former jeopardy. The act of Congress having made the offenses with which we are dealing separate, and the state of California, through what is known as the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), having incorporated the same into the penal laws of this state, officers and courts are under the legal necessity of following the law just as it is written. We think it clearly appears that Congress, in defining and making penal the distinct offense of maintaining a common nuisance, was evidently framing a law so as to curb the activities of persistent offenders, and not to punish twice for the same offense.

For the reasons set forth under the first and second assignments of error herein the judgment of the trial court is reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; ANDERSON, Justice pro tem.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [5] Petition for rehearing by the plaintiff; petition by the defendant for modification of the order heretofore made and entered in this action. From the fact that the information in this cause charged only unlawful possession, an offense of which the superior court has no jurisdiction, and the record shows that the defendant has already been convicted in the justice's court of the identical offense for which this prosecution is had upon the same testimony, and that no legal conviction can be had herein, it follows that the portion of the order remanding said cause to the trial court for further proceedings should be vacated, and no new trial directed.

The order heretofore entered is therefore amended to read: Judgment reversed, and defendant discharged, as required by section 1262 of the Penal Code. Petition for rehearing denied.

PEOPLE v. FULLER. (Cr. 843.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 8, 1925. Rehearing Denied July 8, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 6, 1925.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⟸238(1)—In prosecution for maintaining common nuisance, evidence held sufficient to warrant submitting cause to jury.

Where evidence in prosecution for maintaining common nuisance showed that defendant kept house purported to be maintained for letting furnished rooms, that several gallons of various kinds of liquor were concealed therein, and that house was resorted to by numerous persons at unusual hours, who remained but a short time, some of whom came in taxicabs, held sufficient to warrant submitting cause to jury.

2. Intoxicating liquors ⟸239(8)—Instruction in prosecution for maintaining common nuisance held erroneous.

In prosecution for maintaining a common nuisance under Volstead Act, § 21 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½jj), instruction that defendant was guilty if he maintained a certain house, and knowingly had in posession intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, held erroneous without charge concerning purpose for which liquor was kept, and error was not cured by Const. art. 6, § 4½.

On Petition for Rehearing.

3. Criminal law ⊂=202(3)—Defendant prosecuted in superior court for identical offense of which he had been previously convicted in justice's court, should be discharged.

Where defendant was prosecuted in the superior court under information which purported to charge offense of maintaining common nuisance under Volstead Act, § 21 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½jj), but which in fact charged offense only of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors, defendant having been previously convicted in justice's court for the same act, should, under Pen. Code, § 1262, be discharged.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

J. S. Fuller was convicted of maintaining a common nuisance, and he appeals. Judgment reversed, and defendant discharged.

Ray T. Coughlin, of Sacramento (George E. Foote, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted under an indictment charging him with willfully and unlawfully maintaining a common nuisance at a certain house or building, numbered 1417 Twenty-Second street, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California. From the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial the defendant appeals, and assigns as grounds for reversal, to wit: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to establish the charge of maintaining a common nuisance; (2) that the court erred in its instructions to the jury; (3) that the defendant had been once placed in jeopardy for the same offense.

This case was submitted upon the briefs filed in the case entitled People of the State of California, etc., v. N. R. Mehra (Criminal No. 849) 238 P. 802, this day decided by this court, wherein the same questions were involved, and it will therefore suffice to refer to the said opinion for the authorities cited and upon which the opinions in that case and in this case are founded.

Conviction was had in this case upon the following testimony:

T. W. Pearson, a police officer, testified as follows:

"On the 8th of October, 1924, I visited the premises known as 1417 Twenty-Second street in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California. I went there about 9 p. m. I was accompanied by Officer Babayco. The building is a two-story dwelling situate on the corner adjoining an alley on Twenty-Second street. We entered the building that evening. We went up to the back door and knocked. The defendant came to the door. We said, 'Hello, Speed,' and the defendant opened the door, and admitted us. I had not been in that house before that night. We had been around there, but not in the house. We noticed frequent visitors to the place, men and women entering the house during the day and during the night, machines driving up, taxis, people coming in and staying a little while, and coming out again. Some of the evenings there were constant machines there, sometimes two or three at a time. At the particular night in question we went into the kitchen off the back porch. The defendant was there. There was a lady there also. She gave the name of Ruth Davis. When we got inside we told him we were police officers, and had come to search the place. We asked him if he lived there, and he said he did. We noticed the people coming and going, but could not say as to their sobriety, but we have seen people that were coming in and out of there, staying a few moments and coming out. We could hear them talking a half a block away. We were not close enough to tell whether they were under the influence of liquor. We searched the place. I went into the pantry; there was a sink there, lots of glasses, several empty bottles, a buzzer running to the front door. The button is in a cabinet right back of the front door in a sort of clothes cabinet. Mr. Babayco searched the upstairs. I saw the liquor that Mr. Babayco found. We found three one-gallon jugs of wine, four one-quart bottles of brandy, one quart bottle of wine, and a pint bottle of brandy. We took possession of the liquor, and arrested the defendant, and also Ruth Davis. We did not know the defendant's name, but we noticed that 'Speed' was what everyone else said who went to the door, so we gave the same password. We said, 'Hello, Speed,' and he opened the door. Since that time I have noticed the sign there reading 'Furnished rooms to let.'"

Officer Babayco testified:

"I accompanied Pearson to 1417 Twenty-Second street on the night of October 8, 1924. It was about 9 o'clock in the evening. I saw the defendant, Fuller, there at that time. We went in the back yard and we saw a few fellows come out of there, and they used the word of 'Speed,' so we walked up to the back door, and said, 'Hello, Speed,' knocked at the door first, and he opened the screen door, and admitted us. On the second floor we found a trap in the floor of one of the bedrooms. It was just about the center of the room. There was a rug on top of this trap. One of the corners was not tacked to the floor; the rest of it was. All that was necessary was to lift the corner of the rug up, and to lift it up far enough and you could see the trap. I lifted the trap up, and found all the wine and jackass in there. It was a square hole between the ceiling of the first floor and the second floor. It must be about 12 inches deep, 16 by 16 inches square. I found in there three one-gallon jugs of wine and four one-quart bottles of jackass brandy, and then three one-quart bottles of wine, and two one-pint bottles of jackass brandy."

[1] The defendant pleaded guilty in the police court to the charge of unlawful possession of the same liquor. While the testimony in this case does not show any actual sales of liquor, it does show that the place was being resorted to by a number of people at unusual hours; that such people were resorting to the place for some purpose that required but a comparatively short stay. Their coming and going in such numbers and staying only so short a time and at unusual hours stamped the place as being one used for purposes other than that of merely letting furnished rooms. The place where the liquor was concealed, the quantity of liquor on hand, the various sizes of the containers, the empty bottles found in the sink, the conveyance of people thereto in taxis, the unusual hours of visitation, and the fact of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, all taken together, we think, presents a question for the jury to determine whether the place was or was not then being used as a place for the unlawful sale and distribution of intoxicating liquor. Under the authorites which we have cited in the case of People v. Mehra, supra, we think there was sufficent evidence to warrant the submission of this cause to the jury upon the charge set forth in the indictment.

Upon the question of once in jeopardy, the authorites cited in the Mehra Case are also conclusive against the contentions of this appellant.

Upon the conclusion of the testimony, the court gave to the jury the following instructions relative to maintaining a nuisance. These instructions we have numbered 6 and 7 and are as follows, to wit:

Instruction 6: "The provisions of the National Prohibition Act of October 28, 1919, commonly called the Volstead Act, forbids the possession of intoxicating liquor containing one-half of 1 per cent. or more of alcohol by vol ume for beverage purposes, and, if you believe from the evidence in this case to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant did, at the time and place charged in the indictment, to wit, at number 1417 Twenty-Second street, maintain the house, and did then and there knowingly have in his possession intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, and that said liquor then and there contained more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, then I instruct you that the house in which said intoxicating liquor was kept and possessed is, under the law, a common nuisance, and the person maintaining such common nuisance is guilty of a misdemeanor."

Instruction 7: "If you believe from the evidence to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that the defendant, J. S. Fuller, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California, in the month of October, A. D. 1924, did then and there maintain the house at number 1417 Twenty-Second street, in the city of Sacramento, and did willfully and unlawfully possess and keep in the house on the premises maintained by him at number 1417 Twenty-Second street, in said city of Sacramento, certain intoxicating liquors then and there containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, then I instruct you that his keeping or possessing of such intoxicating liquor in said house on said premises constitutes, under section 21 of the Volstead Act, a common nuisance, you should find the defendant guilty as charged."

[2] It will be seen by these instructions that the question of the purposes for which the intoxicating liquors were possessed or kept was entirely taken away from the consideration of the jury, and the jury directly informed that possession of the liquor at or in the house in question constituted the offense of maintaining a common nuisance. As we have seen by the authorities cited in the Mehra Case, supra, such is not a correct statement of the law. Under such instructions the jury would be warranted in finding the defendant guilty, even though no crime specified in the section of the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½ jj), under which he is being prosecuted, had been committed. Mere having possession of intoxicating liquors is not sufficient. It must be kept for sale, barter, or other commercial purposes. Unlawful possession of liquor in a building, or outside of a building, is simply unlawful possession of liquor. The mere fact that the man owns a building or controls a house or a building, and unlawfully has possession of intoxicating liquors therein, does not constitute the crime of maintaining a common nuisance. The instructions which we have quoted directs the jury to convict upon a state of facts showing nothing further.

While, as we have stated, we think the facts set forth in the transcript in this case warranted the submission of the case to the jury, we cannot say that the error of the court is obviated by section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. We find in the transcript no instructions accurately defining the offense for which the defendant was being prosecuted, but we do find that the instructions given on the subject directly authorized the jury to find the defendant guilty upon a state of facts not constituting the crime charged in the indictment. Under such circumstances we cannot say that there has not been a miscarriage of justice. The remainder of the testimony outside of possession are facts from which inferences may be drawn, and the jury should have been instructed concerning the purposes for which intoxicating liquor was kept and the inferences allowable to be drawn from all the attendant circumstances.

For the reasons hereinbefore given, and, also as set forth in the opinion in the case of People v. Mehra, supra, upon the briefs in which case this cause has been submitted, the judgment and order of the trial court are reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings, in accordance with this opinion and the opinion in the Mehra Case.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; ANDERSON, Justice pro tem.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [3] Petition for rehearing by the plaintiff; petition by the defendant for modification of the order heretofore made and entered in this action. From the fact that the information in this cause charged only unlawful possession, an offense of which the superior court has no jurisdiction, and the record shows that the defendant has already been convicted in the justice's court of the identical offense for which this prosecution is had upon the same testimony, and that no legal conviction can be had herein, it follows that the portion of the order remanding said cause to the trial court for further proceedings should be vacated and no new trial directed.

The order heretofore entered is therefore amended to read: Judgment reversed, and defendant discharged, as required by section 1262 of the Penal Code. Petition for rehearing denied.

PEOPLE v. BUONOCORE. (Cr. 850.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⊂⊃213—Information held not to charge offense of maintaining common nuisance; "beverage."

In prosecution for maintaining common nuisance, information reciting that defendant unlawfully maintained a common nuisance, in that he kept in possession and on certain premises intoxicating liquor for "beverage purposes and not for sacramental or medicinal purposes," held, in view of Pen. Code, § 952, subd. 3, not to charge the offense, since to constitute offense defendant must maintain a place for unlawful sale of liquor; the word "beverage," when used in statute relating to intoxicating liquors, meaning only liquor that is capable of being drunk.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Beverage.]

2. Criminal law ⊂⊃93—Unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors is not an offense within jurisdiction of the superior court.

Information charging unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors at a certain building does not constitute an offense within jurisdiction of the superior court.

3. Intoxicating liquors ⊂⊃143—Offense of maintaining common nuisance cannot be established by proof only of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors within building.

Offense of maintaining common nuisance cannot be established by proof only of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors, though such possession be within a building; evidence being required to show the building is maintained as a place for the unlawful sale of the liquor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Salvatore Buonocore was convicted for maintaining a common nuisance, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

George E. Foote, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of maintaining a nuisance upon an information in the following words and figures, to wit:

"Salvatore Buonocore is accused by the district attorney of said county of Sacramento by this information of the crime of maintaining a common nuisance, committed as follows: "The said Salvatore Buonocore, on the ——— day of November, A. D. 1924, in the said county of Sacramento, in the said state of California, and before the filing of this information, did then and there willfully and unlawfully maintain a common nuisance at a certain building or house situate at 412 R street, in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California, in that the said defendant did then and there willfully and unlawfully possess and keep on the premises aforesaid certain intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, and not for sacramental or medicinal purposes, the said intoxicating liquor then and there containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol by volume, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the people of the state of California."

The defendant's motion for a new trial being denied, the cause has been appealed to this court. Upon being arraigned on the information referred to, the defendant filed a demurrer stating six grounds of objection, only two of which we need to consider, to wit, the second, which reads as follows: "That said information does not comply with section 952 of the Penal Code of the State of California in this: That it cannot be ascertained therefrom the offense charged or the particular circumstances of the offense charged which are necessary to constitute a complete offense," and the fourth assignment, to wit: "That said information is defective in this: That it charges two of the same offenses in the same paragraph and said defendant cannot understand whether or not he is charged with the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor or is charged with maintaining a common nuisance."

[1, 2] It is evident from a reading of the information that the intent of the pleader was to charge the defendant with maintaining a common nuisance. It is also evident from a reading of the information that the pleader did not have in mind the acts necessary to constitute the offense of maintaining a nuisance. The pleader did not set forth in the information, as required by the third subdivision of section 952, supra, acts to constitute the offense with which the pleader was seeking to charge the defendant. By name the pleader charges the defendant with maintaining a common nuisance, but, when it comes to stating the acts upon which the accusation was based, there is stated nothing further than the acts constituting unlawful possession. The mere statement that the intoxicating liquors are possessed for beverge purposes does no change the offense charged from that of unlawful possession to that of maintaining a common nuisance. The word "beverage," when used in statutes relating to intoxicating liquors, simply means liquor that is capable of being drunk. 33 C. J. 493; 7 C. J. 1148; and 1 Words and Phrases, First and Second Series. Nor does the fact that the liquors are alleged to have been possessed at a certain house, numbered 412 R street, in the city of Sacramento, add anything to the designation of the crime. As we have heretofore shown in the opinion filed in the case of People v. Mehra, 238 P. 802, decided by this court on the 8th day of June, 1925, unlawful possession in a house is no different from unlawful possession upon the person. Unlawful possession is simply unlawful possession. The crime of maintaining a nuisance, as clearly shown in the opinion to which we have referred, consists in keeping liquor for sale, barter, or commercial purposes, and not simply in the mere unlawful possession of liquor. The offense as set forth in the information in this case is simply that of unlawful possession at a certain building or house, and does not constitute an offense within the jurisdiction of the superior court. The demurrer does not raise directly the question of jurisdiction, but, as the demurrer must be sustained for the reasons before given, we make this statement in order that expense to the county may be saved in framing informations charging the maintenance of nuisances in liquor cases. We may also add that in the case of People v. Mehra (Cal. App.) 238 P. 802, and also in the case of People v. Fuller (Cal. App.) 238 P. 809, the sufficiency of the information to charge an offense other than simply the offense of unlawful possession was not considered, because counsel did not tender that question to the court for decision. The demurrer to the information herein should have been sustained. This case also presents the same questions relative to the instructions given by the court as presented in the case of People v. Mehra and People v. Fuller, supra, and for the reasons therein stated it must be held that the instructions given by the court to the jury were prejudicially erroneous. What we have also said in the two cases referred to relative to the plea of former jeopardy is applicable here.

[3] The offense of unlawful possession and the offense of maintaining a nuisance are different, and, while unlawful possession would necessarily be shown in proving the maintenance of a nuisance, to wit, a place for the sale, barter, and distribution of intoxicating liquors for commercial purposes, the latter offense is not established by simply showing possession within a building. The demurrer in this case shows that the defendant was in possession of a considerable quantity of wine; that the defendant had purchased a ton of grapes; had crushed the same; and had possession of the wine derived from the crushing of said grapes in a cellar of the dwelling house occupied by him. The defendant sought to show that this possession was for his own use; that is, for the use of himself and family. The transcript shows that the defendant while upon the stand was asked the following question: "What did you have that wine for?" Following this question a considerable colloquy ensued which we need not here set forth further than to state that the court sustained the objection of the prosecution thereto, and, in so doing, stated its views as follows:

"The objection will be sustained. The Constitution, or the Volstead Act, or the Wright Act, which provides that a person can use it for their own use, doesn't relieve them from the penalty provided by law for having this in their possession or maintaining a nuisance."

Just previous to this ruling the court stated that it was immaterial that the defendant had the wine for his own use. This ruling on the part of the court was clearly erroneous. A person may be unlawfully in possession of intoxicating liquor, but, if his possession is for his own use, such possession does not constitute the crime of maintaining a nuisance. The offense is still unlawful possession, and, while the prosecution had not proven anything more than unlawful possession, the defendant was being prosecuted for the offense of maintaining a nuisance, even though he was charged with such an offense, and he had a right to show the purposes for which he had possession. While not necessary to a decision herein, we have expressed our views upon this question in order that the distinction between the offense of unlawful possession and the offense of maintaining a nuisance may be, if possible, more clearly set forth, and also the testimony that may be properly presented to the jury in the different cases. For the reasons herein stated, and in the opinions in the cases to which we have referred, the judgment and order of the trial court are reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to sustain the defendant's demurrer to the information herein.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; THOMPSON, Justice pro tem.

PEOPLE v. RICO. (Cr. 857.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 12, 1925.)

Criminal law ⊜1186(4)—Where a defendant is convicted of an offense with which he is not charged, no erroneous rulings can be held as cured or nonprejudicial.

Where a defendant is convicted of an offense with which he is not charged, no erroneous rulings can be held cured or nonprejudicial, under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Manuel Rico was convicted for maintaining a nuisance, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

George E. Foote, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER. J. The defendant was convicted of maintaining a nuisance, and from the judgment following conviction appeals to this court. The information upon which the defendant was tried is identical in form and substance with the information in the case of People v. Salvatore Buonocore, 238 P. 812, this day decided, save and except the location of the building or house in which the intoxicating liquors were found. To this information the defendant filed a demurrer in form and substance the same as that considered in the case just referred to, and for the reasons therein stated we hold that the demurrer should have been sustained. The instructions given in this case are identical with the instructions considered and held erroneous in the case of People v. Mehra, 228 P. 802, and People v. Fuller, 238 P. 809, decided by this court on the 8th day of June, 1925, and for the same reasons it must be held that the instructions were erroneous. This action was also prosecuted upon the fact that the defendant was found in possession of a small flask of intoxicating liquor, and, for the reasons stated in the opinion filed in the case of People v. Mehra, supra, it must be held that such fact does not constitute the offense of maintaining a nuisance. Where a defendant is convicted of an offense with which he is not charged, no erroneous rulings can be held as cured, or nonprejudicial, under the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution.

Upon the authority of the cases just referred to in the opinions, deciding the cases to which we have referred, it is ordered that the judgment of the trial court be and the same is hereby reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to sustain the defendant's demurrer to the information filed in this case.

PEOPLE v. JOHNSON. (Cr. 853.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 12, 1925.)

Criminal law ⊜409—The corpus delicti of an offense cannot be established by evidence of an extrajudicial admission of defendant.

The corpus delicti of an offense cannot be established by evidence of an extrajudicial admission of defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Nels Johnson was convicted of maintaining a nuisance by having unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Reversed.

Richard P. Talbot and George E. Foote, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted of maintaining a nuisance by having unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor at 3016 W street in the city of Sacramento on the ——— day of December, 1924. The conviction was had upon the theory that unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor within a building constituted the crime of maintaining a common nuisance. The information in this case is similar to the information in the cases of People v. Buonocore, 238 P. 812, and People v. Rico, 238 P. 814, this day decided by this court, but, as counsel for the defendant has urged no objection to the information, we refrain from making any ruling thereon. The testimony in this case showing unlawful possession only, what we have said in the case of People v. Mehra, 238 P. 802, decided by this court on the 8th day of June, 1925, is applicable here. The instructions given by the court in this case are also identical with the instructions given in the Mehra

Case, and for the reasons therein stated, must be held erroneous.

In this case, according to the testimony of one witness, there appears an extrajudicial admission of the defendant that he had peddled some liquor, but the rule is well established that the corpus delicti of an offense cannot be established by such testimony. For the reasons set forth in the opinion filed in the case of People v. Mehra, supra, the judgment of the trial court must be and the same is hereby reversed.

PEOPLE v. HOGEL. (Cr. 863.)

Criminal law ⊂=410—Argument of counsel in addressing either court or jury is not admissible in any subsequent trial for the same cause.

Argument of defendants' counsel in prosecution for maintaining a nuisance made upon preliminary examination of defendant and another held improperly admitted; such statements not coming within the principle applicable to admissions formally made and entered in course of trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

F. P. Hogel, true name F. P. Hogle, was convicted for maintaining a nuisance in having possession of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Reversed.

George E. Foote, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. The defendant was convicted of the offense of maintaining a nuisance by having in his possession a jug containing about a gallon of intoxicating liquor at a certain building or house occupied by him at 714 in the alley between M and N streets, in the city of Sacramento, and appeals from the judgment of conviction. The evidence in this case shows nothing further than the mere possession of the liquor referred to, and upon the authority of the case of People v. Mehra, 238 P. 802, and People v. Fuller, 238 P. 809, decided by this court on the 8th day of June, 1925, it must be held that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a prosecution for the alleged offense of maintaining a nuisance. The instructions in this case are identical with the instructions held erroneous in the cases to which we have referred, and the same ruling must be had here. The plea of once in jeopardy was also interposed, upon which appeal the same ruling must be had as in the cases to which we have referred. In this case no demurrer was interposed to the sufficiency of the information to charge the offense of maintaining a nuisance, and, while it is apparent that the crime of maintaining a nuisance is not charged in the information, in the absence of any objection urged by counsel for the defendant, we refrain from making any ruling thereon. The transcript shows that in the trial of this case the prosecution, over the objection of the defendant, read to the jury a portion of the argument made by counsel for the defendant upon the preliminary examination of the defendant and one Roberts. The argument to which we refer is as follows:

"Mr. Foote: No defense. I think, your honor, there may be some question here as to the ownership of the liquor, but it would seem that, as to the defendant Roberts, it is the police officers' testimony that Hogle was the owner of the place. Now, I don't think that the testimony could or would warrant the court in holding the defendant Roberts to answer in the superior court on the charge of maintaining a nuisance, because it wouldn't matter whether it was his liquor or Hogle's liquor or anybody else's. He just happened to be there, and I think the court, in justice to Roberts, should dismiss the charge against him, and then, if Mr. Hogle has any defense in the Superior Court, why, of course, he could make that in the event your honor holds him to answer. * * *

"Of course, we feel that the evidence against him is insufficient, but we are willing to submit the matter to the court, but, in justice to Mr. Roberts, why, I don't think the district attorney here even states the mere presence—I might go to a place where there was some intoxicating liquor there and the police might arrest me. I don't see where, if I was a visitor there, I could be held for maintaining a nuisance. The law is that he must be in possession of the premises, and there is no testimony here that Roberts was in possession of the premises. Roberts was fined $200 or 90 days, and he is doing the 90 days, and I think it would be unjust to inflict any more punishment upon him."

The defendant, being on the witness stand in this trial, was asked if he did not hear his counsel make these statements at the preliminary examination. We do not think it necessary to cite any authorities to show that the mere argument of counsel in addressing either the court or jury is not admissible in any subsequent trial. They do not come within the principle applicable to admissions formally made and entered in the course of a trial.

The judgment of the trial court is hereby reversed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; THOMPSON, Justice pro tem.

SHERLOCK et ux. v. ALTURAS STATE BANK et al. (Civ. 2833.)

1. Chattel mortgages ⟸262(1)—Sale must be in accordance with law unless expressly provided otherwise.

Sale under a chattel mortgage must be as provided by law, unless expressly otherwise directed by mortgagor either in the mortgage or other manner of authorization.

2. Chattel mortgages ⟸176(4)—Finding that defendant's sale of mortgaged sheep was unauthorized, sustained.

In a chattel mortgagor's action against the mortgagee for conversion of sheep covered by the mortgage through a private sale thereof by the mortgagee alleged to have been made without authority, evidence held to sustain a finding that no authority to make the sale had been given.

3. Chattel mortgages ⟸176(4) — Statutory ratification of mortgagee's private sale, made without authority, not shown.

Where mortgagor gave a mortgage to defendant on 1,600 head of sheep, and defendant without authority from mortgagor sold 617 of the sheep at private sale, crediting the mortgagor among other ways by deposit of $120 in bank of defendant, mortgagor later drawing $131 from the bank, having been informed she could draw that much, held, evidence did not show a ratification sufficient to comply with Civ. Code, § 1589.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1056(6)—Exclusion of testimony as to value, which is supported by other evidence, if error, is harmless.

In an action for conversion of sheep, the ruling out of testimony offered as to their value, if error, was not prejudicial, since the record showed ample testimony to support the findings as to such value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action of conversion by Walter Sherlock and wife against the Alturas State Bank and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. S. Baldwin, Oscar Gibbons, and Robnett & Wylie, all of Alturas, for appellants.

J. E. White, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. This is an appeal by the defendants Alturas State Bank, A. Hafer, and J. F. Hansen from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in an action brought against the defendants for the alleged conversion of 617 head of sheep belonging to the plaintiffs, taken and removed by the defendants from a larger band of sheep owned by said plaintiffs. It appears from the transcript that the plaintiff Anna Sherlock was the owner of a certain band of sheep numbering some 1,600 head, running and being in the county of Modoc, in the state of California. On or about the 5th day of November, 1921, the plaintiffs made and executed a certain promissory note payable to the defendant Alturas State Bank, in the sum of $8,500 payable eight months after date, bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. At the same time and to secure the payment thereof, the plaintiffs executed a certain chattel mortgage covering said band of sheep and the increase thereof, and delivered the same to the defendant Alturas State Bank. No question is raised as to the sufficiency and regularity of said mortgage. The mortgage is in the usual form and, among other things, contains the following provisions:

"It is also agreed that if the mortgagors shall fail to make any payments as in the said promissory note provided, then the mortgagee may take possession of said property, using all necessary force so to do, and may immediately proceed to sell the same in the manner provided by law, and from the proceeds pay the whole amount in said note specified."

The note was not paid at maturity and considerable correspondence ensued between the plaintiff Anna Sherlock and the defendant A. Hafer, the cashier and representative of the defendant Alturas State Bank, relative to the sale and disposition of said band of sheep and also of certain lands and premises belonging to the plaintiffs. On or about the 30th day of September, 1922, the defendant A. Hafer, acting for the defendant Alturas State Bank, purported to sell and turned over and delivered to the defendant J. F. Hansen 617 sheep selected from said larger band of 1,600 head mortgage as aforesaid, and received in payment from the said Hansen the sum of $6,170. Upon receipt of a check from Hansen, drawn in favor of the plaintiff for said sum, the defendant A. Hafer, without having communicated with the plaintiffs as to the manner in which said check was drawn, indorsed the names of the plaintiffs on said check, turned the same over to the defendant bank, and thereupon the defendant bank indorsed a credit on the note owing by the plaintiffs to said bank in the sum of $5,500, indorsed a credit of $500 on the note held by the bank in favor of one P. C. Webber, theretofore executed and delivered by the plaintiffs, and placed to the credit of the plaintiff Anna Sherlock the sum of $120, aggregating the full amount of the check drawn by the defendant Hansen as aforesaid.

The plaintiffs, alleging that said sale was made without authority and against their protests and for a sum considerably less than the value of the sheep, began this action. The court found the value of the sheep to be $12.-

50 per head, and entered judgment to the effect that plaintiffs were entitled to and gave plaintiffs credit upon the note herein referred to, held by the defendant bank in the further sum of $2,092.50. The court also found that the $500, claimed to have been paid by the bank, to P. C. Webber, was not in fact paid by the bank, and, by stipulation, in open court at the time of the hearing hereof, it was made to appear that the said P. C. Webber note has been paid by plaintiffs, since the beginning of this action and was not, in fact, ever paid by the defendant bank.

Upon this appeal it is urged:

(1) That plaintiffs waived a judicial sale, and therefore there was no conversion;

(2) That the sale as made was previously authorized by the plaintiffs;

(3) That the sale was ratified by plaintiffs by reason of their voluntary acceptance of the benefits after having full knowledge of all the facts.

The findings of the trial court were against all of these contentions, the trial court holding that no authorization had ever been given to make the purported sale; that the sale as made was against the consent of the plaintiff Anna Sherlock, who was found by the court to be the owner of said sheep; and that the said plaintiff immediately demanded a return of said property. The court also found that there was no ratification of said sale.

At the time of the execution of the chattel mortgage and during the times mentioned herein, the band of sheep covered by the said mortgage was also leased to the Charles Grenade Company of Alturas, Modoc county, Cal., and in the mortgage it was provided that one-half of the net proceeds from the band of sheep mortgaged to the appellant upon the note herein referred to, until the sum was fully paid and that the Charles Grenade Company might turn over such moneys or proceeds to the defendant Alturas State Bank. Until the period of the alleged conversion set forth in plaintiffs' complaint, the defendant Alturas State Bank had not, nor had any of the defendants herein, had any possession of said band of sheep, or of any portion thereof. It further appears that on or about the 27th day of September, 1922, the defendants Hafer and Hansen examined said band of sheep, had some conversation relative to the sale of what was called the "cross-breds" included in said band; the thoroughbreds of said band being called "coarse wools." On the 27th day of September the defendant Hafer telegraphed to the plaintiff Anna Sherlock as follows:

"Have sold seven hundred at ten dollars. Will deliver Friday. If you want come up, draw on us."

This telegram was received by the plaintiff Anna Sherlock on the 28th, who thereupon immediately replied as follows:

"Cannot accept offer ten dollars for seven hundred sheep. Must sell all. Please do not deliver sheep. Letter. Walter and Anna Sherlock."

This telegram was received by the defendant Hafer on the 28th day of September, 1922, and the contents thereof communicated to the defendant Hansen on the same day. Notwithstanding the receipt of this telegram, the defendant Hafer proceeded to sell 617 head of sheep to the defendant Hansen, and the said defendant Hansen received and paid therefor the sum mentioned on the 30th day of September, 1922. It thus appears that the defendants had knowledge of the direction of the said plaintiff Anna Sherlock, the owner of said sheep, not to consummate the proposed sale, before there had been any delivery thereof and, also, before any portion of the purchase price had been paid. Under this state of facts, the appellant claims that the plaintiffs had given the defendant Hafer a prior authorization to sell said sheep. We do not find any written authority to that effect, but we do find the following correspondence between the parties relative to the sale of the entire band of sheep: The first letter is by the defendant Hansen to the plaintiff, Anna Sherlock, and, omitting address and signature, is as follows:

"I wish you would write me a line and advise me whether you think it would be advisable to sell them for a little less, if we should happen to get an offer on them? We have a lot of people that wants to buy, but have no money to buy them with, so for that reason it is going to be hard to make a sale, but I think probably I could sell them for eight and one-half, or nine dollars per head. It looks like when you say ten dollars, that it scares them all out as they think the price is too much. Please advise me as to what you think about the price?"

To which letter the plaintiff Anna Sherlock replied:

"Your letter of August 3d came last night and I hasten to answer same. Now I realize all that you say about age and coarse wool, and the asking and selling price, but I also believe that in thirty to sixty days there will be a better price. You see the South American countries have a great shortage of sheep and wool this year and with the big tariff of thirty-three cents on scoured wool, there should be a good stiff market this fall. Walter wrote to C. E. Sherlock and told him to confer with you and I believe if you write to him, he will make an effort to get a good price for them.

"Of course, if the folks who make inquiry for them at $10.00, cannot buy because they have no money, the same condition would obtain at nine dollars, or even eight and one-half; if they have no money, they cannot buy at any price. Now, we are willing to take a net price of twenty-five thousand dollars for the whole thing, and I believe Chas. Grenade Co. will take them at that. Of course this price is between us and if C. E. Sherlock could get a better price, I think I am entitled to a little consideration."

There was also some oral testimony to the effect that there had been some conversation and correspondence between the defendant Hafer and the plaintiff Anna Sherlock, in which the plaintiff Anna Sherlock stated that if she could sell the whole band of sheep and the lands belonging to her and pay up all of her indebtedness, she would be glad to do so, but we have been pointed to no testimony which either directly or indirectly authorized the defendant Hafer to sell only a part of the sheep included in said band. Some argument has been made as to whether the 617 head of sheep selected from said larger band were not the pick of the band, but as no finding has been made thereon, it is needless for us to discuss that question. The letter referred to in the telegram sent to the defendant Hafer on the 28th of September, 1922, and received by him on that day, is as follows:

"We received your telegram last night, and after thinking it over know that you would agree with us that if we could not sell all the sheep, that Grenade would not run the ones that are left, so we would not know what to do with them. Then, too, the residue would be deemed culls and bring only the price of culls. Now we must try and get a sale of everything, so that all creditors will be taken care of. That is only justice. I had word from Andrew Leonard, asking if we would sell six hundred. Of course we would not consider such a sale. As soon as a proper sale can be made I will go up there and help to settle things the best I can. * * *"

The remainder of the letter has no bearing upon the question.

Upon the trial of the case, the defendant Hafer, upon the subject of his authority to sell, testified as follows:

"Q. By the Court: Mr. Hafer, at the time you sold these sheep, did you sell them as agent of Mrs. Sherlock, or did you sell them under the authority of the mortgage? A. I sold them under the authority of the mortgage, to satisfy the mortgage.

"Q. By the Court: Mr. Hafer, did you authorize Mr. Hansen to take them by virtue of the mortgage? A. Yes sir."

It was stipulated by counsel during the course of the trial that the sale of said sheep was not made in the manner provided by law, that the notices required to be given were not given, and that the proceedings provided to be had and taken upon a sale, either of pledged property or foreclosure sale, were not taken and had. There does appear in the transcript some testimony on the part of the defendant Hansen that the plaintiff Anna Sherlock and himself did discuss the question of a private sale. His testimony is as follows:

"A. I said that if we had to foreclose this mortgage under the law the cost would be so much, and that if we put the sheep up at a sheriff's sale, they would bring nothing like what they would at a private sale, and the best plan was to make a private sale of them if possible.

"Q. What, if anything, did she reply to this suggestion on your part? A. She said, 'That is the only way.' She said: 'Under no consideration whatever do I want this mortgage foreclosed. Under no consideration whatever.'"

It also appears that in one of the letters written by the plaintiff Anna Sherlock to this witness that she used the following expression:

"Do the best you can about the sheep, but do not be in too big a hurry. I am sure we will get a better price later."

We do not need to discuss the cases cited by appellant which hold that a mortgagor of chattels may either by the terms of the mortgage or by subsequent authority authorize a mortgagee, or its agent, to take possession and sell personal property other than as provided by law upon the ordinary foreclosure of a mortgage, or the sale of personal property, for the simple reason that the provision of the mortgage, which we have hereinbefore set forth, does not authorize any such procedure; nor is there any provision in the mortgage by which any such authority is given; nor do we find anything in the testimony in the transcript different from that which we have set forth herein, save and except the alleged testimony of the plaintiff Anna Sherlock that she had never authorized any sale of a portion of said band of sheep, and that immediately upon being advised of the sale about to be made of 617 head thereof, she telegraphed and wrote as hereinbefore set forth. The law is well settled that a power of sale, if given in a chattel mortgage, must be exercised in accordance with the provisions thereof. Henderson v. Fisher, 38 Cal. App. 270, 176 P. 63. This was a case in which this court said:

"The failure to sell in accordance with the manner provided by law rendered the sale void."

In this particular case it was found by the court that the property was sold for less than its value, and the identical judgment was entered therein with the judgment entered in the instant case, to wit:

"Additional credit directed to be entered on the indebtedness owed by the mortgagor."

See, also, Blodgett v. Rheinschild, 56 Cal. App. 728, 206 P. 674; Bendel v. Crystal Ice Co., 82 Cal. 199, 22 P. 1112; Parke v. Frank, 75 Cal. 364, 17 P. 427; Peet v. People's Trust, etc., Bank, 56 Cal. App. 46, 204 P. 413.

[1, 2] Other cases might be cited, but these cases sufficiently establish the rule which we have just set forth, to wit, that the sale must be as provided by law, unless expressly otherwise directed by the mortgagor, either in the mortgage or by some subsequent manner of authorization. We think the facts disclosed by the record in this case, and which we have hereinbefore set forth, amply support the finding of the trial court that the owner of the band of sheep in question had given no authorization to the defendant Alturas State Bank, the mortgagee, or its agent and cashier, Hafer, to make sale of a part of said sheep, whether the pick thereof or otherwise, and that the defendant Hansen had knowledge of the telegraphic protest of said plaintiff against the sale of a portion of said sheep. No point is made by counsel on either side that the number of sheep sold and delivered does not comply with the number mentioned in the telegram sent by the defendant Hafer, and therefore we do not consider the discrepancy in determining this case.

After the alleged sale had been made by the defendant Hafer to the defendant Hansen, the defendant Hafer wrote to the plaintiff Mrs. Anna Sherlock and inclosed with his letter a deposit slip in the following words and figures:

Alturas State Bank.

Deposited by Mrs. A. D. Sherlock, Alturas, Cal., Sept. 30, 1922:
Checks as follows	$6,170 00
Less on Dannhauser note	550 00
	$5,620 00
Less paid note	5,500 00
	$ 120 00

Thereupon, and before beginning of this action, the plaintiff Anna Sherlock went to Alturas, interviewed all of defendants, demanded the return of the sheep, which were not returned, and also in the month of November withdrew from the defendant bank the sum of $131. It is upon the fact of the withdrawal of said sum of $131 that the appellants base their contention that the proceedings relative to the sale of said sheep were ratified by the owner, Anna Sherlock, citing in support thereof section 1589 of the Civil Code, which reads:

"A voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting."

The trial court found against the contentions of the appellants on the subject of ratification, and it is argued that this finding is against the evidence. It may be premised that ratification is not tendered as an issue in the pleadings, but does appear to have been tendered by the testimony and found by the court. Appellants have set forth a portion of the testimony upon which this contention is based, but a review of the whole testimony shows that the trial court correctly determined this question. The testimony of the plaintiff upon this question, on cross-examination, is as follows:

"Q. Now with this letter in which Mr. Hafer said he was depositing $120 on your checking account you got a copy of this deposit slip, is that correct? A. Yes.

"Q. What did you do with that $120, if anything? Do you understand the question? A. Yes, I understand the question.

"Mr. White: I submit that there is no showing that she got $120, or if she did anything with it.

"The Court: Let her answer if she knows. A. I don't know now.

"Q. Did you draw it out of the bank? A. I drew some money out of the bank.

"Q. Didn't you draw all that was on your checking account out of the bank about the 3d day of November? A. I drew out $131 on the 6th and 7th of November.

"Q. Was there anything left in your checking account after you drew the money out? A. There should have been.

"Q. Was there? A. I don't know.

"Q. Mrs. Sherlock, didn't you draw every cent out of your checking account on the 3d day of November, 1922, that the bank books showed was there? A. I drew out $131.

"Q. I don't think you understand the question.

"Mr. White: I submit that the bank books are the best evidence of what the bank books showed.

"Q. Didn't you draw on the 3d day of November, 1922, every cent that you had in your bank account, or that you had power to draw at that time? A. No, sir.

"Q. How much money did you think you had power to draw? A. I thought I had some more money there.

"Q. How much more money did you think you had? A. $165.

"Q. Did you ask the bank officials how much you could draw? A. I asked Mr. Cummings; yes, sir.

"Q. You asked him how much you could draw, and he told you $131, didn't he, Mrs. Sherlock? A. I do not know what he told me, but I drew $131.

"Q. Let me get that straight, didn't you at that time draw every cent that they told you you had power to draw? A. I just told you I did not draw all I thought I had the right to draw.

"Q. Didn't you on the 3d day of November draw every cent you were told you had the power to draw at that time? A. I have answered that."

[3] The testimony of the officers of the bank show only that Mrs. Sherlock was informed as to the amount she could draw out. It appears that the bank was about to be closed and was closed shortly afterwards and that Mrs. Sherlock went to the bank to secure some funds. We think the testimony falls very short of complying with the section of the Code in relation to ratification, in that it fails to show a number of material elements, and does not show that the plaintiff was aware that she was withdrawing all the money she had on deposit, but that she was under the impression she had considerable more.

[4] Upon oral argument of this cause it was made to appear that at the time of the trial appellants sought to secure admission in evidence of a letter in which the plaintiff Anna Sherlock had written that if she could secure a certain sum for the entire band of sheep owned by her and, also, for the lands and premises owned by her in Modoc county, she would be willing to accept the figure therein named, and that the land was worth a certain sum, and therefore that the plaintiff was willing to sell the band of sheep for a sum per head not greater than that obtained for the 617 head of sheep delivered by the defendant Hafer to the defendant Hansen. The admission of this testimony was sought in order to offset the testimony of the plaintiff as to the value of the sheep per head. While, for such purposes, we think the testimony was admissible, yet it is true that an offer to sell is not evidence, in and of itself, of the market value of the thing offered to be sold, especially when coupled with conditions as appear in this case, yet even though it be held that the ruling out of such testimony was error, it cannot be considered as prejudicial, because the record discloses ample testimony to support the findings of the court as to the value of the sheep delivered by the defendant Hafer to the defendant Hansen as hereinbefore set forth.

We think the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; THOMPSON, Justice pro tem.

ROEMER et al. v. NUNES et al. (Civ. 5180.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃863—Court cannot reverse order denying motion to vacate judgment, because complaint fails to state a cause of action.

On appeal from an order denying a motion to vacate a judgment, court cannot reverse the order, because complaint fails to state a cause of action.

2. Judgment ⊂⊃18(2)—Not rendered void, because complaint fails to state a cause of action.

A judgment is not void, because complaint does not state a cause of action, if court had jurisdiction of parties and subject-matter and complaint apprised defendant of nature of plaintiff's demand.

3. Appeal and error ⊂⊃863—Judgment not void and not subject to be set aside on appeal from order denying motion to vacate it, where complaint sufficiently stated cause of action to give court jurisdiction of the cause.

Judgment for plaintiff, on note against defendant as partner of maker, held not void, because complaint, after alleging defendant's liability, set out note, which showed obligation to be individual debt of maker, where defendant, though served with summons, did not appear until after judgment had been entered against him, and complaint was sufficient to inform him of the nature of plaintiff's claim and gave court jurisdiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Alfred Roemer and others, copartners, doing business under the firm name and style of Roemer, Roemer & Silva, against Frank S. Nunes and M. S. Nunes. Judgment for plaintiffs by default. From an order denying the motion to set aside the judgment, defendant last named appeals. Affirmed.

Fred A. Schaeffer, of Santa Maria, for appellant.

Preisker & Goble, of Santa Maria, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by defendant M. S. Nunes from an order denying his motion to set aside a judgment entered against him for $2,658.58 after his default had been entered. The motion was made upon the ground that the judgment roll shows upon its face that the judgment against said defendant is void. This position is predicated upon a contention that the complaint does not state a cause of action against said defendant.

In the caption of the complaint, Frank S. Nunes and M. S. Nunes, copartners, are named as defendants. In the body of the complaint it is alleged:

"That defendants are copartners doing business as a copartnership. That on or about the 2d day of January, 1919, the defendants made, executed, and delivered a certain promissory note, which in words and figures is more particularly set forth as follows, to wit:

" 'Agreement to Purchase.

" '$699.44. Santa Maria, Cal., Jan. 2, 1919.

" 'One day after date I promise to pay to Roemer, Roemer & Silva, copartners at the city of Santa Maria, state of California, the sum of six hundred ninety-nine and 44/100 dollars for the following described property, to wit: Mdse. per bill received.

" 'I acknowledge receipt of said property and agree to keep the same in good order and repair. I also agree that until the total price of said property with interest is fully paid, said property will remain the property of said firm of Roemer, Roemer & Silva, and that I will not incumber or dispose of the same until full payment has been made by me. I agree to pay interest on the amount unpaid at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum payable annually. When the total price and interest has been fully paid, and not before, the title to said personal property shall vest in the undersigned by virtue of this instrument. I agree to pay all taxes and assessments of any kind whatsoever which may become due and payable upon said property. I agree that if I fail to pay any of said sums when due or to become due, or fail to perform any of the aforesaid or hereinafter mentioned conditions, or should said property be attached or levied upon, or should said property be burned or otherwise destroyed, then at the option of the said firm of Roemer, Roemer & Silva the entire unpaid balance of this contract with interest shall in any of said cases immediately become due and payable to the said Roemer, Roemer & Silva, and the said firm may enforce payment of the entire amount unpaid, or if said firm so elects the said firm of Roemer, Roemer & Silva may take possession of said property. It is understood that delay in enforcing any of the provisions of this agreement shall be no waiver of the rights of the said firm, but in case of any extended delay, the said firm may proceed to enforce the terms hereof by giving me a one day's notice by mail, addressed to me at Guadalupe, Cal., of the said firm's intention to require me to comply strictly with the terms of this agreement without further delay. In case suit is brought under this contract for payment or to recover possession of said personal property, I promise to pay a reasonable attorney's fee in said suit in all matters herein mentioned which may be incurred or paid by said firm of Roemer, Roemer & Silva.

"'[Signed] Frank S. Nunes.'"

Then follows an allegation of nonpayment of said note:

"For a second cause of action it is alleged: That the defendants are copartners doing business as a copartnership. That on or about the 11th day of March, 1918, the defendants made, executed, and delivered a certain note in writing to the plaintiffs which in words and figures is more particularly set forth as follows, to wit:

"'$1,060.79. Santa Maria, Cal. Mch. 11, 1918.

"'On demand after date, without grace, at 12 o'clock M., I promise to pay to the order of Roemer, Roemer & Silva at the First National Bank of Santa Maria one thousand and sixty and 79/100 Dollars, United States gold coin, value received, with interest from date until paid, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, interest payable at maturity, and if not so paid to become a part of the principal and bear like interest until paid. And further agreeing that if the same is not paid when due, and suit be brought to collect the same, to pay a reasonable per cent. on the sum due as attorney's fees for collection.

"'[Signed] Frank S. Nunes.'"

Then follows an allegation of nonpayment and this prayer:

"Wherefore, plaintiffs pray judgment against the defendant for the sum of six hundred ninety-nine and 44/100 dollars together with interest thereon from the 2nd day of January, 1919, at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and the sum of one thousand sixty and 79/100 dollars, together with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from the 11th day of March, 1918, and the sum of two hundred fifty dollars attorney's fees, together with costs of this suit."

It is to be observed that while it is alleged that the defendants made, executed, and delivered a certain promissory note, the instrument set forth and designated a promissory note shows that it was signed by Frank S. Nunes; that it is in the singular form throughout. The complaint does not state that the note or contract sued upon was made for the benefit of M. S. Nunes or for any partnership to which he was a party. While the complaint contains an allegation that the defendants are copartners doing business as a partnership there are no averments that the obligation sued upon was a partnership one nor that the defendants are being sued as copartners.

[1-3] Clearly this pleading is defective, and could have been attacked upon demurrer. However, appellant, though served with summons and a copy of the complaint, did not appear, and made no objection to the complaint until after his default and judgment had been entered against him. This being an appeal from an order denying a motion to vacate a judgment, and not an appeal from a judgment, this court cannot reverse said order, because the complaint fails to state a cause of action. For it is settled that such a situation does not render a judgment void. In the case of Christerson v. French, 180 Cal. 523, 182 P. 27, it was said:

"The respondent contends further that the judgment is void because the complaint fails to state a cause of action. It is well established that a judgment is not void if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, irrespective of whether or not the complaint states a cause of action so long as it apprises the defendant of the nature of the plaintiff's demand. Blondeau v. Snyder, 95 Cal. 521 [31 P. 591]; Mayo v. Ah Loy, 32 Cal. 477 [91 Am. Dec. 595]; In re James, 99 Cal. 374 [33 P. 1122, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60]; Canadian, etc., Co. v. Carlita [Clarita], etc., Co., 140 Cal. 672 [74 P. 301]; Brush v. Smith, 141 Cal. 466 [75 P. 55]; Crouch v. Miller, 169 Cal. 341 [146 P. 880]; Gillespie v. Fender, ante [180 Cal.] p. 202 [180 P. 332]; California Casket Co. v. McGinn, 10 Cal. App. 5 [100 P. 1077, 1079]. We think the complaint herein sufficiently states a cause of action to inform the defendant of the nature of the claim against him, and to give the court jurisdiction of the cause."

Likewise, in the instant case, we think the complaint sufficiently states a cause of action to inform the defendant and appellant of the nature of the claim against him, and to give the court jurisdiction of the cause. The judgment therefore is not void and not subject to the attack which appellant has made upon it.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: NOURSE, J.; STURTEVANT, J.

FRANKLIN v. CHURCHILL CO. et al.
(Civ. 2854.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 22, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court. Aug. 20, 1925.)

1. Judgment ⟸743(2)—In mandamus to compel issuance of patent to state lands, judgment held conclusive of rights of petitioner to land.

In an action under Pol. Code, § 3414, to determine conflicting claims to state lands, judgment of Supreme Court, refusing application of defendant for mandamus to compel issuance of patent to it for lands involved, held conclusive of its rights in controversy.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1194(3)—Judgment, pleaded in same form as offered at former trial, refusal of which was held error by Supreme Court, held sufficiently pleaded.

Judgment, pleaded in substantially same form in which it was offered at first trial of case, by supplemental complaint, refusal of which was held error by Supreme Court, held sufficient.

3. Appeal and error ⟸171(3)—Failure to plead that judgment was duly made or prove facts giving court jurisdiction held immaterial.

Where in first trial of case, refusal to allow judgment to which defendant was a party to be pleaded as supplemental complaint was held reversible error, and on second trial, the pleading was accepted and case tried and decided upon theory that it raised issue of res judicata, failure to plead that judgment was duly given or made, or to prove facts giving court that rendered it jurisdiction, at time it was offered in evidence, held not vital omissions.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1071(2)—That negative conclusion of law not necessary to support judgment was confusing, held not to require reversal.

That a negative conclusion of law of trial court, which was not necessary to support judgment, might be confusing, held not to warrant reversal, especially where evidence would warrant no finding which would support contentions of party seeking reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by W. B. Franklin against the Churchill Company and others, to determine rights of parties growing out of conflicting applications to purchase certain public lands. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jacob P. Wetzel, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Arthur W. Bolton, of San Francisco, and Tapscott & Tapscott, of Yreka, for respondent.

SHIELDS, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought under the provisions of section 3414 of the Political Code to determine the rights of the parties hereto growing out of conflicting applications to purchase certain lands of the state of California, alleged herein to be swamp and overflowed lands. The facts related to the controversy are confused and complicated, but in so far as they appear to be necessary to the decision of this appeal they may be thus briefly stated.

On the 11th day of October, 1872, one Presley A. Dorris made application under the law of 1868 for a large body of land, some 5,120 acres, of which the land involved in this action is a part. Thereafter, and upon certain proceedings being had, on the 4th day of June, 1874, the register of the state land office issued to Dorris a certificate of purchase for said larger body of land, as swamp and overflowed land. This certificate of purchase was numbered 4185 and covered this entire area of about 5,120 acres including, as stated, the lands here in question.

The interest of Dorris in this certificate, and of any right which might arise under it, passed by mesne conveyances to Churchill Company, the defendant herein. The purchase of this land was not completed by Dorris nor by any of his successors in interest, including the Churchill Company, the present owner and holder of the certificate.

Thereafter and on the 10th day of April 1917, the plaintiff herein made application to the surveyor general of the state of California to purchase the lands involved in this action, the same being a part of the larger tract covered by certificate No. 4185, theretofore issued to Presley A. Dorris. The contest, which thereupon arose as to which of the two applicants was entitled to purchase the land involved herein, was thereupon referred by the surveyor general to the superior court of Siskiyou county for adjudication. In pursuance of this reference this action was begun on the 12th day of June, 1917.

It further appears that before the application of the plaintiff herein had been filed, and on the 4th day of April, 1916, the state of California began an action in the superior court of Siskiyou county to foreclose the rights of Churchill Company to the larger tract of land claimed by it under certificate of purchase No. 4185 and to cancel said certificate. Such proceedings were had in that action that a judgment was rendered against the Churchill Company as prayed for, foreclosing its rights to said lands and to said certificate, but providing that any time within 12 months the said Churchill Company might redeem said lands by paying to the county treasurer all delinquent interest, accrued interest, and costs. This judgment was rendered on the 4th day of January, 1917. Thereafter and before the expiration of the 12 months provided for in the judgment, and after the filing of the complaint herein, the defendant Churchill Company presented to the county treasurer of Siskiyou county its certificate of purchase and tendered him all costs, interest, and principal due on account of the purchase price of the larger tract of land covered by said certificate of purchase, and took the other steps required by law to entitle it to demand a patent. The tender and demand were refused by the county treasurer on the ground that there was then pending the contest involved in this action, and similar contests for other portions of the land covered by this certificate No. 4185.

The Churchill Company thereafter, and before the trial of this action in the Superior court of Siskiyou county, began a proceeding in mandamus in the Supreme Court of the State of California to compel the issuance to it of the patent, to which it contended it was legally entitled. This proceeding was entitled "Churchill Company, a Corporation, Petitioner, v. W. S. Kingsbury, Surveyor General, etc., Respondent." Issue was joined in this proceeding and, upon the facts being stipulated by the parties, the matter was heard by the Supreme Court.

[1] That court on the 24th day of July, 1918, rendered its decision in which it held that "the petitioner has not established his right to any relief" and in which it ordered that the alternative writ of mandate previously issued should be discharged and that the proceeding be dismissed. See Churchill Co. v. Kingsbury, 178 Cal. 554, 174 P. 329. Thereafter the case now before the court came on for trial. The plaintiff herein moved the trial court for leave to file a supplemental complaint setting up the judgment in the case of Churchill Co. v. Kingsbury, which he claimed was a final adjudication that the defendant had no right to purchase the land involved in this action. Permission to file such supplemental complaint was denied, and after making a record of his claim of right to file such supplemental complaint, and after the court's refusal to permit him to do so, plaintiff offered no evidence, and upon judgment going against him, he appealed to the Supreme Court from such judgment. Upon the hearing of such appeal, the judgment was reversed with instruction to the lower court to permit the filing of the supplemental complaint setting up the judgment in the action of Churchill Co. v. Kingsbury. A retrial of this action was thereafter had, and from the judgment therein in favor of the plaintiff this appeal was taken. The judgment in the Churchill v. Kingsbury Case was pleaded by supplemental complaint and introduced in evidence at the trial. It is with reference to the effect of this judgment that this appeal is chiefly concerned. Plaintiff contends that this judgment was a final and complete adjudication that the defendant had no right under certificate of purchase No. 4185, or otherwise, to locate or purchase the lands here involved. This claim was fully concurred in by the trial court, which decided the case against defendant upon this theory. In this view we fully concur, not alone upon independent reasoning, but as well because we believe that the Supreme Court has so declared. In 1917 one Reynolds filed an application to purchase a portion of the larger tract of land previously located by Presley A. Dorris and covered by certificate of purchase No. 4185, which certificate had been in the meantime and was then held and owned by the Churchill Company, the defendant herein. The contest which thereupon arose was, as was the contest here, referred to the superior court of Siskiyou county for determination. At the trial of this latter case, Reynolds offered in evidence the proceedings in the mandamus case of Churchill Co. v. Kingsbury, 178 Cal. 554, 174 P. 329. Reynolds claimed that the judgment in this case was conclusive against the Churchill Company. Objection to this offer was sustained by the trial court. Judgment went against the plaintiff, and he appealed. It will be seen that the proceedings in this case exactly paralleled the proceedings here. Upon this appeal the Supreme Court said:

"We have reached the conclusion that the mandamus proceedings are conclusive of the rights of the respondent [Churchill Company] to purchase the land under its certificate of purchase." Reynolds v. Churchill Co., 187 Cal. 546, 202 P. 865.

In this opinion the Supreme Court further said:

"It follows from the foregoing that the trial court was in error in excluding the judgment and record in the mandamus proceeding, which record was conclusive against the Churchill Company. The trial court should have rendered judgment declaring that the Churchill Company had no right of purchase." Id. 550, 202 P. 867.

This case was in all substantial respects identical with the case now before us. If the trial court in that case should, as stated by the Supreme Court, "have rendered judgment declaring that the Churchill Company had no right to purchase" the land there in controversy, it should, as it did, have done so in this case. We do not have to make this deduction from the identity of the cases; the Supreme Court has so ordered in this case. In an opinion rendered by that court on appeal after a previous trial of this case, it is definitely said that upon a new trial, upon a presentation of the judgment in Churchill v. Kingsbury, the trial court must decide against the defendant, and bases this conclusion upon the reasons stated in Reynolds v. Churchill Co., which in direct terms it specifically adopts. Franklin v. Churchill Co., 187 Cal. 556, 202 P. 869.

This statement of the effect of the judgment and the duty of the trial court has clearly become the law of the case. 4 Corp. Jur. 1213; Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 168 Cal. 128, 142 P. 83; Peoples Lumber Co. v. Gillard, 5 Cal. App. 437, 90 P. 556. The judgment was presented as suggested, and the trial court very properly decided "that the Churchill Company had no right to purchase" the land, as it was directed to do by the Supreme Court.

[2] This disposes of the only vital point in the case. Appellant contends that, admitting the binding force of the judgment, it was not sufficiently pleaded, and therefore that it should not have been admitted in evidence. It was pleaded in substantially the same form in which it was offered at the first trial of the case.

[3] The Supreme Court, as above appears, held that it was error by the trial court to have refused to permit it to be filed. This amounts to an adjudication of the sufficiency of the supplemental complaint as a pleading. But aside from this, the judgment was one to which the defendant was a party, it was one which was made the subject of litigation on the first trial and appeal of this case, and it was one in which when the first judgment rendered in this case was reversed, was so reversed for the sole purpose of permitting the plaintiff to plead it by a supplemental pleading as here attempted. When to this is added the fact that the pleading was accepted by the trial court and the case tried and decided upon the theory that it raised the issue of the bar of the Churchill v. Kingsbury judgment, it is now too late to inquire whether or not it was properly pleaded, or so pleaded with formal artificiality. The failure to plead that this judgment was "duly" given or made, or to prove the facts giving the court that rendered it jurisdiction, when it was offered in evidence, were not vital omissions under the facts here presented.

In this case the judgment in Churchill Co. v. Kingsbury was an adjudicated fact in the case, and its effect and validity had already been declared, in advance of its introduction in evidence at this trial. Upon no conceivable theory can it be held that the defendant was injured by the acceptance of the pleading by the trial court, or by the admission of the judgment upon the issue which it raised.

It is further contended that many issues raised by the pleadings were not decided by the court, or covered by its findings. Without discussing this question, which under the circumstances is wholly unimportant, it is enough to say that the findings as made abundantly support the judgment, and that from the evidence no finding upon any issue in the case could have been made in favor of the defendant which would weaken this judgment, or warrant a different one. Under such circumstances, the defendant having suffered no injury nor been denied any possible right, the failure to find upon the issues referred to was without injury, and therefore immaterial.

[4] Appellant makes the further point that the conclusions of law prepared by the trial court are confusing, in that it is stated in such conclusions that certain findings marked by letters of the alphabet do not entitle the defendant to any right, or serve to validate his certificate of purchase. The record discloses no such findings as those referred to. The conclusion criticized, however, is a negative one and not necessary to the support of the judgment. Moreover, as the evidence would warrant no finding which would serve the contention of the defendant, we must hold that this mistaken reference was without injury to it. Other points voluminously discussed by the parties become entirely irrelevant to this controversy when the conclusion is reached, as we have reached it here, that the judgment in the mandamus case terminated any right the defendant might have had to purchase the lands involved under its certificate of purchase.

As to the right of the plaintiff to purchase the land, the trial court has found in his favor. As this finding is supported by substantial evidence, this court, of course, will not disturb it.

The judgment is affirmed.

PRYOR v. FRUIT DISTRIBUTORS' SERVICE CO., INC. (Civ. 4653.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 30, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 27, 1925.)

1. Sales ⟸377—Complaint held to state cause of action for defendant's breach of contract to purchase from plaintiff his crop of lettuce.

In action for damages for defendant's breach of contract to purchase from plaintiff his crop of lettuce, complaint held to state cause of action.

2. Sales ⟸54—Contract for purchase of lettuce, if uncertain, would be interpreted most strongly against defendant.

Where contract, by which defendant agreed to purchase plaintiff's crop of lettuce, was written by defendant's manager, if uncertain, it should be interpreted most strongly against defendant, in view of Civ. Code, § 1654.

3. Sales ⟸23(3)—Defendant's offer to purchase plaintiff's lettuce crop, and plaintiff's acceptance thereof, construed as one entire contract by which both parties were bound.

Defendant's offer to purchase plaintiff's crop of lettuce, and plaintiff's acceptance thereof, were to be construed together as constituting one entire contract by which both parties were bound.

4. Sales ⟸181(12)—Evidence held to sustain finding that lettuce, which defendant refused to purchase, was of marketable quality.

In seller's action for buyer's breach of contract to purchase from seller his crop of lettuce, evidence held to sustain implied finding that 5,062 crates of lettuce, refused by buyer, were of marketable quality.

5. Trial ⟸232(5)—Instruction, defining words "marketable lettuce" held sufficient.

In action for buyer's breach of contract to purchase seller's crop of lettuce, instruction, defining words "marketable lettuce" as meaning such as was fit to be offered for sale in a market, and which might be lawfully sold and bought, etc., held sufficient, in view of Civ. Code, § 1644, where no special meaning was given to the phrase as used in the contract.

6. Sales ⟸195—Buyer not excused from proceeding with contract to purchase lettuce because of prior contract.

Buyer was not excused from proceeding with contract to purchase plaintiff's crop of lettuce, because latter had made a prior contract with another for marketing of entire crop, where there was nothing in that contract which would interfere with plaintiff's contract with buyer, or prevent buyer from obtaining both title and lawful possession of the lettuce.

7. Sales ⟸388—Instruction on measure of damages held erroneous as stating that amount actually received on sale of lettuce was value thereof.

In seller's action for buyer's breach of contract to purchase seller's lettuce crop, instruction, stating in substance Civ. Code, §§ 3311, 3353, authorizing jury in computing seller's damages to deduct from contract price, proceeds received by seller on sale, and to remainder thus obtained to add expenses incurred by him in hauling, packing, and paying transportation on lettuce to market, held erroneous, as stating that amount actually received on sale of lettuce was in fact the value thereof.

8. Appeal and error ⟸1068(4)—Erroneous instruction on measure of damages in seller's action for buyer's breach of contract held not prejudicial.

In seller's action for buyer's breach of contract to purchase seller's crop of lettuce, error in instruction on plaintiff's measure of damages that amount actually received on sale of lettuce to other parties was in fact value thereof, held not prejudicial, where amount of receipts and expenses was definitely established without conflict, and lettuce was disposed of in best way possible, and jury awarded plaintiff less damages than under evidence he was entitled to.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by L. E. Pryor against the Fruit Distributors' Service Company, Inc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Houser, Justice pro tem., not participating.

C. L. Shinn and E. E. Noon, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Kaye & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action the plaintiff recovered judgment against defendant on account of defendant's breach of a contract to purchase from plaintiff his crop of lettuce. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

Appellant's first point is that, for the reason that under a proper construction of the contract defendant was not required to accept more than three cars of lettuce, the complaint does not state a cause of action. The complaint alleged that on March 22, 1922, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell to the defendant and the defendant agreed to buy from the plaintiff his crop of lettuce then growing on his ranch near Delano, in Kern county, which contract was in writing and reads as follows:

"Delano, Cal., 3-22-22.

"We will accept 3 cars of lettuce at 1.60 per crate, also accept the balance of your crop (L. E. Pryor) at the same price. The lettuce is to not be cut until ready, and all lettuce is to be of marketable quality. The above price is on packed crates. We will pay cost of hauling from field, also pay all cost of packing including packing material.

"Yours truly,

"Fruit Dist. Service Co., Inc.,

"By P. W. Williams, Mgr."

It is alleged that thereafter in performance of said contract plaintiff delivered to the defendant and defendant received and paid the contract price for three carloads of said lettuce; that on or about April 7, 1922, the defendant repudiated said contract and then and thereafter refused to accept any further lettuce from the plaintiff; that the plaintiff performed all the conditions required by him to be performed under the terms of said contract, and subsequent to the repudiation of the contract plaintiff produced a total of 5,062 crates of lettuce. The complaint then stated the excess of the amount due from the defendant under the contract for said 5,062 crates of lettuce over the value thereof to the plaintiff, together with the expenses properly incurred by the plaintiff in carrying the said lettuce to market, and demanded judgment for said excess in amount as thus ascertained.

Appellant contends that the subject of the written memorandum was not single and entire, but that it contained two propositions, the first being to accept three cars of lettuce at $1.60 per crate, and the second to accept the balance of the crop at the same price. As to the second proposition or the second part of the proposition, appellant contends that the complaint shows nothing more than that appellant offered to accept at the stated price the remainder of the crop over and above the specified three cars of lettuce; and that before the additional lettuce was produced, defendant withdrew its offer to purchase the same. Appellant claims that it had the right to withdraw this offer, because the plaintiff, by the document signed by defendant, did not bind himself to deliver any lettuce to the defendant.

[1, 2] We think that the complaint stated a cause of action. It directly alleged that the plaintiff agreed to sell and that the defendant agreed to buy the entire crop. Although the contract is alleged to be in writing and is set out in the complaint, there is nothing in the document sufficient to negative or which necessarily conflicts with the facts alleged as above stated. On the contrary, the references to "all lettuce" and to "the above price" clearly included the entire crop. The written promise of defendant to "accept" implied an existing offer. The contract was written by defendant's manager. If uncertain it should be interpreted most strongly against the defendant. Civ. Code, § 1654. Moreover, the plaintiff introduced at the trial, without objection from the defendant, evidence tending to prove such offer, acceptance of which was contained in said written instrument.

It is further worthy of note that there was no demurrer to the complaint, and that the answer of the defendant alleged that in addition to said writing signed by the defendant there was at the same time executed another writing signed by the plaintiff and delivered to the defendant, which writing was as follows:

"3–22–22, Delano, Cal.

"This is to certify that I will deliver you (Fruit Dist. Service Co., Inc.) enough lettuce for 3 cars 320 crates to the car; lettuce to be from the first that matures. I will not cut lettuce until it is ready. The price is to be $1.60 per pack out crate. You are to pay for the hauling, packing including all packing supplies. Also right accept or reject balance of lettuce.

"Yours truly, L. E. Pryor."

At the trial it was admitted by the plaintiff that he signed and delivered this second document, but at the same time he testified that at the time of such signature and delivery the sentence reading, "also right to accept or reject balance of lettuce," was not contained in the document. This is one of the disputed facts in the evidence shown in the record. Since the jury's verdict implies a finding that said sentence was not in the document as signed and delivered by the plaintiff, this is an established fact of the case.

It further appears from the evidence that prior to the defendant's refusal to take the balance of the crop, the defendant's own construction of the contract was that it had bought the entire crop. For, in a letter of date April 4, 1922, by the defendant to the plaintiff, it said:

"In reference to the balance of your crop. Wish to advise that we are willing to take the balance of the crop, in fact, are in favor of same, provided we are able to get a better grade and pack than we have had. We want good quality which we bought."

[3] Appellant contends that the court erred in giving to the jury an instruction stating that if the sentence, "also right to accept or reject balance of lettuce," was not a part of the writing at the time of its delivery to the defendant, then the two writings constituted a valid and binding contract for the purchase and sale of the entire lettuce crop of the plaintiff. Appellant's argument in support of this contention is that the document set out in the complaint is merely in the form of an offer of defendant regarding two separate propositions; that the document was not signed by the plaintiff; that no tender was made of the balance of the crop, and that no acceptance by the plaintiff of said offer was communicated to the defendant before the withdrawal of the offer. We think that under the evidence the two documents should be construed together as constituting one entire contract by which both parties were bound. The question of tender is not pertinent to the suggested objection to the instruction. The point relating to acceptance of defendant's "offer" has been covered in our discussion of the complaint. The court did not err in giving said instruction.

After the three cars had been shipped, a fourth car was loaded and prepared for shipment. This car was rejected, and the defendant refused to take any more of the crop. The principal excuse offered by it for such refusal, other than the claim that there was no contract, was that the rejected lettuce was not of marketable quality. H. S. Moyes, defendant's inspector, gave testimony to the effect that it was not of marketable quality.

"Marketable lettuce must be lettuce that is of edible quality. Many times vegetables are sold that would not—should not—be eaten if the health authorities got them first. I would say that a certain percentage of the lettuce in the packing house wouldn't be marketable. All of it was not marketable, even though it may have been sold to dealers, and marketed and went to the consumer."

Defendant produced some other testimony to like effect. On the other hand, plaintiff testified that he produced 5,062 crates of good lettuce after the three cars were shipped to the defendant, a large part of which was sold. These sales were made after the defendant had refused the fourth car and after defendant had given notice that he would not take any more of the crop, and after the plaintiff had notified the defendant by telegraph as follows:

"Further shipment of lettuce is ready for marketing, and I will cut and pick tomorrow April 15th, pursuant to our contract, and in event of your failure to arrange for due disposition of same shall dispose of same to best possible advantage for you and hold you responsible for loss incurred if any."

It was on April 18 that the defendant definitely rejected the whole crop by letter signed by the defendant, by its authorized representative, and in the following terms:

"Wish to advise that I consider your crop of lettuce very poor quality and undesirous for shipping. Therefore reject all."

Prior to that time, by letter of date April 8, defendant referred to its rejection of the fourth car, and said that for stated reasons, "we do not care to handle your lettuce under any condition."

[4, 5] From the testimony there was evidence sufficient to sustain the implied finding of the jury that the 5,062 crates of lettuce were of marketable quality. But appellant contends that the court erred in the definition which it gave to the jury of the word "marketable" in its instruction on that subject. Said instruction reads as follows:

"The term 'marketable lettuce' means such as was fit to be offered for sale in a market; such as may be lawfully sold or bought, and if you find from the evidence that the lettuce which the plaintiff produced was of a marketable quality, according to the foregoing definition, and if you should find from the evidence that the lettuce which was produced by him was actually marketed or sold to the wholesale trade, with the exception of that which remained in the field, if any, and you also find that the lettuce which remained in the field, if any, could have been sold on the market or was of a marketable quality provided there had been any demand for it, then I charge you that it is your duty to find the value of all of such lettuce to the plaintiff, and to determine the amount which he should recover from the defendant in accordance with the other instructions given to you by the court."

The definition of the word "marketable," as contained in the foregoing instruction, does not differ materially from the definitions of that word as found in the principal English dictionaries. It does not differ from the meaning of the word as understood in their ordinary and popular sense. This therefore is a sufficient definition, unless a special meaning was given by usage to the phrase "marketable lettuce," as used in the contract. Civ. Code, § 1644. The defendant attempted to show that the words in question did have a special meaning, by proving certain specifications of the United States Bureau of Standards, which had been used for about three years as establishing a standard in order to obtain a government certificate of quality of such merchandise—presumably for interstate shipment. But the defendant failed to prove that this government standard was mentioned in the negotiations for the contract. The witness Furokawa testified that any lettuce that would not comply with one of the two grades established by the government standards would not be marketable, and that "all the trade follows the specifications." But he further testified that a great deal of lettuce was sold that did not come up to those specifications. The witness W. S. Braddus, a man of extensive experience as a grower, shipper, and market man in the vegetable business, testified that by marketable lettuce he understood lettuce that would sell on the market, and that he was not familiar with said United States Bureau of Standards market specifications on lettuce. We are of the opinion that the disputed phrase was correctly defined by the court in its ordinary and popular sense, and that the court did not err in its instruction to the jury on that subject.

[6] Appellant contends that it was excused from proceeding further with its contract after learning that the plaintiff had made a prior contract with Braddus for the marketing of his entire lettuce crop. It appears that on March 10th the plaintiff and Braddus had entered into a contract under which it was agreed that Braddus should pack and ship plaintiff's lettuce crop and receive therefor a stated commission based on the amount of sales. There was nothing in that contract which would interfere with the subsequent contract made between plaintiff and defendant, or prevent defendant from obtaining both title and lawful possession of the merchandise in question. Therefore this excuse fails.

[7] Concerning the measure of damages, the court first stated in substance the terms of sections 3311 and 3353 of the Civil Code, and further instructed the jury that it was their duty to determine first the number of crates of marketable lettuce produced by the plaintiff which he might have delivered to the defendant; second, the value of the crates produced by him at the contract price of $1.60 per crate; third, value of the lettuce so produced, to the plaintiff; that by "value to plaintiff" was meant the price which he could have obtained for the lettuce in the market nearest to Delano, less the expenses which the plaintiff was put to in the way of hauling, packing, and transporting the lettuce to such market. Thus far appellant makes no objection to said instruction. His objection relates to the remainder thereof, which reads as follows:

"Having determined the three foregoing factors, you will then compute the damages which the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the defendant, if any, in the following manner: From the contract price of the lettuce, which you find that plaintiff produced, you will deduct the proceeds received by him on the sale thereof, and to the remainder thus obtained, you will add the expenses incurred by him in hauling, packing, and paying transportation of the lettuce to the market. The result thus obtained will be the amount of damages which the plaintiff should recover from the defendant."

[8] Appellant contends that by the language last above quoted the court abandoned the earlier part of the instruction, and instructed the jury that the amount actually received on the sale of the lettuce was in fact the value thereof. We think that this criticism is sound, and that the instruction should not have been thus given. But we are also of the opinion that under the evidence this error was not prejudicial to the extent that it caused any miscarriage of justice. The amount of the receipts and of the expenses was definitely established without conflict in the evidence. In like manner it was shown by the uncontradicted testimony of Braddus, who marketed the lettuce for plaintiff, that he made the best disposition of it at that time possible, using his experience as a shipper. In view of these facts, there would not be any appreciable difference between the net results of the sales and the actual value to the plaintiff, of that lettuce. With regard to that part of the crop which the plaintiff did not sell (amounting to 1,350 crates), he testified that he was unable to market it; that he did not pick it because the marketing conditions at that time would not justify the expense of packing and shipping; that he tried to market it "all the way from April the 15th until it was finally abandoned in the field, and this was all I was able to market." There is no evidence to the contrary. It follows that this part of the crop was without value to the plaintiff, or at all. Under such circumstances, there was little for the jury to do in estimating damages, other than to make a computation, based upon the facts proved. Under that computation, the amount of damages incurred would have been a little over $9,600. The amount awarded by the jury was only $8,000. It thus plainly appears that the defendant probably did not suffer any injury by reason of the error complained of in the instruction relating to the measure of damages.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HOUSER, J.; CURTIS, J.

Supreme Court may review entire proceeding and grant such relief as seems proper.

2. Receivers ⊜35(1)—Ex parte appointment of receiver of private business corporation to be confined to cases of greatest emergency and irreparable injury.

Ex parte appointment of receiver of private business corporation should be confined to cases of greatest emergency and where the failure to appoint will entail irreparable injury.

3. Receivers ⊜6—Improper to appoint receiver, where remedy less drastic, and insuring litigant's adequate protection is available.

It is improper to appoint a receiver, where remedy less drastic, and insuring litigant's adequate protection is available.

4. Receivers ⊜32—Allegations as to imminency of insolvency of corporation held insufficient to justify order appointing receiver.

Allegation, that corporation was in imminent danger of insolvency, held insufficient to establish insolvency justifying order appointing receiver, within Code Civ. Proc. § 564, either on ex parte application for such order or on a hearing after notice, because a mere conclusion.

5. Receivers ⊜38—Evidence held not to establish imminent insolvency of corporation.

Evidence, adduced on hearing of motion to vacate ex parte order appointing receiver, held insufficient to show imminent danger of insolvency of corporation, within Code Civ. Proc. § 564, justifying appointment of receiver, either on ex parte application for such order or on a hearing after notice.

6. Receivers ⊜48—Noncompliance with statute, requiring consent to appointment of receiver, held to preclude appointment of interested person.

Failure to comply with statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 566), requiring consent to appointment of interested person as receiver, and absence of even oral consent to such appointment in open court, held to preclude appointment of such person as a receiver, assuming such appointment would otherwise be valid.

7. Prohibition ⊜3(3)—Petitioners held entitled to remedy of prohibition, notwithstanding available remedy by appeal.

Petitioners, whose motion in trial court to vacate ex parte appointment of a receiver was denied, held entitled to remedy of prohibition, notwithstanding available remedy by appeal from orders of which complaints were made.

A. G. COL CO. et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SANTA CLARA COUNTY et al. (S. F. 11682.)

1. Prohibition ⊜28—When Supreme Court, on prohibition, may review entire proceeding and grant relief deemed proper stated.

Where entire record of receivership proceeding is before Supreme Court on application for prohibition to prevent further proceedings,

In Bank.

Original application for writ of prohibition by the A. G. Col Company and another, to be directed to the Superior Court, in and for the County of Santa Clara, and the Honorable J. R. Welch, as judge thereof, and two others, to prevent further proceeding in the matter of appointment of a receiver. Orders appointing receivers annulled.

Simeon E. Sheffey, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

W. E. Foley, N. E. Wretman, and Maurice J. Rankin, all of San Jose, for respondents.

HOUSER, Justice pro tem. The matter which is here presented for determination by this court purports to be a petition for a writ of prohibition. Through some inadvertence, an order to show cause why an "alternative writ of prohibition should not issue" was served upon the respondents. In view of the fact, however, that throughout the hearing the understanding of both the petitioners and the respondents has been shown to have been that the proceeding be treated as final in its nature, such intention will receive recognition and indorsement by this tribunal. The salient facts relating to the controversy appear to be as follows:

For a number of years next preceding the date of the filing of the petition herein, A. G. Col Company has been engaged in the wholesale produce business at the city of San Jose. On or about November 23, 1923, the corporation known as A. G. Col, Incorporated, was organized by the stockholders of the A. G Col Company for the purpose of taking over the business of the A. G. Col Company, and which act seems to have been accomplished.

A corporation known as the California Sweet Potato Corporation, in which A. G Col and J. P. Napoli were stockholders, filed a suit against L. E. Bontz, the A. G. Col Company, A. G. Col, Incorporated, and several of the officers, directors and stockholders thereof, in which it was alleged that from April 24, 1922, to May 4, 1923, defendants therein, L. E. Bontz, C. W. Hunt, and one R. A. Bronson, were the directors of the plaintiff, California Sweet Potato Corporation, and that during said time L. E. Bontz was the president, R. K. Bontz was the secretary, and C W. Hunt was the vice president thereof; that on or about August 22, 1922, the said officers, with the exception of said R. A. Bronson, purchased all the capital stock and all the assets of the A. G. Col Company; that in payment therefor the said defendants issued capital stock of the plaintiff therein, California Sweet Potato Corporation, and "wrongfully and without any right converted the same [presumably the stock and assets of the A. G. Col Company] to their own use and took possession of said property"—which act on the part of said last-named defendants, on information and belief, is alleged by said plaintiff to have been done pursuant to a conspiracy among said defendants to defraud said plaintiff of said property. The complaint contained the further allegation that the organization of the A. G. Col Company, Incorporated, was without any authority from the plaintiff, or any consideration paid to it therefor, but was brought about for the purpose of cheating the plaintiff of its said property. On information and belief, the plaintiff also alleged in its complaint that the said defendants had threatened to sell and dispose of all of said property and had incumbered the same "to the extent of $20,000 and upwards," and that, unless restrained by an order of court, the defendants would sell the property or further incumber the same, and make it impossible for the plaintiff to secure possession and control thereof in as good condition as it was at the time the said suit was filed against the said defendants—to the damage of the plaintiff in an amount impossible of calculation—and that it was necessary:

"That a receiver be appointed to take charge of and manage the said Wholesale Fruit & Produce, Warehouse & Commission business in order to properly preserve and protect the rights and interests of this plaintiff."

It was further alleged in said complaint, on information and belief, that the defendant therein "A. G. Col Company, Inc., never had, or possessed any real capital or assets and is a dummy organization used by the individual defendants herein for the purpose of concealing their operations and that said corporation is in imminent danger of insolvency." The complaint also contained the direct allegation that said individual defendants, when they were officers of the plaintiff, California Sweet Potato Corporation, did not keep proper books of account, and did not account, in cash or property, for a large amount of the capital stock of the said plaintiff, which, on information and belief, is alleged to be of the value of $60.000, and of which sum each of said individual defendants was alleged to be a beneficiary; also, that the facts as set forth in the complaint were not discovered by the present officers of the plaintiff corporation until the month of April, 1925. The prayer was that it be adjudged that defendants hold the property in trust for the plaintiff; that an accounting be had; that a receiver of the said "Wholesale Fruit & Produce, Warehouse & Commission business" be appointed; that the defendants be restrained and enjoined from disposing of said property, or incumbering the title thereto; that the stock of the A. G. Col Company and all property owned by it on August 22, 1922, be delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff; and for general relief.

It further appears that after said complaint was filed, on application of the plaintiff therein, the respondent herein, the superior court issued an ex parte order appointing A. G. Col receiver in said suit, based solely upon the said complaint and an affidavit of N. E. Wretman, one of the attorneys of record for the plaintiff, and who was assistant secretary of the plaintiff therein, in which affidavit was recited the fact of service of the complaint and the summons in said suit upon each of the defendants therein, and, in addition thereto, the statement, upon information and belief of the affiant, that after such service had been had the defendants in said suit were not managing and conducting the business and enterprise referred to in said complaint in the usual and ordinary manner, in that they were collecting all outstanding accounts, and were "converting most of the goods, wares and merchandise on hand into cash with a view to disposing of same in such a manner as not to be within the reach of a permanent receiver when appointed after the hearing of said motion"; that, in and by said order of said superior court, said receiver was vested with all the usual powers and rights of receivers, including the power to take, care for, and keep possession of the property, books of account, books, and papers relating to said enterprise; and that thereupon the said receiver qualified as such officer and immediately took charge and possession of the business of the corporation defendants.

Within two days after said ex parte order by the respondent superior court appointing said receiver had been made, the defendants in the suit made application to the said superior court for an ex parte order setting aside the said ex parte order appointing a receiver therein, which application was by the court refused and denied, but, at the same time, an order was made by the court shortening time for service of notice of a motion for an order to set aside said ex parte order by which the receiver had been appointed, and fixing the time for the hearing of such motion at 2 o'clock p. m. of the same day on which the application for the order, setting aside the ex parte order appointing the receiver, had been denied.

At the hearing of said motion, evidence was received of certain facts, including the following: J. C. Jewett, who was the manager of the defendant A. G. Col Company, and the defendant A. G. Col, Incorporated, made affidavit and therein specifically denied each of the allegations contained in the affidavit of N. E. Wretman, to which reference heretofore has been had; and especially denied in said affidavit that said corporations were, or that either of them was, collecting all the accounts and converting most of the goods, etc., into cash with a view of disposing of the same in such manner as not to be within the reach of a receiver. Affiant further deposed that the said business was being conducted in an efficient, honest, and highly successful manner; that the nature of the business demanded that its perishable assets be converted daily into cash, which was done, and that the moneys so received were daily deposited to the credit of A. G. Col, Incorporated, in a bank in the said city of San Jose, and drawn out solely for necessary purposes in the conduct of the business.

The said affidavit contained further specific denials of each of the allegations set forth in the complaint in said suit, including denials to the effect that the defendant A. G. Col, Incorporated, never had or possessed any real capital or assets; that it was a "dummy corporation," etc., or that it was "in imminent danger of insolvency;" denied the existence of the or any conspiracy, as alleged in the complaint, or at all; denied that the defendants, or either of them, had converted to their or his personal use any of the property referred to in the complaint, other than such as "they were justly, legally, and equitably entitled to convert the same to"; denied that any of the defendants kept secret any transactions relating to the purchase of the property described in the complaint, but asserted that full knowledge thereof was had by "all parties," and that the plaintiff, California Sweet Potato Corporation, never had any interest whatsoever in said property; denied that the issuance of the capital stock of the plaintiff corporation (in the matter of the purchase of the A. G. Col Company) was unauthorized, or that said capital stock was converted by the defendants to their own use; but to the contrary, alleged that said plaintiff received payment therefor in the sum of $40,000, in accordance with the terms of a certain agreement (a copy of which being attached to said affidavit and made a part thereof); and which agreement, although not entirely clear in all its terms, is evidence of knowledge by the plaintiff corporation of the facts surrounding the transaction and of the plaintiff's participation therein.

The said affiant further deposed in substance that all the operations of said A. G. Col, Incorporated, were regular in all respects; that as to its financial condition, it was wholly solvent and able to meet its just obligations as fast as they matured; and that it was not "in imminent danger of insolvency, or in danger of insolvency at all."

At the hearing, the affidavit of Simeon E. Sheffey, attorney representing the defendants, was also received in evidence. Among other things, it appeared therefrom that the certificate of 200 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff, California Sweet Potato Corporation, alleged in the complaint to have been wrongfully converted by defendants to their own use, was in fact issued to A. G. Col (the receiver) personally and not as an officer of said corporation plaintiff, nor in trust for said corporation; that at said time said A. G. Col was a party defendant in an action in the superior court in the city of San Francisco, wherein H. Edwards, assignee of defendant E. L. Jewett, sought to recover from the plaintiff corporation the sum of $75,000 on account of certain moneys alleged to have been advanced by said Jewett to the plaintiff corporation, and on account of the payment by said Jewett as surety of certain moneys due on promissory notes of the plaintiff corporation. Said affidavit contained the further statement, on information and belief, that said A. G. Col "is now a stockholder in plaintiff corporation"; that in another action in the superior court of Stanislaus county the said A. G. Col and others are plaintiffs, and the plaintiff corporation, E. L. Jewett, C. W. Hunt, and L. E. Bontz are defendants; in which action N. E. Wretman appears as attorney representing the California Sweet Potato Corporation.

N. E. Wretman, who had made affidavit regarding the manner in which the business of the defendant, A. G. Col, Incorporated, was conducted, was called as a witness at said hearing, and testified in substance, among other things, that he had never seen a statement of the assets and liabilities of the defendant A. G. Col, Incorporated; that he knew, or had been informed of, no debts of the said defendant corporation other than an indebtedness of $20,000 which was evidenced by a mortgage of record, and one other debt of $10,000; and that he had no information as to whether or not the said defendant corporation was able to meet its current obligations as the same fell due, but had information to the effect that it had an overdraft on its account at the bank, and had based his statement, contained in his affidavit heretofore referred to, to wit, that A. G. Col, Incorporated, was at that time in imminent danger of insolvency, upon information which he had received from A. G. Col that said defendant "had no money to start with, and that they are moving ahead with this litigation the way they do and that they are urging their collections unduly the last week or so," and upon information of the way in which defendants Jewett, Bontz, and Hunt had run the business of the California Sweet Potato Corporation.

A. G. Col testified that, at the time of his appointment as receiver for the defendant corporations, he was the owner of 200 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff, California Sweet Potato Corporation, but that after his appointment as receiver, and on the morning on which the hearing was had, he had transferred said stock to his son, M. P. Col; also that the corporation, A. G. Col, Incorporated, owed one creditor, Mable Jewett, the sum of $32,000; that the company had other obligations outstanding; and that in his opinion the value of its property was about $50,000 and book accounts owing to the corporation defendant amounting to approximately $40,000.

Grant J. Hunt and J. C. Jewett each testified in substance that he was entirely familiar with the business affairs of the defendant corporations; that each of said corporations was solvent, and in no danger of insolvency; that they were paying their current debts and liabilities as the same fell due; and that they were not squandering or attempting to squander or waste the assets of said corporations, or place the same beyond the reach of any order which might be made by the court.

Mr. Hunt also testified that the "book overdraft" at the bank, amounting to $1,000 or $2,000 would have been taken care of by the deposit of funds before checks representing the overdraft could be presented for payment; and that no special efforts had been made on any day in the month of June, 1925, to hurry collections.

Mr. Jewett also testified that during the five months immediately preceding the hearing, the defendant, A. G. Col, Incorporated, had made a profit on the operation of its business of approximately $15,000; that, within the three or four days next preceding the hearing, the said defendant had been pressing the collections of some large overdue accounts.

The affidavit of E. M. Rosenthal, which was also a part of the evidence before the court, showed that, from the date of the incorporation of A. G. Col, Incorporated, he acted as the auditor of its business books and accounts, and was thoroughly familiar with all its financial transactions; that during the five months next preceding June 1, 1925, an audit of the books of said corporation showed a net profit of $15,594.81; that on May 31, 1925, the balance sheet disclosed quick assets amounting to $83,507.51, fixed assets of $70,926.95, and a net worth of said corporation, over all its liabilities, of $54.578.64; that a healthy financial condition existed as to said corporation, and that its business was conducted in a careful and conservative and businesslike manner and that its entire income was deposited in the Bank of San Jose and at all times disbursed only for its operating expenses, and for the purchase of produce which it handled.

The evidence also satisfactorily showed that J. P. Napoli was a stockholder in the California Sweet Potato Corporation; and that at the close of the hearing the court ordered that—

"The appointment of Mr. Col heretofore made is set aside and terminated, and Mr. Joseph Napoli is appointed receiver pendente lite."

[1] The foregoing, while not by any means stating the entire evidence before the trial court, is nevertheless a condensed statement of the material evidence relating to the appointment of the receiver, ex parte and finally, which is shown by a transcript of the reporter's notes taken on the hearing and the various affidavits and pleadings filed in the case. It thus appears that the entire record is placed before this court in this proceeding. It is therefore competent, notwithstanding the fact that a writ of prohibition is prayed, that this court review the entire proceedings, and grant such relief as may be proper in the premises. Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 228, 207 P. 903; Traffic Truck

Sales Co. v. Justice's Court, 192 Cal. 377, 220 P. 306; Swim v. Superior Court, 193 Cal. 539, 226 P. 2; Finn v. Butler (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 992.

[2] By numerous authorities, the principle is unequivocally announced that, from the standpoint of the business welfare of a defendant corporation, the appointment of a receiver on an ex parte application is so dangerous an expedient that it should be done only in cases of the greatest emergency and where, without such appointment, irreparable injury will unquestionably result. Fischer v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 129, 42 P. 561; Hobson v. Pacific States M. Co., 5 Cal. App. 94, 89 P. 866; Ryan v. Murphy, 39 Cal. App. 640, 179 P. 517.

[3] It is also a well-established rule that a receiver should not be appointed where a remedy less drastic in its nature and scope is available, and which will insure to the litigants adequate protection.

In the case of Dabney Oil Co. v. Providence Oil Co., 22 Cal. App. 233, 239, 133 P. 1155, 1158, it is said:

"And a receiver should not be appointed where the desired result can be obtained by less stringent means calculated to protect the rights of all parties. Hayes v Jasper Land Co., 147 Ala. 340 [41 So. 909]; Secord v. Wheeler Gold M. Co., 53 Wash. 620 [102 P. 654, 17 Ann. Cas 914]. 'Where an injunction will protect all the rights to which the applicant for the appointment of a receiver appears to be entitled, a receiver will not be appointed.' 34 Cyc., p. 25; Hickey v. Parrot Silver, etc., Co., 25 Mont. 164 [64 P. 330]."

See, also, Jones v. Smith (C. C.) 40 F. 314; Fischer v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 129, 42 P. 561.

The California Sweet Potato Corporation in the prayer of its complaint asked that it be decreed that the property described therein was held in trust by the defendants for the benefit of the plaintiff; that an accounting be had, and that the stock referred to in the complaint be delivered to the plaintiff.

It is clear that every presumed right (other than the appointment of a receiver) of the California Sweet Potato Corporation, for which it prayed in its complaint, could have been fully and completely protected and made available by a writ of injunction, or by other remedies provided by statute. It would appear that there was no such emergency, pending or imminent, which required so harsh a remedy as the ousting of the regularly qualified and acting and financially successful officers of the defendant corporations, and the substitution therefor of a receiver for the management and control of the business of the corporations.

Section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that—

"A receiver may be appointed * * * in the cases when a corporation * * *is * * * in imminent danger of insolvency. * * *"

It is therefore apparent that before the court would have been justified, on that ground, in making an ex parte order appointing a receiver, it must have appeared by appropriate allegations in the complaint that the financial condition of the corporations defendant was such that they were "in imminent danger of insolvency." It is said in the case of Dabney Oil Co. v. Providence Oil Co., 22 Cal. App. 233, 237, 133 P. 1155:

"Section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in what cases the court may appoint a receiver, and in the absence of facts showing that the case falls within some or more of the provisions of the section, no authority exists for such appointment."

The only allegation of the complaint which can be said to clearly constitute an attempt on the part of the plaintiff to comply with the requirements of the statute is that—

"Plaintiff is informed and believes * * * that said corporation (A. G. Col, Incorporated) is in imminent danger of insolvency."

[4] In the first place, it should be noted that the statement regarding the imminency of the insolvency of the corporation defendant is not direct, but that it is made on information and belief, and, consequently, is entitled to little weight; but, even assuming that its capacity as a pleading is not affected thereby, according to adjudications heretofore announced by this court, it is insufficient.

In the case of Bank of Woodland v. Stephens, 144 Cal. 659, 79 P. 379, which, among other things, involved the question of the right of the court to appoint a receiver in a suit to foreclose a mortgage, it was held that an allegation "that the security is insufficient," without stating facts upon which to base such allegation was insufficient to justify the appointment of a receiver. The court said:

"Such a statement is no more than a conclusion. It is no better than the statement sometimes contained in a complaint for an injunction, that if the acts threatened are committed 'the plaintiff will suffer irreparable injury which cannot be compensated in damages.' This is always held insufficient to authorize or support an injunction. The same rule should be applied here. The appointment of a receiver involves the taking of the defendant's property from his possession—a measure more violent and drastic than an injunction. It should never be allowed in cases of mortgage foreclosure, except upon a statement of facts showing that the actual value of the mortgaged premises is less than the debt secured, with interest and costs, and that resort to the rents and profits is necessary."

The same conclusion is reached by the court in Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. California Development Co., 164 Cal. 58, 127 P. 502, where the following language appears:

"The only attempt to establish the second ground mentioned consisted of an allegation in the complaint stating 'that as plaintiff is informed and believes and therefore avers the aforementioned property is probably insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt aforesaid.' Neither the value of the property, nor any facts indicating its value, are set forth in the complaint or in the affidavit. The decision in Bank of Woodland v. Stephens, 144 Cal. 660, 79 P. 379, is directly to the point that this is not a sufficient allegation of fact to justify the appointment of a receiver under this clause of the section."

[5] But, aside from any question of the sufficiency of the pleading, the facts adduced on the hearing of the motion to vacate the ex parte order appointing the receiver were not sufficient to sustain the necessary conclusion by the court that the defendant therein, A. G. Col, Incorporated, was "in imminent danger of insolvency." The only evidence, other than the naked conclusion—on information and belief—contained in the affidavit of N. E. Wretman that said corporation was "in imminent danger of insolvency," which at all bore on the issue, was that said defendants had incumbered the property owned by the defendant corporations "to the extent of $20,000 and upwards"; and, further—on information and belief—"that the defendant A. G. Col Company, Inc., never had, or possessed any real capital or assets." It also appeared that the defendant corporation had an overdraft at the bank, which would have been covered by deposits made by the defendant before the checks representing the overdraft had been presented for payment. The other assumed facts set forth in the complaint related more particularly to the issues therein presented of accounting by the defendants, or to that of a trust in them—all for the benefit of the California Sweet Potato Corporation. On the other hand, the assumed facts contained in the affidavits introduced by the defendants, together with the uncontradicted facts as testified to by witnesses, clearly demonstrated that the "information and belief" relied upon by Mr. Wretman for his said statements contained in the complaint and in his supporting affidavit were untrustworthy and unreliable.

Counsel for respondents now contend, for the first time, that aside from the special statutory requirement that either insolvency or imminency of insolvency of the corporation be made to appear before a receiver can be lawfully appointed, the general and inherent powers of a court of equity may be invoked under the further provisions of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorize the appointment of a receiver in those cases where a receiver has "heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity"; also, where "any party whose right to or interest in the property or fund, or the proceeds thereof, is probable, and where it is shown that the property or fund is in danger of being lost, removed, or materially injured."

In the French Bank Case, 53 Cal. 495, it was ruled (syllabus):

"The general and ordinary jurisdiction of courts of equity does not embrace the power to appoint a receiver of the property of a corporation in aid of a suit prosecuted against the corporation by a private person, but such power, if it exist at all, must be derived from a statute conferring it upon the court.

"Section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not confer it."

But, under this proceeding, it is unnecessary to determine whether or not a receiver of a corporation may be appointed where a proper showing is made. All that is intended by the foregoing is that neither the allegations (on information and belief) of the complaint, nor the evidence adduced, warranted the conclusion by the trial court that a receiver should be appointed, either on an ex parte application for such an order, or on hearing after notice, because the corporation was in "imminent danger of insolvency."

It will be remembered that, strictly speaking, the motion before the court was that of vacating an ex parte order appointing a receiver, theretofore made, and not that of appointing a receiver on a notice given to the defendants, although it also appears in the record that such a notice had been given, and which had been set for hearing at a time two days later than the date on which the motion to vacate the ex parte order appointing the receiver came on for hearing. There are, however, statements by the attorneys representing the respective parties, contained in the transcript of the proceedings on the hearing of the motion, which would seem to indicate that by implied stipulation the entire matter was being considered—the judge of the court remarking:

"I will hear you upon this matter. You will take your consequences one way or the other."

The "consequences" were that A. G. Col, who theretofore had been appointed receiver of the defendant corporations on the ex parte application of the California Sweet Potato Corporation, and who was a large stockholder in such corporation, was discharged as such receiver, and J. P. Napoli, who likewise was a stockholder in the plaintiff corporation, was appointed in his stead.

Section 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, in part:

That no "person interested in an action, * * * can be appointed receiver therein without the written consent of the parties, filed with the clerk."

An examination of the proceedings herein discloses that no written consent to the appointment of J. P. Napoli as receiver of the defendant corporations was ever filed with the clerk. However, there is contained in the order of the court, in which J. P. Napoli is appointed receiver, a recital that—

"All parties agreed and stipulated in open court that the order heretofore made appointing A. G. Col as receiver may be, and the same is hereby, vacated and set aside, and that Joseph P. Napoli, of San Jose, California, be and he is hereby appointed receiver pendente lite," etc.

Without considering the question of whether or not an oral agreement or oral stipulation in open court may become the lawful substitute for the statutory requirement of a written consent filed with the clerk, permitting the appointment as receiver of a person interested in the action, under the authorities heretofore cited (Van Hoosear v. Railroad Commission, 189 Cal. 228, 207 P. 903; Traffic Truck Sales Co. v. Justice's Court, 192 Cal. 377, 220 P. 306; Swim v. Superior Court, 193 Cal. 539, 226 P. 2, and Finn v. Butler [Cal. Sup.] 235 P. 992), this court is authorized to review the entire record, as on certiorari, and determine for itself just what situation was presented to the trial court, and to award such relief as may be proper in the premises. With respect, then, first to the facts as presented by the transcript of the proceedings, concerning whether or not there was actually any consent by the defendants to the appointment of Mr. Napoli as receiver in the suit: It appears that the attorney representing the defendants made many objections thereto, such, for example, as "I want to state that we do not consent to the appointment of a receiver. [The Court: I know you are not consenting to it.] * * * This is appointing an interested party as a receiver of that business. * * * I am making objection. * * * I have not consented to the receiver, but I will work with Napoli, but not under a receiver (which last statement was made by J. C. Jewett, manager of the defendant corporations). * * *" Also, the following by defendants' attorney: "Mr. Sheffey: Under the circumstances, your honor has no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver. They have not shown that this business is in imminent danger of insolvency, which is the only ground on which they proceed to ask for the appointment of a receiver."

The following also appears of record:

"The Court: If you raise the question of insufficiency, I want you to understand that I am not cutting off the other side from presenting their case, if they want time, I shall give them time.

"Mr. Sheffey: Before your honor should appoint a receiver to take our business out of our hands, there should be a sufficient showing of the necessity. * * *

"Mr. Sheffey: Why don't you do this: Set aside the order appointing the receiver, and continue this matter until both sides have had full opportunity to be heard on the question of whether or not a receiver is necessary * * *

"The Court: You will accept Mr. Napoli by consent at this time, or else the court will have, at this late hour, to continue this matter until tomorrow and hear the other side, and hear your side, too, to the final—to the final determination of this question of a receivership. If sufficient showing is made, the court will appoint a receiver; if you do not consent, and inasmuch as the court will appoint, make its own appointment whether Mr. Col or somebody else, I do not know—if your people make their showing legally—then the Court will deny the receivership—that is all there is to the case; it is just a question of proof or no proof, whether they are within the law or without the law. So unless there is a consent to this matter, I will continue the matter until tomorrow. * * *

"The Court: The court is going to determine whether it will appoint a receiver at all or not, and if it appoints a receiver it will be pendente lite. * * *

"Mr. Sheffey: I would rather have Mr. Napoli appointed, than to have the matter continued, in the situation it now is.

"Mr. Foley: That is all right.

"The Court: That settles it.

"Mr. Sheffey: The bond provides that he shall be liable for any damage caused by the appointment of a receiver improperly.

"Mr. Foley: He has been appointed by consent.

"Mr. Sheffey: We did not consent. * * *

"The Court: The court will make the appointment on those conditions, and the appointment of Mr. Col heretofore made is set aside and terminated. And Mr. Joseph Napoli is appointed receiver pendente lite; and his bond fixed at $10,000 surety bond."

From the foregoing, it is clear to this court that, if it can be said that the attorney representing the defendants consented at all, it was not a free and voluntary consent, but rather a manifestation on his part that, as a matter of preference, if the court insisted upon continuing the matter in its then status, with Mr. A. G. Col as receiver, it would be more agreeable to the defendants to have Mr. Napoli appointed receiver. Nowhere does it appear that the defendants waived their objections, or any of them, to the appointment of a receiver; but, to the contrary, the record contains frequent statements on the part of counsel representing the defendants that the court was without jurisdiction to appoint a receiver at all, and that the defendants especially objected to the appointment of any person interested in the action. As a final statement, in response to one by plaintiffs' attorney that Mr. Napoli was appointed by consent, we find that defendants' counsel said: "We did not consent"; and, although it appears from the answer filed herein by the respondents that the judge of the trial court did not hear either of the statements last referred to, there is no denial of the fact that either of the statements was made or that the court was in session at the time they were made. As tending to show that the defendants did not consent to the appointment of a receiver for said corporations, it may be noted that the petition herein was filed on July 6, 1925, which was within four days after the date of the filing of the order by which J. P. Napoli was appointed as such receiver. It must therefore be taken as true that, as a conclusion of the entire matter, neither "the written consent of the parties, filed with the clerk," nor the oral consent of the defendants, was obtained.

But, even had the voluntary consent of the defendants appeared of record as disclosed by the reporter's transcript of the proceedings, it is nevertheless doubtful, considering the question from the standpoint of consent by a corporation to the appointment of a receiver for itself, rather than the appointment of some specified person to that official position, that the corporation had the power to thus divest itself of its corporate functions, and confer corporate rights and duties upon an individual.

In the case of Elliott v. Superior Court, 168 Cal. 727, 145 P. 101, where it appeared that a receiver of a corporation had been appointed by and with the consent of the corporation, it is said:

"The fact that the Gibraltar Company consented to the appointment of a receiver is immaterial. Such consent did not and could not confer jurisdiction upon the court to make the appointment."

And in Smith v. Superior Court, 97 Cal. 348, 32 P. 322, the language of the court is:

"Nor would the consent of defendant railroad to the appointment of the receiver at all affect the right of any creditor aggrieved thereby to have the order appointing such receiver annulled in a proceeding of this character."

See, also, Bank of Woodland v. Stephens, 144 Cal. 659, 79 P. 379.

[6] Concluding the entire matter of the legal propriety of the appointment of Mr. Napoli, as receiver of the corporation defendants, it may safely be said that in view of the fact that there was no compliance with the statutory provisions requiring the written consent of the defendants to his appointment to be filed with the clerk, nor any oral consent thereto by the defendants in open court (assuming, without deciding, that such course might have been pursued), the court was without jurisdiction to make the appointment.

[7] It is urged by respondents that prohibition is not the proper remedy, and that for any prejudicial error committed by the trial court as against the rights of the defendants, they were afforded an adequate remedy by appeal.

In the case of Davis v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 691, 195 P. 390, which also was a proceeding for a writ of prohibition for the purpose of preventing the superior court from further proceeding in an action before it, it is said (page 696 [195 P. 392]):

"With regard to the remedy by appeal, the facts are that the order vacating the judgment of dismissal was made on January 2, 1920; that it was a special order made after final judgment and was appealable and that the right of appeal expired on March 2, 1920. Code Civ. Proc., § 963, subd. 2. On that day the present proceeding in prohibition was begun in the district court by the filing of the petition upon which that court issued an order to show cause. While the existence of the right of appeal at that time might have been a sufficient reason for that court to have then refused to entertain the petition (Glougie v. Superior Court, 169 Cal. 675, [147 P. 972]), yet, in view of the fact that the superior court was then, and ever since has been, without power or jurisdiction to proceed further in the action, as we have shown, but nevertheless proposes to do so, and that further proceedings of any kind, except to again dismiss the action, would be void, we are disposed to grant the writ, rather than put the parties to further vexation and useless expense by further attempts to prosecute it. The question is largely one of discretion, and we deem it the better policy to terminate the proceedings forthwith."

The case of Grinbaum v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 528, 560, 221 P. 635, was an application for a writ of review, in which proceeding the same rule suggested by respondents herein ordinarily obtains. The proceeding was brought for the purpose of annulling an order appointing a guardian of an alleged insane person, on the ground of want of notice of the guardianship proceeding to such person; and it was held, following the case of Davis v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 691, 195 P. 390, that the contention of respondent that the alleged incompetent had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy other than by a writ of review could not be upheld, although it manifestly appeared that other remedies were available to the petitioner.

And so in the instant case, while it is true that petitioners had a remedy by appeal from the orders of which complaint is made, nevertheless, for obvious reasons, including the long delays and consequential damages incident thereto, to again quote the language used by the court in the Davis Case (supra):

"We are disposed to grant the writ, rather than put the parties to further vexation and useless expense by further attempts to prosecute it. The question is largely one of discretion, and we deem it the better policy to terminate the proceedings forthwith."

It becomes unnecessary to discuss the additional point suggested by petitioners, that the complaint in the suit of California Sweet Potato Corporation against L. E. Bontz et al. does not state a cause of action.

It is the order of the court that the order of the trial court, by which A. G. Col was appointed receiver on the ex parte application of the plaintiff in the suit to which reference has been had, as well as the later order therein appointing J. P. Napoli receiver on the hearing of the defendants' motion to vacate the former order, be and they are, hereby vacated and annulled.

FOURCADE et al. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 11365.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸589—Police power elastic.

Proper exercise of police power requires expansiveness to meet growth of municipality.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸601—Findings held not to show failure to consider suitability of district in adopting zoning ordinance.

Where it appeared from findings of referee, on application for writ of mandate, that, in adopting zoning ordinance, board of supervisors had in view character of various districts, their particular suitability for various uses, the conservation of property values therein, and direction of property development in accordance with a well-considered plan, other findings held not to show failure to consider suitability of residence district for milk-pasteurizing plant.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸625—Ordinance excluding milk-pasteurizing plant from residence district held not unreasonable.

Zoning ordinance excluding milk-pasteurizing plant from residence district held not unreasonable; it not appearing that milk could not be pasteurized and distributed from other districts with reasonable safety and convenience.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸601—Municipality may establish residential and quasi residential districts.

Municipality has power to establish residential and quasi residential districts and exclude therefrom all nonconforming uses.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸63(1)—Action of board of supervisors in excluding milk-pasteurizing plant from residential districts held binding on Supreme Court.

Determination of board of supervisors, in adopting zoning ordinance, that milk-pasteurizing plants should be excluded from residential districts, held binding on Supreme Court.

6. Mandamus ⟸172—Propositions not urged or referred to in briefs will not be considered.

Points urged in points and authorities accompanying petition for writ of mandate, but not urged or referred to in briefs, will not be considered.

In Bank.

Application by H. Fourcade and another for writ of mandate, directed to City and County of San Francisco and others to compel issuance of permit for construction of milk-pasteurizing plant. Writ denied.

Raymond D. Williamson, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

M. T. Dooling and J. F. Bluxome, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus, instituted in this court, to compel the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco to issue a permit for the construction of a milk pasteurizing, bottling, and distributing plant upon the property of petitioners. An alternative writ was issued, and, after the issues were joined, a referee, pursuant to the stipulation of all the parties, was appointed to take testimony and report his findings of fact to this court. The same have been filed. The sufficiency and correctness of these findings being conceded, they are approved and accepted by this court.

The petition for the writ challenges the validity of the zoning ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, upon the ground that the restrictions imposed upon the property of petitioners, under and by virtue of the said ordinance, are unreasonable and arbitrary and therefore not a proper exercise of the police power.

The material findings of fact made by the referee, succinctly stated, are these:

The "zoning law" of the city and county of San Francisco is a comprehensive zoning ordinance, adopted by the board of supervisors of the said city and county. This ordinance was adopted after an extensive survey of the entire city and county by the planning commission of said city and county. Subsequent to a careful investigation of the facts thus secured and before the adoption of the ordinance, a tentative zone map of said city and county, dividing said city and county into six different classifications, was prepared. Thereafter numerous public hearings, to which all persons interested were urged to come and present their objections, if any, to the classification thus made, were held by the said commission. After considering the facts elicited by this survey and the objections made at said public hearings, the commission prepared a complete zoning ordinance, segregating the entire city and county of San Francisco into six classes. This proposed ordinance was then taken up by the board of supervisors, and further public hearings thereon were held by that board, at which all the residents of the city and county of San Francisco were invited to appear and present such objections as they might have to said proposed ordinance, either in whole or in part. Many residents of the said city and county did appear at said hearings, and the board of supervisors finally, on October 3, 1921, adopted the ordinance in question (No. 5464, New Series). In ultimately adopting said ordinance said board took into consideration, not only the results of the preliminary survey and public hearings held by the city planning commission, but also suggestions made by citizens of the city and county of San Francisco at the public hearings held by said board. Said ordinance was adopted by the board of supervisors, having in view the character of the various districts, their peculiar suitability for particular uses, the conservation of property values, and the direction of property development in accord with a well-considered plan.

The ordinance in question is entitled, an ordinance "regulating and establishing the location of trades, industries and buildings, and the locations of buildings designed for specific uses, and establishing the boundaries for said purposes, and providing penalties for the violation of its provisions." It provides that—

"For the purpose of regulating and establishing the location of trades and industries, businesses, dwellings and the location of buildings designed for specific uses, the city and county of San Francisco is hereby divided into six classes of districts, (1) 'first residential district,' (2) 'second residential district,' (3) 'commercial district,' (4) 'light industrial district,' (5) 'heavy industrial district,' (6) 'unrestricted district.'"

In a second residential district, by the provisions of the ordinance, no building may be constructed or altered which shall be used or which shall be intended to be used for any purpose other than for a single family dwelling, flat, apartment house, tenement house, boarding or lodging house, hotel, library, public building, hospital or sanitarium, police station, fire station, philanthropic and eleemosynary institution, other than a correctional institution, community clubhouse, etc. It is, in brief, restricted to residential uses exclusively, and such uses as public necessity requires.

The petitioner Fourcade is the owner of a triangular block, bounded by Duncan street, Guerrero street, San Jose avenue, and the intersection of San Jose avenue and Guerrero street in the city and county of San Francisco. This property is situate in a district designated by the said zoning ordinance as a second residential district. The district in which the block of land is located is, and was at the time of the adoption of said ordinance, devoted almost exclusively to residence purposes. The zoning map shows this second residential district to be bounded by Army street, Dolores street, Twenty-Ninth street, Tiffany avenue, and Valencia street, in said city and county, and includes nine blocks, in which area the lot of land owned by petitioners is situated, and shows the uses to which the lots within the described district were devoted at the time said ordinance was adopted and also the new buildings which have been constructed since the adoption of said ordinance, and the uses to which said buildings are devoted. At the time the ordinance was adopted, there were in said nine blocks immediately surrounding the described area 236 buildings devoted exclusively to residence purposes and only 21 buildings devoted to uses other than residential. Several of the latter had small stores on the first floor with apartments or flats devoted exclusively to residential purposes on the floors above. Since the adoption of said ordinance there have been constructed in this district and fronting upon San Jose avenue, between Duncan street and the intersection of said San Jose avenue with Guerrero street, 8 buildings devoted exclusively to residence purposes at a total cost of $78,000. All of these buildings face directly upon the lot upon which petitioner La Brucherie seeks a permit to erect a milk-pasteurizing plant. There has been likewise constructed on Guerrero street, between Duncan street and the intersection of Guerrero street with San Jose avenue, one building devoted exclusively to residential uses, at a cost of $25,000. This building fronts upon the lot of petitioners. There is also located in this district St. Luke's Hospital. Subsequent to the passage of the ordinance in question, additions were made to this hospital, which institution is one of the permissible uses in a second residential district, at a total cost of $78,000. These additions were made in reliance upon the fact that said district was classified as residential in the zoning ordinance, and that no property in such a designated district would thereafter be devoted to other than residential purposes.

Subsequent to the adoption of the ordinance, petitioner Fourcade entered into an agreement with his copetitioner, La Brucherie, wherein the latter agreed to purchase from Fourcade a portion of said triangular block fronting on Guerrero street, San Jose avenue, and Duncan street, and upon which La Brucherie proposed to erect his pasteurizing plant. It was understood, however, that the consummation of said agreement would depend entirely upon obtaining a permit from the board of public works for the construction on said lot of said plant in accordance with certain plans and specifications. In compliance with the provisions of the zoning ordinance, petitioner La Brucherie applied on two different occasions to the board of supervisors for a change of zone so as to permit the construction on the described lot of a building for the purposes stated. These requests were referred to the city planning commission, as provided in the ordinance, and after hearing thereon, at which the petitioner La Brucherie appeared and was accorded a hearing, the commission recommended to the board of supervisors the same be denied. The said board accepted the recommendation of the city planning commission and adopted resolutions denying the applications. Petitioner La Brucherie then filed his application for a permit with the board of public works of said city and county, which after due hearing was denied upon the ground and for the only reason that the erection of the building in question would be contrary to the provisions of the zoning ordinance.

Under the said zoning ordinance the only districts in the city and county of San Francisco in which a building may be erected for the pasteurization of milk and the bottling thereof are the following: Light industrial districts, heavy industrial districts, and unrestricted districts. These districts are less suited and less fitted for the stated purposes than a residential district, because, in the former, the plant is removed from the districts where the bulk of milk produced is daily consumed. In residential districts, furthermore, there is less possibility of contamination from smoke, dirt, dust, fumes, and odors which ordinarily are to be found in an industrial district.

Milk, finds the referee, is a food staple of great value to human beings. It is of a delicate character, and easily subject to contamination, and it is important, therefore, that such a plant as a milk pasteurizing, bottling, and distributing depot should be located as near as reasonable to the homes of the consumers thereof in order to insure its expeditious delivery and reduce the possibility of pollution.

The primary point presented for decision in this case is whether or not excluding of a milk pasteurizing, bottling, and distributing depot from a residential district is a reasonable exercise of the police power vested in a municipality by virtue of the constitutional grant of power to municipalities. Article 11, § 11, Const. of Cal.; Enabling Act of 1917, p. 1419.

[1] At the outset of a discussion of this point it may be stated that the elaborate survey of the police power, in relation to its exercise by municipalities in enacting zoning ordinances in the recent cases decided by this court (Miller v. Board of Public Works, 234 P. 381, and Zahn v. Board of Public Works, 234 P. 388), makes unnecessary a detailed discussion of this subject here and now. It is to be borne in mind, however, that we are dealing with one of the most necessary powers of government, and it may not be remiss to reiterate that it is not inflexible. Its proper exercise rather postulates an expansiveness and an elasticity that must meet the growth and expansion of a municipality. "In short, the police power, as such," as was stated in Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra, "is not confined within the narrow circumscription of precedents, resting upon past conditions which do not cover and control present day conditions obviously calling for revised regulations to promote the health, safety, morals, or general welfare of the public; that is to say, as a commonwealth develops politically, economically, and socially, the police power likewise develops, within reason, to meet the changed and changing conditions. What was at one time regarded as an improper exercise of the police power may now, because of changed living conditions, be recognized as a legitimate exercise of that power."

It is now settled in this state, in so far as the general principle of comprehensive zoning is concerned, that the segregation of residences, industries, commercial and mercantile businesses of divers kinds, to particular localities, is a proper and legitimate exercise of the police power as bearing a rational relation to the health, safety, and general welfare of the community. Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra; Zahn v. Board of Public Works, supra.

The procedure followed by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, in adopting the zoning ordinance in question, brings that enactment precisely within the principle announced in the above-cited cases. We cannot say from the facts found that the districting of the particular area in question is an arbitrary and unreasonable exercise of the police power. It is contended in this behalf that the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, in adopting the said zoning ordinance, did so without giving reasonable consideration to the character of the particular district in question, wherein the property of petitioners is situate, and the suitability of this district for particular purposes. Petitioners' argument hinges upon the findings of the referee to the effect that milk is a food staple of great value; that it is delicate and easily exposed to contamination; that the districts in which the operation of pasteurization plants are now permitted under the zoning ordinance are less suited for such purposes than residential districts; that at present pasteurization plants, by virtue of said ordinance, are removed from residential districts where the bulk of milk is daily consumed; that the districts to which the said plants are now relegated are objectionable by reason of the dust, dirt, smoke, fumes, and odors which permeate such districts; and that it is of great importance to the consumers that pasteurization plants should be as near as possible to their homes, in order to insure and facilitate quick and economical delivery; and, consequently that it is for the best interests of the consumers that such plants should be located in residential districts. These findings indicate, petitioners contend, that the board of supervisors, in adopting the ordinance in question, did not know and keep in mind the particular character and suitability of the district for a milk pasteurizing, bottling, and distributing depot.

[2] This contention cannot be sustained. The evidence adduced before the referee shows without contradiction that milk pasteurization plants can be and are successfully operated in industrial districts. And the findings of the referee clearly show that, in adopting the ordinance here assailed, the board of supervisors had in view the character of the various districts, their peculiar suitability for particular uses, the conservation of property values therein, and the direction of property development in accordance with a well-considered plan. This finding negatives the contention that said board failed to take into consideration the suitability of the particular district for the proposed use.

[3] The importance of milk as an article of diet is readily conceded, but it cannot be said that milk must necessarily be pasteurized close to the consumers in order to lessen the possibility of contamination. Until it be found that milk cannot be pasteurized and distributed from districts other than residential with reasonable safety and convenience, it cannot be said that the relegating of pasteurizing plants to districts other than residential or commercial by the board of supervisors is an unreasonable and arbitrary provision of the ordinance in question.

It was held, in Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra, that as a part of a general comprehensive zoning plan strictly private residential districts may be established. The basis of the rule there announced is the reasonable and necessary protection of the general uniform home districts from the encroachment of foreign and discordant uses, which would ultimately destroy such districts. It is manifest that the introduction of any form of business or industrial use into strictly uniform home districts operates, in a measure at least, to lower the value and depreciate the desirability of surrounding property for residential purposes. A milk pasteurization plant, being indisputably an industrial use, clearly would be out of harmony in a residential district.

[4, 5] The power of a municipality to establish and maintain residential and quasi residential districts and to exclude therefrom all nonconforming and conflicting uses is now established in this state. Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra; Zahn v. Board of Public Works, supra. And when establishing such districts the legislative body of a municipality decides that it is feasible and essential to the general welfare of the community to exclude pasteurizing plants from the same, it is not within the province of this court to dispute the wisdom of their judgment. The board of supervisors having determined the question in favor of the exclusion of milk pasteurization plants from residential districts, that determination is final so far as this court is concerned.

"It is scarcely necessary to reiterate here the well-recognized principle that courts are loath to substitute their judgment as to the necessity for a particular enactment for the legislative judgment as to the need of such enactment with reference to the exercise of the police power. A large discretion is vested in the legislative branch of the government with reference to the exercise of the police power. * * * Every intendment is to be indulged by the courts in favor of the validity of its exercise and, unless the measure is clearly oppressive, it will be deemed to be within the purview of that power. * * * The courts may differ with the Legislature as to the wisdom and propriety of a particular enactment as a means of accomplishing a particular end, but as long as there are considerations of public health, safety, morals, or general welfare which the legislative body may have had in mind, which could have justified the regulation, it must be assumed by the court that the legislative body had those considerations in mind and that those considerations did justify the regulation. * * * In Ex parte Hadacheck, supra [165 Cal. 416, 132 P. 584, L. R. A. 1916B, 1248], the court held in effect that, when the necessity or propriety of an enactment was a question upon which reasonable minds might differ, the propriety and necessity of such enactment was a matter of legislative determination." Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra.

Inasmuch as it does not appear from the unquestioned and admitted facts of the instant case that the ordinance in question, in its application and its consequences, is inherently unreasonable, we are necessarily foreclosed from substituting our judgment for the legislative judgment to the effect that the enactment of the zoning ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco had reasonable relation to the promotion of the general welfare of the community.

[6] Petitioners' points and authorities, which accompanied the petition for the writ, presented, in addition to the points hereinbefore discussed and decided, several other points which were not urged nor in anywise referred to in the briefs which were finally filed in the case and upon which the case was submitted for decision. We take it, therefore, that the points last mentioned have been abandoned by petitioners. Indeed they may well have been abandoned, because they were decided adversely to the contention of petitioners in the recent cases of Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra, and Zahn v. Board of Public Works, supra, which were decided subsequent to the filing of the petition in this case. It will be unnecessary, therefore, to discuss and decide the remaining points which were originally urged in support of the petition for the writ.

A peremptory writ is denied, and the alternative writ is discharged.

In re HENDERSON'S ESTATE. (Sec. 3769.)

1. Wills ⟸130—Document held to constitute holographic will.

Document found among effects of deceased, consisting of a single sheet of paper, in the first part of which she made request that certain property be left to her daughter and husband, and in paragraph following signature made request that daughter send gift to testatrix's son, held to constitute in its entirety one holographic will.

2. Wills ⟸133—Subscription at close of paragraph following signature of testatrix held a sufficient subscription to constitute latter paragraph part of will.

Where holographic will was properly signed by mother at close of paragraph providing for certain bequests, subscription "Your loving mother" at end of paragraph following signature held a sufficient subscription to constitute latter paragraph part of will.

3. Wills ⟸320—Jury held properly excluded during proceedings involving preliminary proof of purported will.

In proceedings for probate and contest of will, jury held properly excluded during proceeding involving preliminary proof of purported will; evidence and issues of fact in proceedings of probate of will being solely for consideration and determination of the court.

4. Wills ⟸52(1)—Presumption that testator was of sound mind when making will is alone sufficient evidence on question of sanity to support judgment admitting will to probate.

Testator is presumed to have been sane when making will, and such presumption alone, in absence of contradictory evidence, is sufficient on question of sanity to support judgment admitting will to probate.

5. Wills ⟸344—Judgment admitting will to probate held not defective because failing to include express findings.

Judgment admitting will to probate held not defective because failing to include express finding that at time deceased executed will she was over 18 years of age and of sound and disposing mind; existence of jurisdictional facts and finding thereof being implied from matters which must be shown to have been ordered and adjudged, in view of Civ. Code, § 1270, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1704.

6. Wills ⟸354—Law requiring court to make certificate of facts found and attach to will apply only where there is contest of will.

Code of Civ. Proc. § 1317, requiring court to make certificate of facts found and cause them to be attached to will, does not apply in proceeding for probate of will, but only where there is a contest of its probate.

7. Executors and administrators ⟸14—Executor held properly appointed pursuant to desire expressed in holographic will.

Where holographic will provided for bequest of property to each of testatrix's children, and also to one F. C., husband of daughter, and contained clause, "and request that F. C. have charge of my affairs," held latter legatee was not, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1350a and 1365, improperly appointed executor.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Proceedings by Francis Cutting for the probate of the will of Hannah L. Henderson, deceased, contested by Orrin S. Henderson. From an order of the superior court admitting the document to probate, contestant appeals. Affirmed.

Perky & Scott and W. S. Scott, all of San Francisco, and A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

Nutter, Hancock & Rutherford, and A. P. Hayne, all of Stockton, for respondent.

HART, Justice pro tem. The deceased, Hannah L. Henderson, died in the county of San Joaquin, her place of residence, on the 22d day of October, 1922, of the age of about 84 years, leaving surviving her a son and a daughter, to wit: The appellant herein, Orrin S. Henderson, and a daughter, Helena (also called Lena) Cutting, wife of the respondent herein, and also leaving an estate, situated in said county, consisting wholly of personal property, principally in the form of choses in action, of the value of $2,500. Also surviving the deceased were grandchildren (the number not made to appear in the record), issue of the marriage between the respondent herein and Lena Cutting, as stated, daughter of the deceased.

In the latter part of the month of November, 1922, about 5 or 6 weeks after the date of the death of the deceased, Mrs. Cutting, wife of the respondent, found, in a small tin box in the house of the Cuttings, the following instrument in writing:

"Dear Lena,

"Do not think it strange that I have changed my mind concerning my grand children They are doing well for themselves Today I am thinking of my Dear Son Orrin, so I ask you as a mother, to think of me as his mother, if you can, to send him a little gift from me say $50, or a $100 as you can He may need it, His years are passing.

"God Bless and keep you both
"From A Loving Mother."

The above document was written on a single piece of paper, although physically divided into two parts. (The two parts, for convenience, will hereinafter be designated as the first and the second "paragraphs" or "writings.") The first, which is dated and signed by the testatrix, but which makes no mention of her son, Orrin S. Henderson, the appellent herein, was written on the first page; the paper upon which it was written being folded so as to make it consist of four pages. The second paragraph or writing, which bears no date and which is signed, "From a Loving Mother," was written on the fourth or last page of the paper.

On the 10th day of November, 1923, approximately a year from the time when found, said document was filed and presented by the respondent to the superior court in and for the county of San Joaquin upon a petition for the probate thereof as the olographic will and testament of the deceased. On December 3, 1923, the appellant filed and inaugurated a contest of the probate of said instrument upon the grounds: (1) That if, in fact, the deceased executed said instrument, she was, at the time of executing the same, "not of sound mind"; (2) that the execution of said instrument, "if the same was executed" by said Hannah L. Henderson at all, was executed through the undue influence of her daughter, said Helena Cutting, as follows: That the deceased had for a long period of time prior to the time of her death resided with her said daughter; that during all said time the deceased was both physically and mentally diseased, and by reason thereof required constant care and attention to the end that her wants should be administered properly or in a manner suitable to her weakened physical and mental condition; that she was during all said time so taken care of by said Helena Cutting, and entirely dependent upon the last named for the care and attention required by reason of her weakened condition of body and mind; that, due to the care and attention thus given deceased by said Helena Cutting, the latter acquired and maintained, and at the time of the execution of the said purported will, was able to and did exercise, an overruling influence over the mind and will of said deceased, and so "procured the said Hannah L. Henderson to execute said purported will."

The proponent answered the appellant's grounds of opposition to the probate of said document as the will of the deceased, denying specifically all the averments of the petition, and alleging affirmatively that, at the time she executed the purported will, the deceased was mentally sound and possessed of testamentary capacity.

A jury was called and impaneled to try the contest, but, by order of the court, the preceeding involving the preliminary proof of the purported will was, over objection by the contestant, conducted in the absence of the jury; the court stating that it would hear such proof and withhold making any order thereon, either admitting or refusing to admit the will to probate, until after the trial of the contest was had and determined by the jury. Thereupon the jury were excused pending the taking of testimony for the purpose just stated, and the respondent, Cutting, was called to the witness stand, and testified that, as stated above, his wife, Helena Cutting, in the latter part of November, 1922, found the instrument offered for probate as the will of deceased in a small tin box belonging to the deceased, and kept by her at the home of the witness while the former resided there, and in which she preserved other private papers, including promissory notes held by her against other parties; that Mrs. Cutting maintained possession of the instrument until it was filed for probate on November 10, 1923; that witness was familiar with and knew the handwriting of the deceased; and that the instrument proposed for probate as her will was, including the date and signature, entirely in the handwriting of the deceased. Cutting further testified that deceased was of the age of about 84 years, and that her only heirs at law were his wife, Helena Cutting, and the appellant herein. The direct examination of Cutting was, by leave of the court, conducted by the attorneys for the proponent of the will, and a cross-examination of said witness, also by leave of the court, was prosecuted by the attorneys for the contestant. The inquiry as so conducted was, of course, limited to the precise matter then before the court, to wit, whether the instrument in question was or was not, in law and in fact, the last will and testament of the deceased, and was duly executed, and was therefore entitled to be admitted to probate. Upon the conclusion of the taking of Cutting's testimony, counsel for proponent offered in evidence, as the last will and testament of deceased, the document filed and presented as such. To the offer and the reception of this evidence, counsel for contestant objected upon substantially the same grounds as those upon which they object to the order or decree admitting the will to probate, and hereinafter to be considered, but the court overruled the objection on all the grounds upon which it was founded, expressly refusing, however, to make an order in the premises until after the issues involved in the contest had been tried and disposed of. This preliminary proceeding having thus been concluded, the court thereupon ordered the jury to be returned into court and directed the counsel for the contestant to proceed with the trial of the contest upon the issues as framed and tendered; whereupon said counsel declared that they did not desire or intend to proceed further, and the matter was thereupon submitted to the court upon the preliminary proceedings and the proof therein taken upon the petition to admit the document to probate as the last will and testament of the deceased. The court then rendered and entered its order or decree, finding and adjudging that "said document is the last will and testament of Hannah L. Henderson, deceased, and that the same was and is a holographic will, and that the same was entirely written, dated and signed by the hand of the said testatrix herself, on the 9th day of August, 1922, and that said document is a single continuous instrument, written on a single piece of paper, and is a harmonious, homogeneous, holographic will, and constituted and constitutes one instrument." The age, the place of residence, the value of the estate, the place of death, and "the sole and only heirs" of the deceased are likewise found, and upon all the findings the document in question was by the court ordered admitted to probate as the last will and testament of said Hannah L. Henderson, deceased. It was further ordered that "said Francis Cutting be and he is hereby appointed executor thereof, and that letters testamentary thereon issue to him as such executor upon his filing a bond" in a specified amount.

The contestant, Orrin S. Henderson, appeals from said order or judgment.

[1] That the document in question was written, dated, and signed by the deceased herself and is entirely in her own handwriting, is not questioned here. It is objected, however, that that portion of the decree finding and adjudging that "said document is a harmonious, homogeneous, holographic will, and constituted and constitutes one instrument," involves a construction of the instrument wholly without warrant either from the language of the second paragraph thereof, standing alone, or from said language viewed in connection or together with that of the first paragraph of the instrument; that the two paragraphs, upon their face, disclose no necessary relation to each other, nor, howsoever viewed, are reasonably susceptible of such a construction. We agree with the trial court's construction of the document as a whole as indicated by its findings and judgment.

But for the fact that dehors the document itself it was made to appear that one of the lawful heirs of the deceased was thereby pretermitted or not named therein, the first paragraph of the document, having been shown to have been written, dated and signed by the deceased herself, constituted in all respects a perfectly valid olographic testamentary disposal of her estate. And it will, of course, be conceded that, even though the first paragraph or writing be, pro tanto, invalid, because of the pretermission therefrom of a lawful heir of the deceased (Code Civ. Proc. § 1307), or even though wholly invalid, it is nevertheless perfectly clear therefrom that by said paragraph the deceased intended to make testamentary disposal of her estate. What, then, could the deceased have intended to accomplish by writing the second paragraph on the sheet of paper on which she had olographed her will, if, as appellant contends is true, she did not have in mind her will as so written and intend that the second writing should have relation to and probably have some important effect upon the will as she had written it in the first instance? That the second writing is in the form of a letter addressed to her daughter does not militate against the conclusion that the circumstance that the two writings were written on the same sheet of paper is indicative of an intention in the deceased that they together should constitute her will. Under the circumstances, nothing could be more natural than that a mother should have written the paragraph in the form of a letter and addressed the same to her daughter upon a subject which is always of vital concern to those who, having already spent the allotted time of mortal life, are engaged in preparations looking to the posthumous transmission of their earthly belongings to those whom they desire shall have, own, and enjoy the same. The daughter was a legatee under her will, and, having omitted to provide in her will for her only son, and, as we may well assume, urged by the maternal love and affection which in such ardent terms she expressed for him in the second writing, she thus appealed to her daughter as the one who would, in her opinion, the more likely comply with such a request, to present to that son—the only brother of that daughter—out of her (the daughter's) legacy a small sum of money as a gift from the deceased, indeed, as a memorial of the motherly love she then, and, as may well be inferred from the terms of maternal affection in which she referred to him, always had cherished for him. However, as before stated, it is reasonably clear that, had the deceased not intended the second writing to be in some way supplementary to her will, she would not have written it upon the sheet of paper upon which previously, as may be assumed, she had written her will. This conclusion is reinforced by the consideration that the language of the second writing is of a testamentary character—that is to say, it clearly appears to be so when viewed by the light of the tenor of the first writing, as thus it should be considered. Indeed, as so considered, it would be doing violence to plain language to hold to the contrary. The very fact that deceased in said writing requested her daughter to "send him (her son) a little gift from me, say $50.00 or $100.00," cannot reasonably be construed otherwise than that deceased, when penning those words, had in mind the first writing and the fact that therein she failed to name or mention him. In other words, that language is clearly indicative of the fact that the deceased, after writing the first, came to realize that she had failed (doubtless deprecatingly) to express for him a mother's devotion in a document of peculiar sacredness—sacred because it was to contain the expression of the last thoughts of one for those nearest and dearest to her in life which would be the first to receive attention and the last to be forgotten after her voice had forever been silenced. Again, as in testimony of the testamentary character of the second writing, and that it was written in contemplation of the will she had previously executed, there is her reference to her grandchildren. She stated, in effect, that she had undergone a change of mind regarding her grandchildren. Immediately following this declaration are the words (singularly significant in connection with the present consideration): "They (referring to her granchildren) are doing well for themselves." When considered by the light of the fact that the second writing was executed on the sheet of paper on which she had written her will, and also in view of the fact that her venerable years, at the time both writings were executed, confronted her with the warning or admonition that her span of life, according to natural order, was near its termination, what other signification could reasonably be attached to that language or those words than that she then had in mind the posthumous disposition or settlement of her earthly affairs, and that what she wrote in said paragraph was by her intended to be testamentary, and, indeed, to form a part of the instrument previously executed on the same sheet of paper?

The opinion in the very recent case of Estate of Spitzer (Cal. Sup.) 237 P. 739, considered a situation which, in the general aspect thereof, is much like that presented here. Therein the court, speaking through Mr. Justice Seawell, held that the several writings offered for probate as the will of the deceased were of a testamentary character. Much of what is said by Justice Seawell in that case is pertinent to the circumstances of this case. It is sufficient, however, to quote therefrom the following excerpt adopted into the opinion in that case from Estate of Beffa, 54 Cal. App. 186, 201 P. 616:

"'It is well settled in this country and in England, first, that in determining whether the instrument propounded was intended to be testamentary, reference will be had to the surrounding circumstances, and the language will be construed in the light of these circumstances. Second, that if it shall appear under all the circumstances that the instrument was intended to be testamentary, the court will give effect to the intention, if it can be done consistently with the language of the instrument; and in such cases the particular form of the instrument is immaterial.' Clarke v. Ransom, 50 Cal. 600. 'A will may be informally drawn, and may consist of one or more papers. No particular words are necessary to show a testamentary intent. It must appear only that the maker intended by it to dispose of property after his death, and parol evidence as to the attending circumstances is admissible.' Mitchell v. Donohue, 100 Cal. 207, 34 P. 615, 38 Am. St. Rep. 279. 'It is undoubtedly the general rule enunciated by the leading case of Habergham v. Vincent, 2 Ves. Jr. 231, and oft repeated, that the true test of the character of an instrument is not the testator's realization that it is a will, but his intention to create a revocable disposition of his property to accrue and take effect only upon his death and passing no present interest.' Nichols v. Emery, 109 Cal. 329, 41 P. 1091, 50 Am. St. Rep. 43."

So far as the present consideration is concerned, it is not important to inquire what particular thought or purpose was in her mind when she wrote the statement in the second writing to the effect that she had changed her mind as to her testamentary plans regarding her grandchildren, or in what particular or particulars she had changed her mind; nor is it of consequence, in the determination of the present question, that the words with which the deceased expressed in the second writing her desire that her son should be given or receive something from her estate are of a precatory nature. It is sufficient to know that the deceased intended that both paragraphs were to be taken together as constituting her last will and testament.

The construction to which thus the document before us has been subjected rests upon reasons no less cogent or persuasive than those upon which this court, in cases hitherto decided, has sustained several separate documents as constituting together single olographic wills. Estate of Skerrett, 67 Cal. 585, 8 P. 181; Estate of Merryfield, 167 Cal. 729, 141 P. 259. Indeed, the case here, as to the facts from which the intention of the deceased is to be deduced, stands upon a footing somewhat stronger than that buttressing the cases just named, in that in the instant case the two writings are upon the same sheet of paper, while in the other cases the writings were on separate sheets.

In the Skerrett Case there were two separate writings, one of which was a copy of a deed of gift to the grantee therein named of certain real property, and written, dated, and signed entirely in the handwriting of the deceased, and the other a letter addressed to said grantee, and entirely in the handwriting of the deceased. The original deed was executed and acknowledged in the presence of witnesses, but was never delivered, and was therefore ineffective as a grant of real property. The letter was not dated. A copy of the deed and the letter were found after the death of the deceased in an envelope in a tin box belonging to him. The court held that, while neither document, taken alone, would constitute an olographic will—the copy of the deed because not containing testamentary words, and the letter because, although containing testamentary words and stating that deceased intended that the grantee named in the deed should receive as a devise the real property therein described, it was undated—the two, taken together, as the deceased undoubtedly intended they should be considered, formed a complete olographic will.

In the Merryfield Case there were three separate writings on as many different sheets of paper. These sheets were found folded together in a locked drawer, and each entirely in the handwriting of the deceased. The language of each was testamentary in character, and all related to the same general subject-matter and the same parties whom deceased clearly intended to make the beneficiaries of her estate. The first writing was neither dated nor signed; the second was signed by the deceased, but imperfectly dated; the third was dated and signed by the deceased. The one mentioned certain heirs to whom the deceased expressed the intention of giving nothing. The third sheet, in the order in which they were folded together, and as above given, omitted to mention said heirs, but was itself otherwise complete as an olographic will. All three papers were presented together for probate as constituting the will of deceased. The claim was urged, in a contest to the admission of the will to probate, that the writing upon the third sheet alone constituted the will of the deceased. The trial court decided that the contents of the three sheets, taken together, constituted a single instrument, and that such instrument constituted the last will and testament of the deceased. On appeal this court sustained the decision of the trial court.

[2] The subscription to the second paragraph, "Your loving mother," if a material consideration here, is a sufficient signature. Ex parte Walker, 15 Quebec Probate Reports, also entitled "Rapport's de Practique de Quebec," 15; Estate of Kimmel, 278 Pa. 435, 123 A. 405, 31 A. L. R. 678; Wells v. Lewis, 190 Ky. 626, 228 S. W. 3; Page on Wills, § 170. But, in view of the conclusion that the two writings together constitute an olographic will, the contention that the subscription to said writing, "From your loving Mother," is not such a signature as the law requires shall be subscribed to a will is of no material importance, since the signature of the testatrix at the end of the first paragraph sufficiently measures up to the requirement as to the signatures to wills. Where a will has been signed by the testator, it is sufficient even though the signature is not in the place on the instrument where usually such a writing is signed, viz., at the end of the document. Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, 163 P. 669, L. R. A. 1917D, 778. Of course, this statement is subject to the qualification that the signature of the testator, if not subscribed to the will—that is, if it is not at the end of the instrument, the usual place for the signature in such cases—then it must so appear from the document itself that the signature was thus placed "with the intent that it should there serve as a token of execution" as to afford "a positive and satisfactory inference" to that effect. Estate of Manchester, 174 Cal. 417, 163 P. 358, L. R. A. 1917D, 629, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 227; Estate of Streeton, 183 Cal. 284, 191 P. 16. That the instant case fully exemplifies the test thus stated is a proposition too obvious to require further consideration.

[3] The contention that the action of the court in conducting the proceeding involving the matter of the admission of the will to probate in the absence of the jury was improper is opposed to the rule in that particular declared by our decisions. This court has a number of times held that the procedure followed in this case by the court below involves the only course to be pursued where the probate of a will is contested. See Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 73 P. 1070, 74 P. 441; Estate of McDermott, 148 Cal. 43, 49, 82 P. 842; Estate of Cullberg, 169 Cal. 365, 146 P. 888; Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 451, 458, 459, 221 P. 361. The last-named case contains the latest expression of this court upon the subject, and, though, as seen, the procedure in this class of cases is definitely settled in this state, it is conceived not to be supererogatory to give the importance of keeping the rule in mind in instances such as we have here further emphasis by quoting the following clear exposition of the rule in the Relph Case:

"When a will is contested before probate there are two separate and distinct proceedings pending before the court. One is the petition for the probate of the will; the other is the contest of the probate of the will. [Citing cases.] The petition for the probate of a will is distinctly a proceeding in rem. Estate of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 585, 150 P. 989; Estate of Allen, 176 Cal. 632, 169 P. 364. * * * In the proceeding for the probate of the will, as distinguished from the proceedings upon the contest, the evidence and the issues of fact are solely for the consideration and determination of the court, even though a jury may have been demanded and impaneled for the trial of the issues upon the contest. * * * The contestants are not parties to this proceeding and have no right to appear therein, * * * but the trial court, having itself the right to cross-examine the witnesses produced therein, may, in the exercise of its discretion, permit counsel for contestants so to do. * * * But when such permission is granted it is as a matter of

[4, 5] There is no merit to the contention that the decree appealed from is unsupported because there was a failure to prove that the deceased, at the time she executed the testament, was mentally sound or possessed of testamentary capacity; nor is there any force in the further contention that the decree cannot stand because the court failed to find certain jurisdictional facts. To the proposition first stated, a ready answer is found in the rule, elementary in our system of jurisprudence, that a testator is to be presumed to have been sane when making his will, and that, in the case of a contest of the probate of a will, the proponent, when he opens the proceeding by preliminary proof of the due execution of the instrument, may rely on said presumption as constituting sufficient evidence of the testamentary competency of the testator until the same shall have been overthrown by countervailing proof. Estate of Johnson, 152 Cal. 778, 783, 784, 93 P. 1015; Estate of Cullberg, 169 Cal. 365, 146 P. 888. The contestant here having abandoned his contest and therefore offered no evidence to support any of the grounds thereof, the presumption referred to stands as the only evidence in the case as to the testamentary capacity of the deceased at the time she executed the will, and thus there is ample support to the decree or judgment in that particular. The proposition secondly stated involves a challenge of the legal integrity of the decree or judgment or order on the ground that there was a failure to make express findings that, at the time deceased executed the will, she was over the age of 18 years (Civ. Code, § 1270), and also that, as the petition for the probate of the will alleges, she was of sound and disposing mind and memory, "and not acting under duress, fraud, or undue influence of any person," etc. The validity of a judgment or an order admitting a will to probate is not dependent upon the recital therein of the existence of facts, or the performance of acts, upon which the jurisdiction of the court must rest. It is only necessary that the judgment or order shall contain, as does the decree in this case, the matters ordered or adjudged. Code Civ. Proc. § 1704. Of course, the jurisdictional facts must exist, but their existence and the finding thereof are to be implied from those matters which, under the law, must be by the judgment shown to be ordered and adjudged. Furthermore, there was no testimony disputing that of the witness Cutting that the deceased, on the 9th day of August, 1922, the date of her will, was of the age, approximately, of 84 years; nor, as seen, was the presumption of the mental soundness or testamentary competency of the deceased, or that she was not unduly influenced or otherwise wrongfully procured to make the will, contradicted or impeached, evidentially. A judgment, being in all other respects sufficiently supported, will stand immune from successful attack, notwithstanding that there has been a failure to find on an admitted or an uncontroverted vital fact or issue. In other words, if, as would be true here, the findings upon issues upon which findings have been pretermitted would necessarily have to be adverse to the appellant, the failure to find thereon would be without prejudice. See 2 Cal. Juris, § 614, p. 1032 et seq.

[6] It is further contended that the judgment or order is wanting in essential support because of the failure of the court to make a certificate of the facts found and cause the same to be attached to the will, as provided in section 1317 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section, it is clear, not only from its language but from its position in the Code, was intended to and does apply exclusively to cases where there is a contest of the probate of the will. The section, which is under article 2 of chapter 2, and under the subhead "Contesting Probate of Wills," reads:

"If the court is satisfied, upon the proof taken, or from the facts found by the jury, that the will was duly executed, and that the testator at the time of its execution was of sound and disposing mind, and not acting under duress, menace, fraud, or undue influence, a certificate of the proof and the facts found, signed by the judge and attested by the seal of the court, must be attached to the will."

Here, as seen, there was no contest, and the judgment contains all the facts which are required to be set out therein where there is no contest. In such case, the Legislature, it seems, regarded the findings, together with the presumptions favorable to the order or judgment which the law wisely indulges, as being sufficient.

[7] Lastly, it is contended that the court transcended its authority or jurisdiction by appointing the legatee, Francis Cutting, as executor of the will. This contention is grounded upon the asserted fact that the will does not, eo nomine, nominate an executor; it being hence argued that it was the duty of the court to issue either to Orrin S. Henderson or to Mrs. Cutting, son and daughter of deceased and her only surviving heirs, letters of administration, with will annexed. Sections 1350a and 1365, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of Crites, 155 Cal. 392, 101 P. 316, and cases therein named. As will be observed, the first of the two writings constituting the will of the deceased, contains the following words: "And request that Frank Cutting have charge of my affairs." This language means, as is naturally to be inferred from the connection in which it is used, that the deceased desired and intended that said Cutting, her son-in-law and a legatee by the terms of her testament, should be appointed as the executor thereof. Indeed, it would be difficult reasonably to give that language any other interpretation. Where the intention of a testator that a certain person shall be named as executor to carry out the terms of his will is not expressed therein with directness, but is reasonably deducible from the language thereof, it is the duty of the court sitting in probate to respect that intention and so appoint such person as such executor. Civ. Code, § 1371; Morffew v. S. F. & S. R. R. R. Co., 107 Cal. 587, 40 P. 810; Estate of Ringot, 124 Cal. 45, 56 P. 781.

There are no other points requiring notice herein.

The order or judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Proceedings by Thomas H. Presho and another, to have admitted to probate a document purporting to be the last will, and the codicil thereto, of Matthew Presho, deceased, contested by Laura C. Presho. From a judgment refusing to admit either instrument, proponents appeal. Judgment refusing to admit proposed will reversed, and judgment refusing to admit proposed codicil affirmed.

C. L. Witten, H. W. McComas, Ward Sullivan, and W. A. Beasly, all of San Jose, for appellants.

Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, for respondent.

SHENK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment refusing to admit to probate a document purporting to be the will of Matthew Presho, deceased, and a codicil thereto. The judgment was entered pursuant to a verdict finding on six special issues in favor of the contestant, Laura C. Presho. Matthew Presho died in the county of Santa Clara on April 20, 1923, being about 73 years of age, and leaving an estate of approximately $40,000. The proposed will was signed on May 5, 1921, and the codicil on March 31, 1922. Surviving him are his widow, the contestant and respondent herein, and certain brothers and sisters. Thomas H. Presho, a brother, is the proponent and one of the appellants. The other appellant is Nellie Elizabeth Presho, an only daughter of Thomas, and one of the beneficiaries under the will. Matthew left no children. The provisions of the will devised and bequeathed to the contestant the home place consisting of a 50-vara lot at the corner of San Carlos and Third streets in the city of San Jose, together with the household goods. On the lot is a house in which Matthew and his wife made their home and a 13-room house which they rented. This property is variously appraised, but its fair valuation is about $21,500. A house and lot, also in San Jose, valued at approximately $7,000 was devised to the appellant niece. Thomas was left the residue, and was appointed executor without bonds. The proponent contends, and it is not denied, that the larger part of the estate was the separate property of the deceased, and that the contestant would receive under the terms of the original will fully one-half of the estate. The codicil reduced the contestant's share to a life estate in the 50-vara lot.

The grounds of opposition to the proposed will and to the codicil, separately stated as to each document, are (1) want of testamentary capacity, (2) undue influence on the part of Thomas Presho, and (3) fraud. The jury rendered its verdict in favor of the contestant as to both the will and codicil on each ground of contest. At the close of contestant's case a motion for a nonsuit was interposed as to the three issues affecting the proposed will, and was denied. Said motion was not directed to the three issues affecting the proposed codicil. After the entry of judgment, a motion for a new trial was made and denied.

[1, 2] The appellants contend that the motion for a nonsuit should have prevailed, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, and that the court committed certain prejudicial errors during the course of the trial. As to the motion for a nonsuit, if the evidence presented by the contestant, viewed in its most favorable light, would not support the verdict in her favor, the court should have granted the motion. See Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 113 P. 130. As to the sufficiency of the evidence, if from all the evidence the verdict is based on material facts legally proved, or on inferences which may be reasonably drawn from those facts, even though there be an honest difference of opinion as to the effect of the evidence, the verdict will be deemed supported. Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 661, 666, 34 P. 504; Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 791, 158 P. 753; Hind, Rolph Co. v. Oriental Products Co. (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 438; 2 Cal. Jur. 879, and cases cited.

Matthew and Laura C. Presho were married in October, 1905. Prior to that time Matthew had been in business in San Jose about 21 years, most of that time in partnership with his brother, Thomas, in the wood and coal business. The partnership continued until June 1, 1918, when it was dissolved. Matthew and his wife lived alone in their home on the property at the corner of San Carlos and Third streets until 1919. Thomas then went to live with them and remained with them until the death of Matthew. During the time the couple lived alone, their relations were amicable; the deceased attending to his business with regularity, and the wife attending to her household duties. In 1916 the deceased contracted a disease of the stomach which grew worse in later years and ultimately caused his death. From the time Thomas came into the household in 1919 there was dissension between him and the contestant. The trouble became aggravated as time went on; Thomas charging the contestant with improper and inefficient care of her husband, and the contestant contending that Thomas was usurping her place in the home and attempting to cause an estrangement between herself and her husband.

On the issue of want of testamentary capacity, the respondent relied on certain testimony, which will be noted, as sufficient to support the verdict. In response to a question as to whether she noticed any irrational conduct on the part of her husband from the time Thomas came to live with them until the date of the will and thereafter until the date of the codicil the contestant testified:

"A. The first thing of all he [the deceased] was of a very positive nature. He could not be ruled or controlled by anybody. He would have bad nights, couldn't sleep, and he would say, 'You poisoned me, you doped me; I can't stay in this house because, Laura, you are dop-

ing me'; and I would say, 'Why, Matthew dear, I wouldn't hurt a hair of your head'; and then he would say, 'I know you wouldn't'; and then he would kiss me and tell me how much he loved me, and then he would say, 'I wouldn't take anything from you, Laura, if I thought that'; and then that would come all over again every day, every morning. * * *

"Q. Can you state any other irrational acts that your husband did during the time and in the presence of Thomas Presho, during the time that Thomas Presho was at your house? A. He would say, 'Laura, you are no relation to me; you are a stranger; you go home to your mother and stay, or else I will pay your board at the Vendome'; and then in a few minutes after that he would be loving and kissing me, and telling me how much he loved me. And another time, I had some cushions—he had some cushions on the chair—and I am very short, and it made me up too high in the chair so I took the cushions out gently, and he was very easily angered, and without any provocation he began beating me over the head. He was so weak and feeble that I was surprised, and I got out of the chair, and I put my arms around him and said, 'God forgive you, Matthew, you know not what you do'; and I went upstairs and cried and cried. This was just before we went to the Home of Rest, and that was about January 1, 1922. * * * That codicil was drawn about 11 days after he came home from the Home of Rest. We came home March 20, 1922, and then another thing—I was getting my dinner one day, and he had been just as sweet and nice as possible, and all of a sudden he jumped up and said, 'You! You! You are trying to dope me; you are trying to poison me'; and he came toward me, looking as wild and angry as he could be. 'You are trying to dope me, Laura'; and he went like this (indicating by placing hands around her neck) trying to choke me. I don't remember when this was exactly; I think it was after he came home from the Home of Rest, a couple of days after. * * * But I said, 'Matthew, don't you know that if a person would do that, that is criminal; I would be taken to the penitentiary if I were to do anything like that. * * *

"Q. Do you think of any other irrational acts that your husband did? A. Well, he was very quick and irritable, without any cause, without any provocation. He was not able to eat during the last months of his illness; he practically starved to death—not that he didn't have enough to eat, but that it did not assimilate. * * * He did not eat any solid food at all during the last six months. In my opinion my husband was not of sound mind in the year 1921, and the year 1922.

"Q. Give us some of your reasons for saying he was not of sound mind? A. I have given you so many reasons. He was so easily influenced, and Tom Presho kept him in an antagonistic mental attitude against me, and kept him angry with me all the time, and when he was angry he lost his head completely, and I don't think he would have done the things he did if he was himself. Tom Presho kept him in an angry state against me. He hammered at him from morning until night against me, and I heard him. And I can give you another reason for thinking he was not of sound mind—just before Tom Presho took my husband away to the sanitarium, he got him out of bed in the Morris chair, and I went in there suddenly, and Tom Presho had written out a check, and he had his hand over my husband's hand, and was guiding him with the name, and I came in, and he jumped up and stepped aside, and Matthew did finish it out alone. At times my husband appreciated me highly, and again he did not seem to realize I was his wife, because he would tell me I was a perfect stranger to him, and he would say, 'You don't belong here, Laura; you are no relation to me.' He said that many times before and after the dates of the will and the codicil, May 5, 1921, and March 31, 1922. * * *

"Q. Did you know that Mr. Presho talked with different people who came in there, on the topics of the day, intelligently? A. When he was kept in a passive mood, or when Tom Presho was not there, he was all right; but, when Tom Presho kept him in an angry way, he completely lost his head. I never discussed his business affairs with him. I do not know whether or not he knew and understood and appreciated the nature and extent of his property. I can't tell you whether he knew and understood his bank account when he took off Tom's name and put my name on there.

"Q. Now, prior to the 5th day of May, 1921, will you state and describe all irrational acts or statements that you ever heard your husband make? A. Well, when he was at the woodyard he came home one day with a wire around his body, and I said, 'What is that for?" and he said, 'I am going to get well by having that on.' That struck me as very erratic. This was one strand of copper wire, and he wore it next to the flesh. He had it on his body when he came home. He must have put it on at the woodyard. No one was present when he exhibited it to me. When he came home that night the wire was on his body, and he wore it for quite a while. I don't recall whether he told me that any one had advised him to wear that to treat himself for sickness.

"Q. Now, give another irrational act or irrational statement prior to May 5, 1921? A. Well, he was very, very, very quick tempered, but he was over it in a flash, and then he was very penitent and very loving.

"Q. And you would call that one of the reasons, you say, for thinking he was of unsound mind? A. I didn't say that.

"Q. I am asking you now; I am trying to make it clear to you that I want you to detail any act, that in your opinion was irrational on the part of your husband, or to detail any statement made by him prior to May 5, 1921? A. Well, sometimes he was so poor, I thought that we wouldn't have enough to eat; then another time he would say he was worth from $80,000 to $100,000. To my mind that is not like a sound man, because sometimes it was pitiful, he was so poor. I think that was during war time. Matthew would say to me, 'Laura, we are making so much money, it is just like pouring down a chute, it makes me dizzy'; and I said, 'Let us have a player piano'; and then he was so poor, he didn't have 5 cents to his name. As a matter of fact business was very good during the war; he said it was coming in like a chute, it made him dizzy. I guess the fact is he didn't want to buy a player piano.

"Q. That is one of the things that your husband did that leads you to conclude that he was of unsound mind? A. I think so, yes.

"Q. Now, give me another act or statement, prior to May 5, 1921, that to your mind was irrational? A. Without any cause whatever he would take dislikes to people. Sometimes he would be so friendly with them, and then again he would be positively rude to them, the same people. I think it was during his sickness, the beginning of his sickness. * * *

"Q. Can you recall now any other act, or any other statement made by your husband prior to the 5th day of May, 1921, that indicated he was irrational? A. Yes; I was always allowed to go in the automobile, and understood it belonged to him, belonged to the two of them; and then it got so I was not allowed to go in the automobile, and Matthew said one day, 'I want you to go in the automobile this morning'; and I said, 'What am I to understand, you have been riding around without me all the time, and you didn't miss me, and I guess I won't go to-day; you tell me one day it belongs to you, and the next day you say it is all Tom's.' At one time he would tell me the automobile belonged to him, and the next time he would tell me it was all Tom Presho's. This is one of the reasons I have for thinking my husband was of unsound mind. It was a partnership automobile, and I knew it was. He told me it belonged to him, and he told me it belonged to both of them. And another thing, he would tell me a thing one time, and then he would contradict what he said completely. I think it was this way—the reason I think he was of unsound mind is this way: One time Tom Presho was standing in front of the sink, and I came up and put my fingers, just touched him with my hand because he was in the way, and Tom abused me; called me [vile names]; and Matthew, that was one of the times he had a normal period and was himself, and saw the injustice of Tom's brutality, and Matthew said, 'Tom, you leave this house; I don't want you to stay here; don't you take another meal here'; and Tom didn't take any more meals there. And then again my husband would let Tom abuse me; so you see he was not rational, because one time he would let him abuse me, and another time he would stand up for me.

"Q. Was that one of the things that made you think he was irrational? A. No; that was one of his rare moments, when he was competent.

"Q. Give us * * * the most irrational statement that your husband ever made, or describe the most irrational act, to your mind, showing that he was of unsound mind prior to May 5, 1921? A. I can recall it very plainly. He was shaving up in the bedroom, about 1920, and without any cause, he used to get mad without a cause, because he was sick and irritable, and he said, 'I will take this razor, and I will put it across your neck'; and I said, 'Matthew, you wouldn't do that'; and in a few minutes after that he said, 'Laura, you would trust me, wouldn't you; you know that I wouldn't hurt you,' or something like that; but at the time I almost thought he would. No one was present but by husband and myself. * * * Another peculiar thing he did, when we slept together [prior to 1919] we had a great big bay window that we kept open, and we would leave that open, but we would always shut the door, and he would make me leave a marble block in the door to keep it open. * * * I don't know what for, for we had always kept it closed, but he wanted it open."

Dr. J. T. Blair, a physician and surgeon, who attended the deceased professionally in the latter part of 1919, was of the opinion that in that year the deceased was not of sound mind. Te testified:

"I knew the deceased, Matthew Presho. I had known him before 1919, and I had seen him occasionally before that, and I last saw him the latter part of 1919 at his home. Matthew Presho did not call me professionally, but his wife did. At that time she called me down to look him over, but that was the last time I saw him. I went over him pretty carefully, but I couldn't make anything out of him, and he said he didn't want any doctor, and I just let it go at that. His wife wanted me to look him over, and see what was the trouble with him, and I couldn't make anything much out of him, and he would not follow my instructions, so I thought it best to let the matter rest. This was in the latter part of 1919. At that time I formed an opinion as to the soundness of mind of the deceased. I don't think he was of sound mind. I formed that opinion at that time, and that was the only time I saw him.

"Q. What reason had you for that opinion? A. Well, I asked him several questions, and he couldn't give me any intelligent answers. I asked him about his general condition, how long he had been sick, and how he felt sick."

Sadie E. Jefferson testified she had known the deceased for the last 3 years of his life; that during those 3 years she had talked to him 6 or 8 times, and that she had noticed he was getting mentally weaker from and after the first time she saw him.

Dr. A. T. McGinty testified that he had attended the deceased professionally; that he had heard, either in the home or at his office, some intimation that contestant might have put something in the food of the deceased, but "it was not an accusation; it was no more than a suggestion that she might have put something in his food, and that was said by either Tom or the deceased, I don't remember which one. * * * Mr. Presho [the deceased] was always ready to know what was going on and asked me how things were and how business was, and how things were going around town."

Mrs. Belle Quinn testified that she had known Matthew Presho for about 15 years. The last time she saw him was in October, 1921. She saw him at her own home, and he was very feeble at that time. She again saw him in 1922, when he looked rather frail, the expression of his eyes looked very glassy, and his face was strained and drawn, and he spoke very little.

Mrs. Charles Herrmann testified that on a day she could not remember she called to see Mrs. Presho. She noticed the deceased at the door and said to him, "I want to see Laura," and he did not recognize the witness. He simply said, "Walk in." Later on he came into the house and addressing the witness said, "Mrs. Herrmann, I did not know you for a moment when you were outside." That was all that was said. The only thing said or done by the deceased that indicated to this witness that the deceased was not rational was that "he allowed his brother to talk to his wife the way he did."

[3, 4] Considering the foregoing evidence and the other evidence in the record on behalf of the contestant in a light most favorable to contestant's contention, it cannot be said that it is sufficient to establish that on the 5th day of May, 1921, when the will was signed, the deceased was affected with general testamentary incapacity or was suffering from such insane delusions that he was not on that day familiar with the extent of his property, did not know those who would be the natural objects of his bounty, or that he did not know and understand the nature of the act in which he was then engaged. Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 86 P. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795; Estate of Chevallier, supra; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 P. 932; Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 164 P. 1110; Estate of Casarotti, 184 Cal. 73, 192 P. 1085; Estate of Holloway (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 1012. The statements of a physician who last saw him in 1919 that the deceased was of unsound mind, and of friends and acquaintances as to his weakened mental and physical condition, fall far short of the requirements upon which testamentary incapacity may properly be founded (Estate of Purcell, supra) and are not sufficient to avoid a nonsuit (Estate of Anderson, 185 Cal. 700, 714, 198 P. 407). As the evidence shows, the deceased frequently expressed his belief that his wife was doping and poisoning him, but he soon thereafter changed his attitude and said he knew she would not do such a thing. This belief was not irrational because it was not permanent, and it was not an insane delusion because it was based on statements made to him by Thomas, a person in whom the deceased unquestionably had confidence. Estate of Kendrick, 130 Cal. 360, 62 P. 605. The deceased stated to his wife that she was a stranger to him. This statement was made when he was in a condition of irritability, but as soon as the spell had passed he would recant and express his deep love for her. There can be no pretense that such a statement was made in the sense that he did not recognize his wife. Irritability and bad temper may result in unnatural actions, but they are not inconsistent with testamentary capacity. Estate of Riordan, 13 Cal. App. 313, 109 P. 629.

[5-7] As to the alleged undue influence affecting the execution of the will, the respondent relies on the foregoing evidence and in addition thereto the further testimony of the contestant that Thomas Presho began when he came into their home to tell decedent that contestant was "doping" him, was trying to kill him, was trying to railroad him to the asylum, and was keeping him sick; "that this was said every day, commencing from the time Tom came to the house, I think it was continuous." She testified that she did not "dope" her husband; that before the will was executed Thomas stated in the presence of the deceased that the respondent was not true to her marital obligations; that the will was made secretly so far as she was concerned, for she knew nothing of it until after the death of the deceased. But such evidence does not constitute proof of pressure brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act. In re McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 30 P. 101; Estate of Anderson, supra. Abundant proof, as respondent contends, of a confidential relationship between the brothers may be assumed, but such proof is not in itself sufficient to establish undue influence. There must in addition be proof that the one occupying such relationship displayed activity in the preparation of the will to his undue profit. Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 457, 465, 221 P. 361; Estate of Lavinburg, 161 Cal. 536, 543, 119 P. 915; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 461, 117 P. 532; Estate of Morcel, 162 Cal. 188, 196, 121 P. 733. No such activity on the part of Thomas Presho as to the execution of the will is here shown. The evidence offered on behalf of the contestant was therefore wholly insufficient to support a finding that such undue influence was exercised by Thomas over the deceased at the time the will was executed on May 5, 1921, as to destroy the free agency of the deceased and overcome his volition at that time. Estate of Relph, supra; Estate of Kilborn, 162 Cal. 4, 120 P. 762; Estate of Baird, 176 Cal. 384, 168 P. 561.

[8] The respondent also relies on the foregoing evidence in support of her contention that the will was procured as a result of fraud practiced on the deceased by his brother, Thomas. It is insisted that Thomas continually charged the respondent with "doping" her husband; that this charge was repeatedly made in the presence of the deceased, was untrue, was known by Thomas to have been untrue, and believed by the deceased. But the will was not unfair to the respondent, and it cannot be said that the statements so credited to Thomas were reflected in the provisions of the will to her detriment. Estate of Shay (Cal. Sup.) 237 P. 1079. Excluding all consideration of the evidence in support of the proponents of the will, it must be concluded that the evidence on behalf of the contestant as to any of the grounds of contest concerning the proposed will was not inconsistent with the claim that the will was the spontaneous act of the decedent. It was fair to the contestant, who concedes that under it she would receive "something in excess of the share that she would have received if the deceased had died intestate." Furthermore, it was not an unnatural will so far as Thomas Presho was concerned, taking into consideration the long and intimate business relationship and admitted affection between the brothers. The evidence adduced on behalf of the contestant, taken as a whole, was entirely insufficient to support the findings of the jury on those issues. The motion for a nonsuit should therefore have been granted.

[9] As to the special issues concerning the alleged invalidity of the codicil, the respondent, in support of her contention of want of mental capacity, testified:

"About the 23d or 24th of March, 1922, Thomas Presho took my husband on the street car, and I met them as they were coming home, on the home corner, where he had been associated with the surroundings for 35 years, and on the east side of his own home corner, and he stopped, and my husband said: 'Where are we? I don't know where we are. Where are we? We are on the wrong street, aren't we?' And he was looking at his own home at that time. This was about the 23d or 24th of March, 1922. If this codicil is dated March 31, 1922, it was about a week before the codicil was signed. And then I had always tasted his food; I would take two tablespoonfuls of all his food to get him over that notion that he was being poisoned, and to show Mr. Tom Presho that the food was all right, and for his protection too, and I would always take it, part of it, and taste it, but then Matthew had no memory, and he would not remember, and the next day it would be the same thing all over again, that I had doped him. This condition of forgetfulness got constantly worse."

[10-13] This incident, when considered with other evidence in the case, merely establishes that the deceased was suffering momentary confusion. Such a condition may be accounted for by his age and general physical debility, and is entirely insufficient to overthrow the presumption of sanity existing in favor of the testator at the time of the execution of the codicil. The infirmities of age and lapse of memory are not sufficient in themselves to establish lack of testamentary capacity. Estate of Dolbeer, supra; Estate of Purcell, supra; Estate of Maccrellish, 167 Cal. 711, 141 P. 257, L. R. A. 1915A, 443. Nor was the evidence sufficient to justify the special finding of the jury that the codicil was the product of fraud practiced upon the deceased by Thomas Presho. But on the special issue of undue influence as to the codicil there was evidence from which reasonable inferences might be drawn that the execution thereof was the result of influence in its procurement directly brought to bear upon the deceased by Thomas Presho. This evidence is found in part in the testimony of the contestant as to what took place on the day the codicil was signed by the deceased, and is as follows:

"Q. I call your attention to March 31, 1922, the date of this codicil, and I will ask you what happened on that day between Thomas Presho, your husband, Matthew, and yourself. A. The back porch of my home has a sunny exposure, and I had been doing my work, and they (my husband and Tom Presho) did not know I was anywhere around. Tom and my husband were sitting on the back porch, and I heard Tom Presho say to Matthew: 'It is all right, Matthew; it is all right, Matthew. Remember, Matthew, remember, Matthew, I am your brother. Judge Gosbey will believe me, but he won't believe her,' and he emphasized 'her.' So I knew there was something wrong. This was in the morning. So then I don't remember just when it was, but following that I saw my husband with some papers—I think it was the same day, and following that I went out and got in the automobile, the automobile was out in front of the house, and I got in the automobile and Tom Presho spoke up and said, 'Get out of this automobile'; and I just sat there, because I made up my mind I was going to see where they were going and what they were going to do, and so, when I did not get out, Tom Presho said, 'Well, I will railroad her down to the jail.' My husband had got out of the automobile, so I thought my husband had gone into the house, and I got out to look for him, and anyway they gave me the slip and went off together. They left in the automobile. I don't remember whether it was in the morning or afternoon, but I think it was in the afternoon. I heard that statement about Judge Gosbey in the morning, very plainly, when they were on the porch, and I was doing my work around the adjoining part of the house. My husband and Thomas went away in the machine, and they returned about 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon. My husband came in and Tom had made him so angry with me, as he always did when he had him alone, and he said, 'You were well fixed, Laura, but now you will have enough to eat as long as I live.' And Tom said, 'Well, there will be weeping of tears and gnashing of teeth, but it's right, it's right.' My husband was present when that was said. Tom repeated, 'It's right, it's right.' My husband was kept in that angry state. He was sick, and he was kept in that angry state all the time by Tom Presho. Neither my husband nor Tom Presho said what they referred to when they made these statements. I first knew of the existence of this codicil after my husband passed away. I had never seen it before that time. I was never told by my husband that it was in existence."

The foregoing evidence was undoubtedly believed by the jury to be true. From such evidence it may fairly be said that the jury might properly and reasonably infer that on the occasion referred to Thomas had in mind a proposed codicil; that he was importuning the deceased to make the same; that if such codicil were offered for probate the evidence of himself (Thomas) would be believed and that of the wife would be disregarded; that Thomas, in accordance with his plan to procure a change in the will to his advantage and to the prejudice of the wife, concealed from the latter his purpose, and so dominated the will of the deceased as to make the codicil a product of his own desires and not the free and voluntary act of the deceased. Evidence that pressure was on that day brought to bear on the testamentary act need not be direct. Circumstantial evidence is sufficient. In re McDevitt, supra; Estate of Anderson, supra. In addition to the testimony of the contestant, Thomas Presho testified that on the day the codicil was signed there was a conversation between Matthew and himself concerning a change in the will; that he took Matthew to an attorney's office and was present when the codicil was dictated, at which time Matthew told the attorney that he desired to change the provisions of his will regarding his wife from a direct devise to a life estate. The testimony of the contestant as to what had taken place at the home on the day of and prior to the signing of the codicil and the testimony of Thomas as to what took place immediately thereafter were sufficient upon which to base the conclusion that the subject-matter in the minds of Matthew and Thomas during the controversy related by the wife was a change in the will, and that the activity of Thomas on that day had the direct result of a modification in the will to his advantage.

Numerous objections to rulings of the trial court on the admission of evidence have been noted. In view of the conclusions above expressed, none of them is of sufficient importance to require discussion.

The judgment refusing to admit to probate the proposed will of May 5, 1921, is reversed, and the judgment refusing to admit to probate the proposed codicil of March 31, 1922, is affirmed.

TOMSKY et al. v. CLARK et al. (Civ. 4920.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 29, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 27, 1925.)

1. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⟸67—What must be established to prove "unfair competition" in use of similar corporate name stated.

To establish a complete case of unfair competition against defendants using a corporate name similar to the firm name of plaintiffs, plaintiffs were required to establish that by care, attention, skill, and strict adherence to business they had built up an extensive, valuable, and profitable business, and that defendants, by fraudulent use of such corporate name, and by unfair and fraudulent practices, were deceiving and misleading the public, and thereby seeking to deprive plaintiffs of their customers and trade.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Unfair Competition.]

2. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⟸73(3)—Filing of certificate of copartnership by plaintiffs under family name of another held to give them no right to perpetual use thereof to exclusion of real owner.

That plaintiffs filed a certificate of copartnership to operate a business under the family name of another gave them no perpetual right to use of such name to exclusion of real owner thereof, so as to deprive him from ever afterwards engaging in same kind of business in his own name or through medium of a corporation bearing his name; it being immaterial that there was some one connected with plaintiffs' firm by such name.

3. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⟸73(1)—Family name is incapable of exclusive appropriation.

Right to do business under one's own name is one of the sacred rights known to law, and a family name is incapable of exclusive appropriation, and cannot be thus monopolized.

4. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⟸73(1)—Every man has absolute right to use his own name in his own business, though interfering with business of another bearing same name.

Every man has absolute right to use his own name in his own business, even though he may interfere with and injure business of another bearing same name, provided he does not resort to any artifice or do any act calculated to mislead the public as to identity of establishments, or to produce injury to other beyond that which results from similarity of names.

5. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⟸73(1)—Will not allow person to resort to artifice in use of his name to deceive the public.

Equity will not allow a person to resort to artifice or contrivance in use of his name to deceive the public as to his business or products.

6. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⟸73(3)—Plaintiffs might be enjoined from use of defendant's name in their business, where it deceived public and was injurious to defendant's business and reputation.

Where plaintiffs operating collection agency adopted defendant's name as a part of their firm name without his consent, seeking to take advantage of his former business reputation as a collector, and thereby leading public to believe that he was personally connected with their firm, and defendant being lawfully engaged in same character of business, and operation of plaintiffs' business under such fictitious name not only deceiving public as to identity of business, but manner in which plaintiffs operated it being injurious to defendant's business and reputation, held that plaintiffs might be enjoined from use of defendant's name.

7. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⊂=92—Cross-complaint might be filed in suit to enjoin use of name by another.

In suit to enjoin defendants from using name adopted by plaintiffs, defendants might properly file a cross-complaint, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 442.

8. Trade-marks and trade-names and unfair competition ⊂=86—Defendant held not estopped by laches from seeking affirmative relief in suit to restrain use of his name.

In suit to enjoin defendant from using his name in his business after it had been adopted by plaintiffs in their business, defendant held not estopped by laches from seeking affirmative relief, where his attention was not called to fact that plaintiffs were using his name in their business, and he did not learn of it until after suit was brought.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Suit by Samuel C. Tomsky and another, copartners doing business under the name and style of the Rauer Collection Company, against Roy E. Clark, J. J. Rauer, and others, with cross-complaint by second named defendant. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by the Supreme Court; Knight, Justice pro tem., not participating.

Jacob S. Meyer and James Walter Scott, both of San Francisco (John Prosek, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

H. M. Anthony and Gus C. Ringole, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Plaintiffs, Samuel C. Tomsky and Leo Andrew Cole, as copartners doing business under the firm name of the Rauer Collection Company, and the corporate defendant, Rauer's Law & Collection Company, Inc., of which the individual defendants Roy E. Clark, J. J. Rauer, and H. S. Smith are officers and stockholders, are engaged in the same kind of business in the city and county of San Francisco, that of collecting debts. Plaintiffs commenced this action to enjoin said defendants from using the name "Rauer's Law & Collection Company, Inc.," in connection with said corporate defendant's business. All defendants, excepting Rauer, joined in an answer denying certain allegations of the complaint and interposing two special defenses. The defendant Rauer answered separately, and, besides denying material allegations of the complaint, added a cross-complaint asking that plaintiffs be restrained from using the name "Rauer" in connection with plaintiffs' business. The trial court found generally in favor of the defendants, and gave judgment denying the relief prayed for in plaintiffs' complaint, and enjoining plaintiffs from using the name of Rauer in connection with their business. Plaintiffs have appealed. The evidence in the case is not before us, the appeal having been taken upon the judgment roll alone; therefore the main question presented is whether the findings are legally sufficient to support the judgment.

The findings establish the following facts: For 25 years preceding 1913 defendant J. J. Rauer was engaged in the business of collecting debts in San Francisco, and during the latter portion of that time operated said business under the corporate name, Rauer's Law & Collection Company, a corporation organized by Rauer with himself as the owner of the entire capital stock. In 1913 Rauer sold his stock to his nephew, R. J. Graf, who continued the business under the said corporate name until his death in October, 1917. Subsequently the ownership of the stock passed through W. L. Claiborne to William and S. C. Tomsky. After the death of Graf, the business of said corporation did not prosper. William Tomsky died, but said corporation continued to function under the direction of Samuel C. Tomsky until March, 1921, when it was abandoned, and its powers were suspended for nonpayment of taxes. Its corporate existence was never thereafter revived. After the death of William Tomsky, and before the abandonment and suspension of said corporation, plaintiffs, Tomsky and Cole, desiring to avail themselves of the benefits of the Rauer name, formed a partnership under the fictitious name of "Rauer Collection Company," and on March 18, 1919, duly filed a certificate of partnership to that effect. Thereafter, and until the time of the abandonment of said corporation, the affairs of said partnership and said corporation were transacted in the same office.

The findings further show that prior to the abandonment of said corporation the said S. C. Tomsky collected, in some instances, and in others renewed, various judgments standing in favor of said corporation by assigning the same to himself and to said copartnership, and bringing suits in his own name; that said corporation during the latter part of its existence, failed to remit its collections, and had many judgments rendered against it; "that the plaintiffs above named told people on occasions that they had no connection with said defunct corporation, but at the same time said plaintiffs continued to collect old judgments obtained in the name of Rauer's Law & Collection Company." The court further found that neither at the time of the formation of said partnership nor at any other time, was there any one named Rauer interested in or associated with said partnership; nor did defendant Rauer ever give to either of said plaintiffs or to any one else permission to use that name in connection with a collection agency; nor was there any person by the name of Rauer, in said city of San Francisco, who had been engaged in or connected with the law and collection business other than the defendant Rauer; and that the fictitious name, "Rauer Collection Company," has been used by plaintiffs, at all times, for the purpose of deceiving the public. The present corporation, Rauer's Law & Collection Company, Inc., was organized by the defendants Rauer, Clark, and Smith on May 10, 1922, and has since been actively engaged in the collection business. Defendant Clark is the president and general manager thereof, and defendant Rauer is the secretary treasurer, and owns a substantial interest therein. The court further found that on account of Rauer's ability as a collector prior to 1919 he enjoyed public confidence, and built up a large and lucrative business, that because of certain loose and unbusinesslike methods employed by plaintiffs in the operation of their copartnership business, in relation to the matter of accounting to clients for collections, said copartnership has not been held in good repute, and that "aspersions have been cast upon his [Rauer's] name," which has subjected him to humiliation and embarrassment. It was further found that the development of plaintiffs' business has been due to the deception of the public in the use of the name "Rauer," and that the use of said name by plaintiffs is unfair to Rauer. In reference to the new corporation, the court found that, in organizing the same, and in conducting the business thereunder, said defendants have not deluded or deceived the public as to the identity of said corporation nor as to the persons connected therewith, and that any confusion which may have arisen by the adoption of said corporate name has not been due to unfair practices on the part of defendants. Additional findings were made by the trial court, but the above constitute the principal findings, and will suffice for all purposes, we think, in considering the legal problems presented by the appeal.

[1] Appellants contend that they are entitled to relief against respondents upon the ground of unfair competition. They make no claim of ownership to the use of said name through privity of interest with Rauer, nor as a result of their previous relationship with this defunct corporation; their contention being based solely upon the proposition that there is no inhibition in this state against the adoption of the family name of another in connection with a business enterprise, and that, as copartners, having adopted the name "Rauer Collection Company," and having duly filed a certificate of copartnership to this effect, they were first in the field doing business under such name and that therefore equity will, in the interest of fair, commercial dealing, protect them in the use of said name. In order to prove a complete case of unfair competition against respondents, however, it was necessary for appellants to establish, as alleged in their complaint, two essential elements: First, "that by care, attention, skill, and strict adherence to business" they had built up an "extensive, valuable, and profitable" business; and, secondly, that respondents, by the fraudulent use of said corporate name and by unfair and fraudulent practices, were deceiving and misleading the public, and were thereby seeking to deprive appellants of their customers and trade. Yellow Cab Co. v. Sachs, 191 Cal. 238, 216 P. 33, 28 A. L. R. 105. Appellants did not prove either of those issues. In reference to the first one the trial court found that the firm name of Rauer Collection Company was being used by appellants—

"so as to deceive the public, that they have no right to the name of Rauer, and that their business, whatever the same may be, has been built upon the deceptive and fictitious use of the name of Rauer, and their strength in business is in the use of said defendant's name and not in the use of any one of their own names."

And upon the second issue, after finding adversely upon certain alleged specific acts of unfair and fraudulent practices, the court concluded with the finding:

"That nothing has been done by defendants or any of them, tending to deceive the public or to divert to defendants, or any of them, business intended for plaintiffs' firm. * * *"

[2, 3] The mere fact that appellants filed a certificate of copartnership to operate a business under the family name of another gave them no perpetual right to the use of such name to the exclusion of the real owner thereof, so as to deprive him from ever afterwards engaging in the same kind of business in his own name or through the medium of a corporation bearing his name. And it would have made no difference, even if there had been some one connected with appellants' firm by the name of Rauer. Morton v. Morton, 148 Cal. 142, 82 P. 664, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 660. The right to do business under one's own name is one of the sacred rights known to the law; and a family name is incapable of exclusive appropriation, and cannot be thus monopolized. Nims on Unfair Competition and Trade Marks (2d Ed.) § 67.

[4, 5] Every man has the absolute right to use his own name in his own business, even though he may interfere with and injure the business of another bearing the same name, provided he does not resort to any artifice or do any act calculated to mislead the public as to the identity of the establishments or to produce injury to the other beyond that which results from the similarity of names. Meneely v. Meneely, 62 N. Y. 427, 20 Am. Rep. 489; Howe Scale Co. v. Wyckoff, Seamans, etc., 198 U. S. 118, 25 S. Ct. 609, 49 L. Ed. 972; Hilton v. Hilton, 89 N. J. Eq. 182, 104 A. 375, L. R. A. 1918F, 1174; Rogers & Rogers Bros. v. Rogers, 53 Conn. 156, 1 A. 807, 5 A. 675, 55 Am. Rep. 78; McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 252, 24 L. Ed. 828; Marshall v. Pinkham, 52 Wis. 585, 9 N. W. 615, 38 Am. Rep. 756. As just stated, equity will not allow a person to resort to artifice or contrivance in the use of his name as a result of which the public is deceived as to his business or products. But in such case it is not the use of a man's own name that is condemned; it is the dishonesty practiced in the use of it. Morton v. Morton, supra; Weinstock v. Marks, 109 Cal. 529, 42 P. 142, 30 L. R. A. 182, 50 Am. St. Rep. 57; Dodge Stationery Co. v. Dodge, 145 Cal. 380, 78 P. 879; Howe Scale Co. v. Wyckoff, supra; Burns v. Wm. J. Burns Det. Agency, 235 Mass. 553, 127 N. E. 334; Thompson L. Co. v. Thompson Yds., 144 Minn. 298, 175 N. W. 550. Where it appears, however, as it does here, that the party sought to be enjoined has a right to use his own name, and he does so reasonably and honestly, he is not obliged to abandon the use thereof or to unreasonably restrict it, whether used in a firm or corporation, merely because some confusion may have arisen from similarity of names. Howe Scale Co. v. Wyckoff, supra. Appellants' complaint against respondents is far less meritorious than any of those considered in the cases above cited, for the reason that here there never has been any person connected with appellants' firm who bore the name they are seeking to monopolize.

We do not find any of the cases cited by appellants upon the question of unfair competition in point, for the reason that they either do not involve family names, or else do involve facts showing privity of interest between the parties, or fraudulent and dishonest practices committed by the party sought to be enjoined. As already pointed out, neither of those latter elements is present in the instant case.

[6] We are also of the opinion that the findings are sufficient to sustain the judgment rendered upon the cross-complaint. Without repeating the specific findings bearing upon this branch of the case, it may be said generally that they show that appellants adopted Rauer's name as a part of their firm name without his consent, seeking to take advantage of his former business reputation as a collector, and thereby leading the public to believe that he was personally connected with their firm, that Rauer is now lawfully engaged in the same character of business, and that the operation of appellants' business under said fictitious name is not only deceiving the public as to the identity of the business, but the manner in which appellants have operated it has been injurious to Rauer's business and reputation. Under such circumstances we believe the case has been brought clearly within the rule of the following cases: Edison v. Edison Polyform & Mfg. Co., 73 N. J. Eq. 136, 67 A. 392; Edison v. Continental Chemical Co. (D. C.) 220 F. 398; C. H. Batchelder & Co., Inc., v. Batchelder, 220 Mass. 42, 107 N. E. 455; Scheer v. American Ice Co., 32 Misc. Rep. 351, 66 N. Y. S. 3; Sage Foundation Home Co. v. Sage-Forest Hill Associates, 119 Misc. Rep. 669, 197 N. Y. S. 877. Under the conditions above stated, appellants' business, if allowed to continue under its present name, would be unfair, in the legal sense, both to the respondents and to the public, and may therefore be enjoined. Sage Foundation Home Co. v. Sage Forest Hill Associates, supra; Fisher v. Star Co., 231 N. Y. 414, 132 N. E. 133, 19 A. L. R. 937; Material Men's Ass'n v. New York Material Men's Mercantile Ass'n, Inc., 169 App. Div. 843, 155 N. Y. S. 706. The form of action was one in which it was proper to file a cross-complaint. Code Civ. Proc. § 442; Fite v. Dorman (Tenn.) 57 S. W. 129; Batchelder & Co. v. Batchelder, supra.

[7, 8] The contention made by appellants that respondent Rauer is estopped from seeking affirmative relief by reason of his laches is disposed of by the findings "that, after plaintiffs became partners, as aforesaid, said Raer occasionally visited the office in which plaintiffs' business and the business of said corporation, Rauer's Law & Collection Company, was carried on together, but the attention of said Rauer was not called to the fact that plaintiffs were doing business under said fictitious partnership name of Rauer Collection Company, nor did he know of the adoption of said name at the time of the filing of the certificate thereof with the county clerk, nor until after some lapse of time, when said Rauer learned of the bringing of suits under the name of "Rauer Collection Company," and that "the defendant has acted with reasonable diligence in the premises, and is not guilty of laches."

We find nothing inconsistent in the findings; they are supported by the pleadings, and in our opinion sustain the judgment.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

RYSTROM v. SUTTER BUTTE CANAL CO.*
(Civ. 2874.)

1. Trial ⟸260(5) — Refusal of instruction covered by instructions given not error.

In action to recover damages for loss of crops due to failure to furnish water for irrigation, refusal of instruction, substance of which was covered by instructions given, did not constitute error.

2. Damages ⟸112—Measure of damages for loss of crops due to failure to furnish water for irrigation stated.

Measure of damages for loss of crops from failure to furnish water for irrigation is market value of probable yield of land if water had been furnished as agreed, less reasonable cost of production, and marketing crop, and net market value of crop actually produced.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1170(9)—Error in instructing jury, not prejudicial to complaining party, held not cause for reversal.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting setting aside judgment or granting new trial for misdirection of jury, unless error complained of resulted in miscarriage of justice, where, in action for loss of crops from failure to furnish water for irrigation, jury did not follow erroneous rule of damages laid down by court, and returned verdict less in amount than it might have found if it had followed rule setting forth true measure of damages, defendant cannot secure reversal of judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Henry R. Rystrom against the Sutter Butte Canal Company for damages for loss of crops. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Ingram, of Gridley, and W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. Action by plaintiff to recover damages for loss of crops due to the alleged failure of defendant to furnish water for irrigation purposes during the years 1921 and 1922. Plaintiff had judgment, and, the defendant's motion for a new trial being denied, the defendant appeals from the order and judgment entered in said action. It appears from the transcript that the defendant was under contract to furnish the plaintiff for irrigation purposes during the years mentioned 1.33 cubic feet per second of water for the use of plaintiff in the growing of rice. The plaintiff alleges that the defendant failed to furnish the water as contracted, and that by reason of such failure the plaintiff's crops of rice did not fill and mature as they would have had the quantity of water called for in the contract been furnished by the defendant to the plaintiff during the period of time when the rice on the plaintiff's lands was being cultivated and grown; that as a result of the defendant's failure to furnish water, the plaintiff suffered damages in the total sum of $3,329.58. The cause was tried before a jury, and a verdict returned in the sum of $2,500. This sum was thereafter reduced by the court by striking therefrom the sum of $500 to cover 17 acres of the rice lands belonging to the plaintiff not harvested on account of rains, and, consequently, any losses suffered thereby could not be attributed to the defendant.

There is no real question presented as to the sufficiency of the testimony to sustain the verdict for the plaintiff. The argument addressed to us upon this point is based upon the alleged ground that the court misdirected the jury, as to the proper method for calculating or estimating damages, and that because of such misdirection a new trial should be ordered. One of the questions presented is rather unusual in this, that the instruction, as given by the court, tended to restrict rather than enlarge the amount of damages which the jury would be authorized to award the plaintiff in the event that the jury found that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict.

[1] The first assignment of error is that the court failed to give the following instruction:

"I instruct you that under the contract between plaintiff and defendant the latter was not required in the year 1921 or in the year 1922 to furnish to plaintiff all the water which he might desire to receive or use; it was only required to furnish to him through its gate in its canal on his lands water to the amount of 1.33 cubic feet per second; and, if it did furnish that amount at said place for either of said years, your verdict must be in favor of defendant for said year; and if defendant did furnish water at said place for both of said years, 1921 and 1922, your verdict must be in favor of defendant for both of said years."

The reason assigned for the refusal of the court to give this instruction was that the substance of the instruction was given elsewhere. It is insisted that such is not the case. In this insistence the appellant must have overlooked two instructions given at the request of the defendant. They are Nos. 3 and 4. No. 3 reads:

"I instruct you that under the contract existing between plaintiff and the defendant, Sutter Butte Canal Company, plaintiff (defendant), was required in the year 1921, and also in the year 1922, to furnish water to plaintiff through a gate at its canal in the amount of only 1.33 cubic feet per second flow, and, if defendant did so furnish said water during each and both of said years, plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict must be in favor of defendant."

*Republished with rehearing opinion 249 P. 53.

No. 4 reads:

"Under the contract between plaintiff and defendant, the latter was not required to furnish water during the irrigating season, even at the rate of 1.33 cubic feet per second continuous flow, unless such continuous flow in such amount would be reasonably necessary to plaintiff for the growing of the rice crop on his land."

[2] The defendant requested no instruction upon the measure of damages. The court, however, at the request of the plaintiff, gave the following:

"You are instructed that, in determining the amount of damage in this case, if you find from a preponderance of the evidence that any damage has been caused to the crop growing upon the land of the plaintiff in 1921 and 1922, or in either of said years, by reason of the failure of the defendant to supply water as agreed under the terms of the contract entered into between the parties in this case, if you find from the evidence that it failed to deliver water as agreed in either or both of said years, you are first to determine from the evidence the market value of the probable yield of rice from the land in each year if the water had been furnished as agreed, and you should then deduct therefrom the reasonable cost of producing and marketing such crop; together with the reasonable market value of the crop actually produced."

It is earnestly insisted by the appellant that this instruction is not a full and correct statement of the law for ascertaining damages when applied to the instant case. With this contention we agree. The latter portion of the instruction should have read:

And you should then deduct therefrom the reasonable cost of producing and marketing such crop, and also deduct therefrom the net market value of the crop actually produced.

As the instruction was given the jury was authorized to deduct from the reasonable market value of the crop that should have been produced the cost of producing and marketing the same, and also the total income received from the crop that was actually produced. It is evident that if the rule announced by the court were strictly followed the jury would twice deduct from the damages allowed, the cost of production. It is apparent that the court and counsel, in the preparation and giving of the instruction under consideration, endeavored to follow the rule laid down in the case of Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co., 151 Cal. 209, 90 P. 942, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 267, 12 Ann. Cas. 779, where it is held that the measure of damages for the total destruction of a growing crop is the value of the crop in the condition it was at the time and place of destruction, less the cost of production, marketing, etc., and that, to determine the same, evidence is admissible of the probable yield and market value, and that when the probable yield and market value are ascertained, the cost of production being deducted therefrom, the remainder would indicate the damages to be awarded by the jury. In applying this rule the court erred, after instructing the jury to deduct the cost of production of the whole crop, to again deduct the total value of the crop actually produced. In doing so, it lost sight of the fact that the value of the crop produced was not the net value, but out of the returns of the crop produced the plaintiff was entitled to pay the costs thereof. To show that this is the true rule, we will take the figures as presented by the appellant for the first year, which also show that the giving of the instruction, as worded by the court, was in favor of the defendant, and, therefore, there is no just ground for complaint. In inserting the calculations about to be set forth, we have accepted the figures presented by the appellant. The result differs only because the appellant has not, to our minds, exhibited complete accuracy as a mathematician.

The total area of the rice crop involved included 71 acres. The testimony, which we are accepting, shows for the year 1921 a yield of 35 sacks per acre, or a total yield of 2,485 sacks. The accepted value of this rice for that year, by both parties is the sum of $2.75 per sack, which gives the total value of the rice that would have been produced for the year 1921 of $6,833.75. The testimony set forth by the appellant in its calculations fixes the cost of production at $35 per acre, which gives a total cost for the year 1921 of $2,485. This sum, deducted from what should have been the value of the total yield, leaves $4,348.75 as the net value of the crop that should have been harvested by the plaintiff during the year 1921, had sufficient water been furnished by the defendant to permit of the rice field yielding a full crop. During the year 1921 the plaintiff actually harvested 1,795 sacks of rice and marketed the same at the above price of $2.75 per sack, receiving the total sum of $4,936.25, out of which, however, he had to pay the total cost of production, which, we have seen, amounted to the sum of $2,485, leaving a net profit of $2,451.25. This sum, deducted from the $4,348.75 which should have been his net profit, leaves $1,897.50 as the net loss for the year 1921. A like process of reasoning and figuring shows the loss on the 54 acres for the year 1922 at about the sum of $1,100. For the year 1922, however, different figures are accepted, as presented by the appellant, as follows: Cost of production per acre $35, yield per acre 25 sacks, market value per sack $2.10. It thus appears that, had the rule been correctly stated as to the deductions to be made by the jury, the testimony presented by the appellant's own figures would have justified a verdict against the defendant in the sum of about $3,000, assuming, as we must, from the verdict of the jury that the shortage of the crop was due to defendant's failure to furnish water according to its contract.

[3] Notwithstanding this situation, the defendant strongly insists that, even though the jury did not follow the erroneous rule laid down by the court, and arrived at a verdict less in amount than it might have found, under the testimony had it followed the rule setting forth the true measure of damages a new trial should be granted, irrespective of the fact that the erroneous instruction was favorable to the defendant. That this was once declared to be the law appears in one or two of the earlier California cases but the decisions so declaring have long since been discredited. A number of cases might be cited, but the following quotation from Tousley v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 457, 137 P. 31, is sufficient to show the rule now followed, and the one which should be followed in all such cases:

"It is claimed that the verdict and special verdict are against the law simply because they are in violation of two certain instructions given to the jury on the question of contributory negligence. It is manifest from a reading of these instructions that they could in no degree have prejudiced defendant's cause. An objection of this character assumes that an instruction relied on is not correct as matter of law, but that under it the party objecting was nevertheless entitled to a verdict, and that for the failure of the the jury to observe it, he is entitled to a reversal. This was the rule declared by this court in Emerson v. County of Santa Clara, 40 Cal. 543, and one or two subsequent cases. This rule has been entirely discredited and overruled in later cases. The rule now is 'that while the jury should conform to the instructions of the court upon matters of law, if it appears to the appellate tribunal that an instruction was erroneous, it will not disregard a verdict contrary to such erroneous instruction.' See O'Neill v. Thomas Day Co., 152 Cal. 357, 14 Ann. Cas. 970, 92 P. 856. 'The fact that the court erroneously instructed the jury to the contrary does not make the verdict against law.' O'Neill v. Law Union, etc., Co., 166 Cal. 318, 135 P. 1124." Irrespective of the decisions of the Supreme Court just referred to, we think that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution applies to this case, in that it directs that:

"No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, on the ground of misdirection of the jury, * * * unless, after an examination of the entire cause [etc.], the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

It is apparent from what we have said that the error complained of in this case did not and could not have produced a miscarriage of justice.

It is hereby ordered that the judgment of the trial court be and the same is hereby affirmed, and that the respondent recover his costs on appeal herein.

3. Gifts ⟸18(2)—Unless donor intends to divest himself completely of control over property, gift is ineffectual.

Unless donor intends to divest himself completely of control and dominion over property, gift is incomplete and ineffectual.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1009(3)—Intention of husband in delivering life insurance policy to wife held question of fact for trial court.

In deciding conflicting claims to proceeds of life insurance policy, on conflicting evidence as to intention of insured in giving policy to wife, what such intention was is question of fact to be decided by trial court upon all evidence in case.

5. Appeal and error ⟸1009(1)—Conclusion of trial court that insured reserved right to change beneficiary of life policy after alleged delivery as gift held controlling on appeal.

In interpleader, where conflicting claims to proceeds of life policy were in issue, and policy provided that insured could change beneficiary until designation of any person as absolute beneficiary, or assignment of policy, in absence of designation of absolute beneficiary, assuming alleged gift of policy by insured to wife to be true, conclusion of trial court that insured did not intend delivery of policy as absolute gift, but that he reserved right to afterward change beneficiary, was controlling on appeal.

6. Husband and wife ⟸265—Delivery of duplicate life policy after change of beneficiary while insured was indebted to donee held to constitute transfer of proceeds of policy.

Although wife of insured paid premiums on life policy for 5 years from community funds, under law as it then stood, giving husband power to make valid transfer of community property for valuable consideration without written consent of wife, where he while indebted to his sister for advances of money had duplicate policy issued, after substitution of name of sister as beneficiary, and such policy was delivered to her, there was an effectual transfer of proceeds of policy to her.

7. Insurance ⟸587—Evidence held sufficient to support finding of assignment of policy.

In interpleader in which issue was conflicting, claims of insured's wife and his sister to proceeds of life insurance policy, evidence that insured, for advances of money by his sister, had duplicate policy issued, in which her name was substituted as beneficiary, and that it was delivered to her, was sufficient to support finding of assignment of policy to her, transfer in writing not being essential under Civ. Code, § 1052.

8. Insurance ⟸587—Change of beneficiary held not invalid for failure to surrender original policy.

Where insured's wife had possession of insurance policy, change of beneficiary by issuing duplicate policy in which his sister was substituted as beneficiary was not invalid for failure to surrender original policy as required by its provisions, in view of impossibility of surrendering it.

9. Insurance ⊂=587—Payment of premiums on policy by wife, beneficiary of policy on life of husband, held not to prevent change of beneficiary.

Fact that wife, beneficiary of policy of insurance on life of husband, paid some of premiums did not prevent his substituting sister, who had lent assured money, as beneficiary, in view of provision in policy reserving to assured right to change beneficiary, and of absence of satisfactory evidence of contract inuring to benefit of assured and wife.

10. Husband and wife ⊂=265—That policy of life insurance on husband's life is community asset held not to prevent change of beneficiary for valuable consideration.

Although, where premiums on insurance policy on life of husband after coverture are paid entirely from community funds, policy is community asset, and in view of Civ. Code, § 172, husband cannot make valid gift thereof without written consent of wife, and where he names third party as beneficiary, transaction as to wife's share is subject to her right of revocation, such principle does not apply where designation of third person as beneficiary was made by assured for valuable consideration.

11. Husband and wife ⊂=265—Two loans of $1,000, with other transactions, held sufficient to support implied finding of valuable consideration for substitution of sister for wife of insured as beneficiary of life insurance policy.

Two loans of $1,000, together with other transactions and relations existing between insured and his sister, were sufficient as valuable consideration to satisfy requirements of Civ. Code, § 172, prohibiting husband making gift of community property without written consent of wife, in his substituting name of sister for that of wife as beneficiary in policy of life insurance, although part of premiums were paid out of community property.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Interpleader by the Union Mutual Life Insurance Company against Adelaide J. Broderick and Anita C. Broderick, to determine title to money due under a policy of life insurance. From a judgment for defendant Anita C. Broderick, defendant Adelaide J. Broderick appeals. Affirmed.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. J. Lerman and G. K. Burgren, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. The appeal in this case was taken in the first instance to the District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. Inasmuch as it was a case in equity, that court, not being vested with appellate jurisdiction in such cases, ordered it transferred to this court for hearing and decision. On the same day an order was made by this court, under the provisions of section 4, article 6, of the Constitution, and section 52a, subdivision 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure, transferring said cause to the District Court of Appeal for hearing and decision. It is now here for decision after an order made granting a petition for hearing. Two points were earnestly urged by petitioner which seemed to us to require the consideration of this court. The first was whether the plaintiff was entitled to have certain issues framed by the pleadings submitted to a jury as a matter of right, and the second point was whether the appellant had established such a vested right in the policy of insurance which forms the basis of the action as to have taken away the right of the husband to change the original beneficiary named in said policy of insurance. Upon further examination into those questions, however, we are satisfied with the soundness of the reasoning of the District Court of Appeal; and with its conclusion in disposing of them, as well as all other questions raised by the petition. We therefore adopt the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, written by Mr. Justice Knight, as a full and fair disquisition of the questions raised by the appeal. We will later advert, by way of emphasis, briefly to the two questions specifically referred to. The opinion follows:

"The defendant Adelaide J. Broderick appeals from a judgment entered against her in a suit in interpleader brought by the Union Mutual Life Insurance Company to determine title to money due under a policy of life insurance. Adelaide J. Broderick is the widow, and Anita C. Broderick is the sister of the insured, and are rival claimants for said money. The following facts are not disputed:

"On October 27, 1908, the plaintiff issued its policy of life insurance to Herbert D. Broderick in the principal sum of $1,500, payable to him on October 27, 1928, if living, or in the event of his death before that time, to his wife, Adelaide J. Broderick, or to such other beneficiary as may be designated by the insured. During the month of November, 1913, Broderick filed with said company a sworn certificate, dated September 15, 1913, to the effect that said policy had been misplaced and after diligent search could not be found. A duplicate policy was thereupon issued, dated November 19, 1913, and on the same date, upon written request of Broderick, dated May 13, 1913, said company changed the name of the beneficiary, so that Broderick's sister, Anita, became the beneficiary, and said duplicate policy was indorsed to that effect under date of November 19, 1913. Said duplicate policy was afterwards delivered by said company to said Anita C. Broderick, and she retained possession of the same until the death of the insured. She also paid the premium on said policy for the year 1913, amounting to $74.36. Thereafter no premiums were paid by any one, but under the terms of said policy the contract of insurance continued in force until the death of the insured, which occurred on October 20, 1920. After Broderick's death his widow produced the original policy, and made demand for the money due thereunder. Said company then filed this suit in interpleader, and in accordance with the terms of an interlocutory decree entered in that behalf paid the sum of $1,532.82, due under its contract of insurance, into court, and the rival claimants were directed to litigate their claims thereto.

"The claims of the parties are set forth in their cross-complaints and answers. Adelaide J. Broderick, the widow, besides denying that the insured had requested a change of beneficiaries, alleged that she had been dependent upon her husband for support; that the latter 'never had any insurable interest in the life' of said insured, and was not dependent upon him for support, and that said insured had never 'been under any legal obligations to her for the payment of money or respecting property or services of which his death or illness might delay or prevent performance'; that said policy had never been mislaid, lost or destroyed, assigned or hypothecated; that said insured had never requested a change of beneficiary; that no indorsement to that effect had ever been made; that no beneficiary was named therein other than herself. Said Adelaide J. Broderick further alleged 'that said Herbert D. Broderick prior to November 1, 1913, delivered said policy to her * * * as a gift, and she ever since has been and now is the owner and in the possession of said policy,' and that as the owner of said policy and as the beneficiary named therein she was and is entitled to said insurance.

"The cross-complaint filed by Anita C. Broderick consisted chiefly of allegations of the undisputed facts hereinbefore stated relating to the issuance of the duplicate policy on November 19, 1913, the request by the insured for the change in the name of the beneficiary, the indorsement of such change upon the policy, and the delivery of said policy to her. She also pleaded her own right to said insurance money, and negatived the asserted right of Adelaide J. Broderick. Answering the cross-complaint of her adversary, the said Anita C. Broderick denied the material allegations thereof, including the allegation therein made to the effect that the said Adelaide J. Broderick was dependent upon said insured for support; she also denied the allegation that she, the said Anita C. Broderick, had no insurable interest in the life of said deceased.

"Appellant requested a jury trial, which was refused upon the ground that said proceeding was an equitable one. The cause was thereupon tried by the court, and findings were made in favor of respondent upon all contested issues. The judgment was that said appellant, Adelaide J. Broderick, had no interest in said insurance money and that respondent, Anita C. Broderick, as the beneficiary named in said contract of insurance, was entitled to the full amount due thereunder.

[1] "The first point made by appellant on appeal is that the trial court erred in denying a trial by jury. It has been held in this state, however, that a suit in interpleader, such as this one, and involving like issues, is an equitable proceeding, in which the rights of the parties as between themselves are governed by principles of equity (Jory v. Supreme Council, 105 Cal. 20, 38 P. 524, 26 L. R. A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17; Adams v. Grand Lodge, 105 Cal. 321, 38 P. 914, 45 Am. St. Rep. 45), and there are numerous authorities from other jurisdictions holding directly that in such cases the right to a trial by jury does not exist (Clark v. Mosher, 107 N. Y. 118, 14 N. E. 96, 1 Am. St. Rep. 798; Grand Lodge v. Elsner, 26 Mo. App. 108; Bush v. Kansas City L. Ins. Co. [Mo. Sup.] 214 S. W. 175; Missoula Trust & Sav. Bank v. Murphy, 50 Mont. 355, 146 P. 941; Robertson v. Ridenour-Baker Co., 100 Kan. 133, 163 P. 655; St. Nicholas Church v. Kropp, 135 Minn. 115, 160 N. W. 500, L. R. A. 1917D, 741). Therefore there was no error committed in denying a jury.

[2] "Appellant contends next that the evidence without conflict proves that prior to the attempted change of beneficiaries the insured made a gift of the policy to her. This contention is based upon the testimony given by appellant to the effect that in 1908, the year following her marriage, Broderick handed said policy to her and said: 'Here is a little present for you;' that she took the policy, afterwards placed it in a safe deposit box to which she and her husband had joint access, and that she continued thereafter to retain possession of said policy. Her testimony, however, was not the only evidence in the case upon this point. The record discloses that respondent offered proof of Broderick's declarations, and also circumstances bearing upon his conduct in subsequently dealing with said policy, which were inconsistent with the theory of a previous gift, and tended to show that no such gift was made or intended to be made. It would therefore seem that a conflict of evidence is presented on that point, and therefore the finding of the trial court is controlling.

[3-5] Furthermore, in determining the question of the validity of a gift, the matter of the intent with which the delivery is made is always an important and essential element to be considered. Unless the donor intends to divest himself completely of control and dominion over the property given, the gift is incomplete and ineffectual. What that intention was is a question of fact to be decided by the trial court, upon all of the evidence in the case. Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 527, 98 P. 269. The policy of insurance here provided that the insured had the right to change the beneficiary from time to time, but 'that in case the insured shall at any time designate any person as absolute beneficiary hereof or assigns this policy, said right to change the beneficiary shall thereupon cease. * * *' Appellant was not designated as 'absolute beneficiary.' Assuming, therefore, that her testimony concerning the alleged gift be taken as true, there was still the question of fact for the trial court to determine as to whether Broderick intended the delivery of the policy as an absolute gift, or whether he reserved, as stated in the policy, the right to afterwards change the beneficiary. The conclusion of the trial court upon that point is also controlling.

[6] "It was also found that there had been an assignment of the duplicate policy by the decedent to his sister Anita. Appellant attacks that finding upon two grounds: First, that the proceeds of said policy constituted community property, and that therefore decedent did not have legal authority to assign said policy, without appellant's consent; and secondly, that the evidence is insufficient in any event to establish an assignment. The fact that appellant paid the premiums on said policy each year from 1908 to 1912, inclusive, presumably from community funds, apparently sustains appellant's contention that she had a community interest in said policy. New York Life Ins. Co. v. Bank of Italy, 60 Cal. App. 602, 214 P. 61. But the law of this state as it stood at the time this transaction occurred gave the husband power to make a valid transfer of the community property for a valuable consideration, without the written consent of the wife. We are of the opinion that the evidence here is sufficient to justify the conclusion that the transfer and assignment of the policy in question were made to respondent in consideration of money previously borrowed by the decedent from her, and which remained unpaid at the time the transfer and assignment of said policy was made. The evidence in this regard shows that Broderick was a marine engineer and spent much of his time upon the seas. His sister, the respondent, was engaged in business in San Francisco, but lived in Berkeley with her mother, whom she supported. After Broderick's marriage, his wife, with his consent and co-operation, engaged in the apartment or rooming house business in San Francisco. They were financially assisted in these enterprises by respondent. The latter testified that when the change of the beneficiary took place in 1913, her brother was 'then' indebted to her in the sum of 1,000, which he paid, and that afterwards he borrowed another $1,000, which he did not repay; that when he died he was still indebted to her in the sum of $1,000. In the early part of the year in which the name of the beneficiary was changed, and prior thereto, Broderick was stricken with illness, taken to a hospital, and operated upon. During the month of May of the same year and before he had entirely recovered from the effects of the operation, he left the hospital and went first to his wife's apartment in San Francisco for a day or two and then to his sister's home in Berkeley. About that time he and his wife had a disagreement. When he went to his sister's home in Berkeley he was sick, despondent, and penniless, being required to borrow sufficient money from his sister to pay his car fare from San Francisco to Berkeley. Later in 1915, Broderick, in explaining to his brother why he was obliged to borrow money from his sister at all, said that he had kept his money in a safe deposit box in a bank, and that 'when he left Adelaide he went to the safe deposit box, and it was cleaned out; that even his insurance policy was missing.' On the evening of the day he arrived at his sister's home he told his sister that he intended to go away, and he did not know when, if ever, he would return; that he wanted to make over his life insurance to her. He remained at his sister's home until May 26, 1913, when he accepted a position aboard ship and sailed for Seattle, thence to the Atlantic coast, and he did not return to California until the following January.

"After his departure for Seattle, respondent received from said insurance company the necessary papers for her brother to sign in order to consummate the transfer of the policy to her, and she forwarded these papers to her brother at Seattle. Later she received from the home office of said insurance company said duplicate policy, duly issued with the change of beneficiary regularly indorsed thereon, and upon the return of her brother to California the following January she informed him of that fact. While, as appellant claims, there is no direct evidence that the transfer of said policy was made to respondent in consideration of said unpaid loan, nevertheless it is manifest from the circumstances narrated that such was the fact. We think the argument made by appellant to the effect 'that the transfer to respondent was made as a gift or voluntary disposition for the benefit of the mother of the insured' is unsound, for the reason that if such were his purpose, there was apparently no reason why he could not have made the transfer to his mother. The statements made by the decedent at the time he declared his intention of transferring said policy to his sister can be readily accounted for upon the theory that he realized that it was an injustice for his sister to be charged with the entire support of his mother, and that he was morally obligated to square his financial indebtedness with his sister as far as his ability would allow, in order that her burden in the matter of the support of his mother might be lessened to that extent.

[7] "The evidence is also sufficient to support the finding of an assignment of said policy to respondent. Appellant concedes that, under the circumstances, a transfer in writing was not essential. Civ. Code, § 1052. When the name of the beneficiary was changed and the policy was delivered to respondent, the relationship of the assignor and assignee was that of debtor and creditor; a delivery of the policy, under such circumstances, constituted an effectual transfer of the proceeds of the policy. Nixon v. Malone (Tex. Civ. App.) 95 S. W. 577.

[8] "The final contention of appellant is that the change of beneficiary was invalid because the original policy was not surrendered as required by the provisions of said policy. The contention is answered by the decision in Jory v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. supra, wherein it is held that where the surrender of a certificate is made impossible by the refusal of the beneficiary to surrender it, equity will treat the surrender as duly made, and in legal effect the certificate is deemed as lost."

In order to accentuate the principles of law announced by the District Court of Appeal, we feel justified in making reference to a few of the decisions of this state, and quoting briefly from the text of some of the cases which appear to be conclusive on the main questions pressed in the petition for a hearing. We are quite well satisfied, however, that the appellant was not entitled to a jury trial. In Adams v. Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W., 105 Cal. 325, 38 P. 915, 45 Am. St. Rep. 45, this court stated in passing upon a similar question:

"But the conditions facing us are simply these: two litigants, standing upon a common level, submit to a court of equity their respective claims of ownership to a special fund of money, and ask that court to do justice, in the light, and under the guidance, of those equitable principles which form the glory of that forum."

(Italics ours.) Jory v. Supreme Council, 105 Cal. 20, 38 P. 524, 26 L. R. A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17.

"An intervention merely adds new parties for the purpose of determining all conflicting claims to the matter in controversy and does not affect the nature of the action, so that the plaintiff in an action at law is not deprived of his right to a jury trial by an intervention praying for equitable relief; while on the other hand, * * * a bill in the nature of a bill of interpleader the proceedings are purely equitable and neither party is entitled to a jury as a matter of right; and an action at law becomes by interpleader proceedings an equitable action in which neither party can demand a jury trial." 24 Cyc. 114.

See, also, 33 C. J. 463, § 54.

[9] The policy of insurance in this case reserved to the assured the right to change the beneficiary. The rule in such cases is well stated in New York Life Ins. Co. v. Bank of Italy, 60 Cal. App. 602, 214 P. 61, wherein it is said:

"It is true that under a policy reserving to the assured the right to change the beneficiary the interest of the designated person prior to the death of the insured is a mere expectancy in an inchoate or incompleted gift, which is subject to revocation at the will of the insured, and that the power of revocation which would defeat it might be exercised up to the moment of his death. When, therefore, the deceased substituted the different enumerated persons in the place of his estate as beneficiaries he initiated a gift which, in the case of appellant, became complete by the death of the insured without revocation. And this is so notwithstanding that the premiums were paid from community funds. McEwen v. New York Life Ins. Co., 23 Cal. App. 694, 139 P. 242; Shoudy v. Shoudy, 55 Cal. App. 447, 203 P. 437."

In the instant case, it evidently appeared to the trial court that there was no satisfactory evidence of a contract inuring to the benefit of the assured and the appellant, but there is evidence of an obligation owed by the assured to the respondent. "In the absence of a contract of some character inuring to the benefit of a beneficiary, the mere fact of payment of assessments by such a one is not sufficient to create equities in his favor, for the courts of the land say such payments [of assessments] are to be treated as gifts." Jory v. Supreme Council, supra.

[10] It is no doubt the settled law of this state that where the premiums on an insurance policy issued on the life of the husband after coverture are paid entirely from community funds, the policy is a community asset, and, in view of the provisions of section 172, Civil Code, the husband cannot make a valid gift thereof without the written consent of the wife; and that where the husband attempts to do so by naming a third party as beneficiary, the transaction as to the wife's share is voidable and subject to her right of revocation. This principle, however, has no application to the facts of the instant case, inasmuch as there is evidence in the record tending to support the implied finding of the trial court that the designation of the respondent as beneficiary of the proceeds of the policy was made by the assured for a valuable consideration.

[11] Whether the loan of $1,000, made upon the two occasions adverted to by the District Court of Appeal, would alone be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of section 172, Civil Code, as to a valuable consideration, nevertheless, in the light of the brother's situation and the transactions and relations that existed between him and his sister, they are not without weight taken in connection with the care, support, maintenance, and nursing which the brother received from mother and sister while ill, and also other accommodations thereafter furnished him upon his subsequent return to their home—matters doubtless within the contemplation of the brother at the time he conceived the purpose of substituting the sister for the wife—and may be sufficient to support the implied finding that there existed a valuable consideration for the substitution of the sister for the wife in the policy.

We are of the opinion that sufficient consideration has heretofore been given to all the questions raised upon the appeal.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; WASTE, J.; LAWLOR, J.; LENNON, J.; SHENK, J.

TAYLOR v. SPEAR et al. (S. F. 11416.)

1. Estoppel ⟸62(2) — Building improvements on space rented from harbor commission held not to estop commission from revoking tenure.

Where plaintiff rented space, under Pol. Code, § 2524, from the state board of harbor commissioners, appointed under Pol. Code, pt. 3, art. 9, tit. 6, c. 1, which was terminable on 30 days' notice at pleasure of commission, building of improvements, with or without knowledge of commission, did not create estoppel against commission, so as to enlarge plaintiff's tenure, since no action of commission can enlarge its powers beyond express limitations of the Code.

2. Navigable waters ⟸14(2)—Decision of harbor commissioners terminating tenancy will not be reversed in absence of fraud or abuse.

The decision of a board of harbor commissioners terminating a tenancy, under Pol. Code, § 2524, which prohibits them from granting a tenancy other than that terminable on 30 days' notice, will not be disturbed, though erroneous and working a hardship, unless it is the result of fraud, improper motives, or violation of law.

3. Navigable waters ⊜14(1) — Statute construed to give harbor commissioners right to revoke lease "at pleasure."

Where a statute prohibited a board of harbor commissioners from leasing premises other than that terminable on 30 days, and space was expressly granted "during pleasure" of board, it had unlimited discretion to give such notice; the right to remove "at pleasure" being different than the right to remove for cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, At Pleasure.]

4. Navigable waters ⊜14(1)—Good conduct of business held no ground for extension of tenure.

In a suit against harbor commissioners to enjoin termination of tenancy which, under Pol. Code, § 2524, was terminable on 30 days' notice, the plaintiff cannot base right to extension of tenure on fact that he had conducted his business in a careful and reputable manner, and such findings by the trial court cannot be made the basis of an injunction.

5. Navigable waters ⊜14(1) — Improvements and proper conduct of business not sufficient to show bad faith in revoking lease.

In a suit against harbor commissioners to enjoin termination of tenancy, terminable under Pol. Code, § 2524, on 30 days' notice, the fact that plaintiff made improvements on the premises and conducted his business properly is not sufficient on which to predicate a charge of bad faith of board.

6. Navigable waters ⊜14(1)—Assignment of space in public building held to be exclusively within discretion of harbor commissioners.

The assignment of space to a particular individual in a public building by the board of harbor commissioners, under Pol. Code, § 2524, is exclusively within discretion of board and not a matter of public concern, and a finding of trial court, that revocation of a particular license was against public interest, was unwarranted.

7. Navigable waters ⊜14(1) — Statement of commissioner held not to warrant finding board of harbor commissioners acted from improper motives.

In a suit to enjoin board of harbor commissioners from terminating space in building, under Pol. Code, § 2524, a statement by a commissioner to plaintiff that he got his space through politics and was losing it through politics held not such a showing of improper motives as to warrant court in overruling decision of board exercised within terms of the Code.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by John H. Taylor against Charles H. Spear and others, constituting the State Board of Harbor Commissioners. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. T. Plunkett, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Edward D. Mabson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff commenced this action against the defendants, who, at the time of the commencement thereof, constituted the board of state harbor commissioners, having control of the harbor of San Francisco, whereby he sought an injunction preventing the said board from terminating his occupancy of certain space or premises within the Ferry building, a state structure upon the water front of the city and county of San Francisco, under the control of said board, and from leasing, letting, or setting apart said space or premises to any other person or from interfering with the said plaintiff's occupancy of the same. He alleged in substance that for more than four years last past he had been the owner of a bootblack stand and business located upon such space or premises in said building as a tenant of the state of California, paying a certain amount of money each month as rent for the use and occupation of said space or premises occupied by his said bootblack stand and business; that he had operated and conducted his said business upon said premises during the period of his tenacy thereof in an efficient and businesslike manner and without complaint of any kind being made to the said board of state harbor commissioners as to the manner in which his said business had been conducted; and that during the period of his four-year tenancy thereof he had built up a large and profitable bootblack business; that during the year 1922 he had, with the permission of the said board, caused to be erected upon said space or premises a small building at a cost of more than $2,000, within which to operate and conduct his said bootblack stand and business, and that he had ever since conducted and was now conducting his said stand and business therein; that on or about the 1st day of November, 1923, the said state board of Harbor Commissioners made and served or caused to be served upon plaintiff a notice terminating his said tenancy and ordering him thereby to vacate within 30 days thereafter the said space and premises theretofore used and occupied by plaintiff's said bootblack stand and business. The plaintiff then proceeds to make certain averments with relation to the state of the laws of California requiring the letting or setting apart of buildings erected on property subject to the control of said board of harbor commissioners by competitive bidding, but since such is not the law affecting the space or premises occupied by said plaintiff, these averments need not be considered.

The plaintiff further alleges that certain other persons, whose names are unknown to plaintiff, have made application to said board to have said space or premises now occupied by him set apart, leased, or let to them, to the exclusion of plaintiff, and that said board has agreed with such persons to so do in order to satisfy certain political obligations incurred by them in a political campaign and to recompense said persons for political services, and that, unless restrained by the court, the said board threatens to and will oust said plaintiff from said space and premises, and thereby ruin and destroy his said bootblack business and will issue a permit to said other persons to enter upon and occupy said space and premises to the exclusion of said plaintiff, to his irreparable injury and damage, for which he has no plain, speedy or adequate remedy at law. Wherefore he seeks an injunction to prevent said defendants in their said official capacity from doing the aforesaid acts. To this complaint the defendants presented a general and also a special demurrer upon a number of specified grounds, which the trial court overruled; whereupon the defendants answered, denying for the most part specifically the averments of the plaintiff's complaint, except that they admit the occupancy by the plaintiff of the space or premises in question, and in that regard aver that the plaintiff's sole right to occupy the same was that acquired by him under and by virtue of the provisions of section 2524 of the Political Code, and which was terminable thereunder upon 30 days' notice at the pleasure of said board, and which was terminated by the giving of said notice by said board in accordance with said section of the Political Code.

The cause proceeded to trial upon the issues as thus framed and was submitted to the trial court for decision. Thereafter the court made and filed its findings of fact, which were generally in the plaintiff's favor. The court found that the plaintiff had entered into the possession and occupancy of the space or premises designated in his complaint about four years prior to the inception of the action under a permission or license received from the said board of harbor commissioners in the form of that set forth in the defendants' answer, and had since continued in the use and occupancy thereof thereunder; that he had made the improvements in his structure thereon at the time and cost and with the permission and consent of said board as detailed in his said complaint; that he had at all times conducted his bootblack stand and business in a clean, orderly, efficient, and businesslike manner and without complaint, and that he was a fit and proper person to have the use and occupancy of said premises and to conduct said business; and that he had built up a good and profitable bootblack business thereon, and had at all said times served and was still serving the public in a satisfactory manner; that on or about November 1, 1923, the said board had served upon said plaintiff a notice terminating his occupancy of said premises and directing him to vacate the same within 30 days thereafter, which said notice to vacate was in the form set forth in the defendants' answer to said complaint; that neither said board nor any of its members gave plaintiff any reason for terminating his occupancy of said space or premises except that one of their number stated verbally to said plaintiff:

"Well, Taylor, you ought to know the reason; you got it through politics and you are losing it through politics."

In that connection the court finds:

"That the said board of harbor commissioners have not agreed, in satisfaction of political obligations, to assign the space or premises occupied by plaintiff's building, bootblack stand, and bootblack business to other persons to the exclusion of plaintiff, and to permit other persons to enter into possession of said space occupied by plaintiff's building, bootblack stand, and bootblack business and exclude the plaintiff therefrom. The court infers and finds from the evidence, however, that the said notice given to the plaintiff was for the purpose and with the intent of having plaintiff's said location vacated by him in order that some other person favored by defendants might be permitted by them to establish in plaintiff's present location or in approximately the same location, a bootblack stand in the place and stead of plaintiff, and there conduct a bootblacking business to the exclusion of plaintiff."

The court further proceeds to find that said board, in seeking to remove said plaintiff from his occupancy of said premises, has not acted in the manner provided by law or in good faith, but that the action of said defendants in the premises was and is unreasonable and arbitrary and not in execution or furtherance of their public trust, nor for the benefit of the public at all, and that no public interest will be served, aided, advanced, or benefited by removal of plaintiff or his said stand or business from said location, or by the establishment by any other person of the bootblackening stand or business in plaintiff's present location or approximately in said location. The court makes certain other findings in denial of the truth of certain of the averments of the defendants' answer which need not here be noted. As conclusions of law from the said findings of fact, the court finds:

"That discretion of the state board of harbor commissioners in terminating plaintiff's occupancy of space was and is not exercised in good faith, or on reasonable grounds, or in furtherance of the purpose for which the trust administered by them exists, but on the contrary the action of said board in the premises was and is arbitrary and unreasonable; that by reason of the unrecouped expenditures made by plaintiff in erecting his said building or structure with the knowledge, permission, and consent of said board of harbor commissioners, said board was not, and is not, justified in removing plaintiff from his said location, and under the existing circumstances as hereinbefore found is estopped from removing plaintiff from his said location; that plaintiff is entitled to judgment enjoining defendants from enforcing the notice of termination of his use and occupancy of the space in question at the northerly end of the Ferry building, or from terminating plaintiff's occupancy of said space by reason of any matters or things occurring up to the time of commencement of this action."

The judgment of injunction follows in form the aforesaid conclusions of law, and from said judgment the defendants prosecute this appeal.

[1] The state board of harbor commissioners is one of the state agencies of the state of California and is invested with control of the harbor of San Francisco under the provisions of article 9, part 3, title 6, chapter 1, of the Political Code. The portion of the bay of San Francisco and the properties, improvements, rights, privileges, easements, and appurtenances connected therewith or appertaining thereto over which the said board of harbor commissioners has been given jurisdiction, possession, and control are generally set forth in section 2524 of said Code. With relation to the powers and limitations of said board in respect to the occupation and use by others of space or premises within or upon any portion of the property with which said board is thus vested with possession and control, said section provides that:

"The commissioners shall not have the right to renew any lease, or to lease any premises under their control for any purpose whatever, except as otherwise specially provided, but they may permit any property under their control to be used by any corporation, firm, association, person, or company, but in no case shall any corporation, firm, association, person, or company enjoy the use of any of the property under the commissioners' charge, except such use as shall be terminated as herein provided."

By a later clause in said section it is provided that:

"Any use permitted of the property by the commissioners may be terminated at any time by them, on thirty days' previous notice to the party or parties so using the same."

On January 2, 1919, the board of harbor commissioners adopted a resolution assigning to the plaintiff herein that certain space at the north end of the Ferry building designated in his complaint herein, for use by him as a bootblack stand, such use of said space to continue during the pleasure of the said board of harbor commissioners, at a fixed rental of $75 per month, payable in advance. On January 3, 1919, the said plaintiff was given formal notice in writing of said resolution and of the assignment thereby of said space to him, wherein it was expressly stated that said assignment was "to continue during the pleasure of the commission"; and on the same date the said plaintiff, pursuant to said assignment, and to said notice thereof, and of the terms thereof, entered into the use and occupation of said space in said building thus assigned to him. In so doing he did so with actual knowledge of the limitations imposed upon his tenure of said premises by the terms of said resolution and notice, and also with actual or imputed knowledge of the terms of said section of the Political Code above quoted, limiting the power of said commissioners to permit the use and occupation of any portion of the properties under their control for a greater tenure than that terminable upon 30 days' notice.

Whatever improvements or appliances the plaintiff might have placed upon the space or premises thus allotted to him at the time of said assignment in order to facilitate the doing of his particular business thereon, and whatever improvements, appliances, or structures he may have subsequently placed thereon, at whatever cost, and whether with or without the permission of said board of harbor commissioners, were so placed and used with knowledge on his part at all times of the uncertainties of his tenure of said premises both by the terms of his assignment and by the provisions of the Code section, and hence no additional right to a greater permanency of tenure could be predicated thereon; and this would be true even though the plaintiff might have been led to expect from the circumstances attending the making of any such improvements or from the terms of the permission accorded him so to do by a complaisant board that his tenure had been made more certain, since by no action or nonaction or permission or express or implied extension on the part of said board could plaintiff's tenure of said premises be changed or enlarged beyond that of a tenure terminable upon 30 days' notice at the pleasure of the board; and this for the reason that the provisions of the Political Code above quoted expressly define the measure of the powers of the board in respect to the use and occupancy of such property and expressly limit the mode of the exercise of their powers in that regard. What the commissioners could not do directly they could not do indirectly, because of these express limitations upon their powers. They could not, therefore, create an estoppel which would have the effect of enlarging the plaintiff's tenure beyond that embraced within the express limitations of the Code section. Zottman v. City and County of San Francisco, 20 Cal. 96, 81 Am. Dec. 96; San Diego W. Co. v. City of San Diego, 59 Cal. 517; Sutro v. Pettit, 74 Cal. 332, 337, 16 P. 7, 5 Am. St. Rep. 442; Santa Cruz R. P. Co. v. Broderick, 113 Cal. 628, 45 P. 863; Dillon, Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 791; Simons Brick Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 182 Cal. 230, 187 P. 1066, and cases cited.

The cases referred to by the respondent in support of his contention that such estoppel might arise from the conduct of public officials with regard to the occupancy of public property are found upon examination to be in each instance a case wherein the estoppel permitted by the courts was such as lay as to its extent within the scope of the original powers of the board or official acquiescing in the extended use or term of occupation. This is well illustrated by the case of Gushee v. City of New York, 42 App. Div. 37, 58 N. Y. S. 967, upon which the respondent herein strongly relies, and wherein the park commissioners of said city had power to grant privileges for selling refreshments within the parks thereof for the period of five years, and having granted such a privilege and having permitted the grantee to make certain expenditures for repairs and improvements upon the premises, were held to be estopped from withdrawing the granted privilege within such term.

[2] We are cited to no case wherein officials in charge of the administration of public property, with limited powers as to the extent of their right to permit the occupation and use thereof by private persons, could by any agreement or acquiescence or act or conduct upon their part enlarge such use or occupation to an extent exceeding the express limitations upon their original power to permit such occupation and use. It is, however, contended by the respondent herein that notwithstanding the express limitations upon his tenure of the premises in question expressed in the terms of his assignment to the effect that "said assignment was to continue during the pleasure of the commission"; and notwithstanding the express provision in the Code section that "any use permitted of the property by the commissioners may be terminated at any time by them, on thirty days' previous notice to the party or parties so using the same," he is entitled to enjoin the attempted exercise of these powers on the part of the commissioners, because, as he contends, the action of said commissioners was not undertaken in the public interest or in good faith. The general subject of the powers of this particular board of harbor commissioners with respect to their control of the use and occupation of the properties committed to their custody and management as an agency of the state was exhaustively considered by this court in the case of Union Transportation Co. v. Bassett, 118 Cal. 604, 50 P. 754. That was a case wherein the plaintiff, as the owner of a steamboat plying between the cities of San Francisco and Stockton, and assigned to docking space at the Clay street wharf in the former city, objected to the action of the board of harbor commissioners in making an order changing the place of landing to another location, and undertook to obtain an injunction preventing such action upon the ground that the same was unreasonable, arbitrary, oppressive, and would have the effect of ruining the business of the plaintiff in that action. The trial court granted such injunction. In reversing its judgment in that regard, this court had under consideration the provisions of sections 2522 and 2524 of the Political Code defining the powers of the board of harbor commissioners; and while the particular portions of the latter section of the Code involved on this appeal were not therein considered, other portions thereof investing the board with similar powers and with a like discretion in their exercise were under review.

This court held that the large discretion with which the board of harbor commissioners was invested under section 2524 of the Political Code was a discretion with which, if it be honestly exercised, a court of equity will not feel itself at liberty to interfere, or to substitute its judgment for that of the board, even if the conclusion of the latter should be erroneous and work hardship upon the individual. The court quoted approvingly the language of the Supreme Court of Connecticut in the case of Dailey v. New Haven, 60 Conn. 314, 22 A. 945, 14 L. R. A. 69, to the effect that whenever bodies or boards of the character of this one are acting within the limits of powers conferred on them and in due form of law the right of courts to supervise, review, or restrain is exceedingly limited; and that with the exercise of discretionary powers courts rarely, and only for grave reasons, interfere. Those grave reasons are found only where fraud, corruption, improper motives, or influences, plain disregard of duty, gross abuse of power, or violation of law enter into or characterize the result; and this court proceeds to say:

"But, while courts of equity will not refuse to interfere in proper cases, the showing to justify their interference must be clear. The mere difference of opinion between the chancellor upon the one hand, and the board upon the other, will not suffice. It is not to be expected that power will always be exercised with the highest discretion, and even in those cases where upon the showing the court would without hesitation declare that, occupying the position of the board, it would not have made the order or passed the ordinance in question, still this reason will not be considered sufficient to justify the substitution by the court of its judgment for that of the tribunal in which the law has seen fit to lodge the power. White v. Kent, 11 Ohio St. 553; Wiley v. Allegany County Com'rs, 51 Md. 404; St. Louis v. Weber, 44 Mo. 550; Knoxville v. Bird, 12 Lea. [Tenn.] 121, 47 Am. Rep. 326."

[3] It is to be noted that the provisions of section 2524 under review in the instant case, and having special reference to the occupancy and use of property under the control of the board of harbor commissioners, give to said board in one direction a narrower and in another a broader range of power than was given to said board under the provisions in said section interpreted in the foregoing case. With respect to the grant of privileges, such as that given to the plaintiff herein, the commissioners are expressly forbidden to grant any lease of any portion of the premises under their control, or any use or occupation thereof other than that terminable by them upon 30 days' notice. This provision commits to the commissioners the power to give or withhold such notice at their pleasure, and invests them with an unlimited discretion in the exercise of such power in so far as the language of the section is concerned; and when to the broad language of the statute there is added the express limitation embraced in the plaintiff's assignment of the space or premises in question, to the effect that his use of the same was to continue "during the pleasure of the commission," an even stronger case is presented for the noninterference of the courts with the acts of the commissioners within the scope of their powers than that presented to the court in the above-cited case. Where subordinate boards or officials have been invested with the power of removal of their appointees "at the pleasure" of the appointing power, the courts have held that "these words have a well-defined legal meaning." The right to remove "at pleasure is an entirely different thing from the right to remove for cause. To hold that the statute only authorizes the council to remove for cause would be to deny the words used by the legislature their ordinary meaning. This cannot be done." London v. City of Franklin, 118 Ky. 105, 80 S. W. 514. In the case of Stebbins v. Police Com'rs, 196 Mass. 365, 82 N. E. 42, where the city charter of Springfield provided that the administration of the police department should be vested in the mayor and aldermen, who should have full and exclusive power to appoint a constable and assistants and all other police officers, and to remove the same at pleasure, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held that, under such a provision, the mayor and aldermen had an absolute power to remove such appointive officers without any notice or hearing.

[4] But even if it were to be conceded that the broad powers with which the board of harbor commissioners are thus invested, when exercised apparently within the scope and terms of the aforesaid provisions of the Political Code, are nevertheless subject to be reviewed by the courts and their exercise enjoined upon a showing of fraud, corruption, and the like, it seems apparent to us from the record before us that no such showing has been made in this case as would have sufficed to justify the action of the trial court in the rendition of the judgment here under review. As we have already seen, the plaintiff could predicate no right to an extension of his tenure of the space or premises in question upon the fact that he had made certain expenditures thereon with or without the acquiescence of said board. Neither, it is plain, could the plaintiff gain a right to a longer or less terminable period of enjoyment and use of said premises predicated upon the fact that he had conducted his business thereon carefully, reputably and without cause for complaint; since, if that course of conduct were to be considered as a sufficient ground for invoking the restraints of equity against his removal, every other holder of an assignment of space or premises within the Ferry building or the other buildings or properties under the control of the board of harbor commissioners, would be entitled, upon a like showing, to an indefinite and interminable right to retain their holdings therein during good behavior, notwithstanding the express limitations of the statute in that regard.

[5] And if this plaintiff can predicate no such right upon such a showing, it would seem irresistibly to follow that he cannot, upon a like showing, predicate a charge of fraud or corruption or bad faith or improper motives, or disregard of duty, or abuse of power, or violation of law against the board of harbor commissioners for doing that which it lay within their discretion to do under the express language and limitations of the statute, notwithstanding plaintiff's unimpeachable conduct of his business upon the premises in question; and it further follows that, whatever findings the trial court may have made as to the plaintiff's conduct of his business upon the space or premises in question, or whatever conclusions of law it may have predicated thereon, furnish no sufficient ground for interference by way of injunction with the discretion of the board of harbor commissioners in the exercise of their statutory powers.

[6] A like conclusion must be arrived at with respect to the findings and conclusions of the trial court to the effect that the best interests of the public would not be subserved by the action of the board of harbor commissioners in revoking the assignment of the plaintiff to the space or premises occupied by him in the Ferry building. The public, as such, have no interest in the occupancy of any portion of the Ferry building by any particular individual, and hence the continued occupancy or use of the space or premises in said building, heretofore occupied and used by this particular plaintiff, is a matter of no such public concern as would justify the interposition of a court of equity on his application. Neither is it a matter of public concern of which the courts can take cognizance as to whether a bootblack stand, or a tobacco stand, or a fruit stand, or a newspaper and magazine counter, or a confectionery stand, or in fact any other particular concession, shall or shall not be accorded space, and especially shall or shall not be assigned to any particular or designated space in said building or in any other of the buildings or structures under the control of the board of harbor commissioners. These are matters which are committed entirely and exclusively to the judgment and discretion of the commissioners and over which the courts can exercise no control. It follows that the findings and conclusions of law and judgment of the trial court in respect to these matters constitute an unwarranted interference with the discretionary powers with which the board of harbor commissioners is invested by the provisions of the Political Code above referred to, which this court finds itself unable and unwilling to approve.

[7] We are thus brought to the final contention upon which the respondent seeks to sustain the judgment herein. It is that the board of harbor commissioners was moved by improper motives in its attempted termination of the plaintiff's occupation and use of the space and premises affected by its said order. An examination of the record herein shows it to be entirely wanting in any evidence, with one exception, to be presently noted, sufficient to sustain either the plaintiff's averments or the findings of the trial court in that regard. The single exception is that testified to by the plaintiff and referred to in the findings of the court, and which consists in the following remark, alleged and found to have been made by one of the commissioners to the plaintiff:

"Well, Taylor, you ought to know the reason; you got it through politics and you are losing it through politics."

It should require no argument to show that an apparently flippant remark of this character, made by one of the commissioners, could have no binding effect upon a board of commissioners, the powers of which and the mode and method of their exercise are strictly limited and defined by the statute under which such board is functioning.

It follows from the foregoing considerations that the findings and judgment of the trial court have no sufficient support in the evidence in this case or in the law applicable thereto.

The judgment is reversed.

73 Cal. App. 485

Ex parte WILLIAMS. (Cr. 1252.)

1. Licenses ⟸42(7)—Imprisonment sentence for violation of Corporate Securities Act proper; "individual."

In prosecution for selling interest in certain gas contracts without a permit, in violation of Corporate Securities Act, imprisonment sentence held proper, as provided under section 14, notwithstanding section 13, and section 2, subd. 3, punishing a company by fine, and defining an "individual" as one included within a company, the offense having been committed by the seller as an individual and not as a company.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Individual.]

2. Habeas corpus ⟸30(2)—Defects of information for violating Corporate Securities Act not reviewable on habeas corpus.

Although petition charging violation of Corporate Securities Act may have been defective in failing to show all facts necessary to constitute offense, and was therefore demurrable, held, that defects of petition could not be reviewed, after conviction and commitment, on application for habeas corpus.

Application by T. S. Williams for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of Los Angeles County to secure release of petitioner from custody, pursuant to a plea of guilty to a violation of the Corporate Securities Act.

Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded

Mulligan & Ryzek, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The return to the writ shows that the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles holds the petitioner in custody by virtue of a commitment out of the superior court of Los Angeles county in an action of the People v. T. S. Williams. The judgment in that action, as shown by the commitment, recites that, in an information filed in said court, the defendant was charged with the crime of "violation Corporate Securities Act, a felony," and that he pleaded guilty as charged in said information. Thereupon the court adjudged that the defendant be punished by imprisonment in the state prison of the state of California, at San Quentin for the term prescribed by law, and remanded him to the custody of the sheriff, to be by him delivered into the custody of the warden of said prison.

Petitioner contends that his detention by the sheriff is illegal in this, that the statutory provisions under which he was informed against and sentenced and imprisoned are unconstitutional and void; that the superior court has no jurisdiction of his person or of the subject-matter of the charge; that the information does not charge a public offense; that the sentence and judgment is void; that the court had no jurisdiction or right or authority to impose a prison sentence or a sentence of any kind upon the defendant.

The information accused the defendant "of the crime of violation Corporate Securities Act, a felony, committed as follows: That the said W. M. Williams and T. S. Williams on or about the 21st day of May, 1924, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously sell to Anna S. Aldahl a 1/125 undivided interest in certain gas contracts, plans, etc., situated in the Torrance-Lomita oil fields, without having obtained from the state corporation commissioner a permit so to do."

The case thus presented requires an examination and consideration of the terms of the Corporate Securities Act. Deering's Gen. Laws, 1923 Ed., Act 3814. This act was adopted in the year 1917, and was amended in 1919, 1921, and 1923. Section 14 reads, in part, as follows:

"Penalty for officers, etc. Every officer, agent, or employee of any company, and every other person, who knowingly authorizes, directs, or aids in the issue or sale of, or issues or executes, or sells, or causes or assists in causing to be issued, executed, or sold, any security, in nonconformity with a permit of the commissioner then in effect authorizing such issue, or contrary to the provisions of this act, or of the constitution of this state, * * * or who, in any other respect willfully violates or fails to comply with any of the provisions of this act, or who, in any other respect, willfully violates or fails, omits, or neglects to obey, observe, or comply with any order, permit, decision, demand, or requirement, or any part or provision thereof, of the commissioner under the provisions of this act, is guilty of a public offense and shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or in a county jail not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

We have emphasized the words most definitely applying to the information against petitioner.

Section 2 undertakes to define some of the words used in the act. Among other things, it says:

"The following words have in this act the signification attached to them in this section, unless otherwise apparent from the context: * * * 3. The word 'company' includes all domestic and foreign private corporations, associations, joint stock companies, and partnerships, of every kind, trustees, as hereinafter defined, and also individuals as hereinafter defined; excepting therefrom: * * *" (The exceptions are not pertinent to any question here presented.)

Subdivision 5a of said section reads as follows:

"The word 'individual' in so far as it is included in the definition of a 'company,' includes only persons selling, offering for sale, negotiating for the sale of or taking subscriptions for any security as hereinafter defined in subdivision 6a of this section, of their own issue."

Subdivision 6a of section 2 reads as follows:

"The word 'security,' in so far as it applies to 'individuals,' includes: (a) Any instrument offered to the public by an 'individual' evidencing or representing any right to participate or share in oil, gas or other hydrocarbon substances or other minerals of any sort, as yet undeveloped, or in the proceeds of sale thereof; (b) All bonds, debentures and evidence of indebtedness offered to the public by an 'individual.'"

Subdivision 9 of said section 2 reads in part as follows:

"The word 'broker,' as used in this act, includes every person or company, other than an agent, who shall, in this state, engage either wholly or in part in the business of selling, offering for sale, negotiating for the sale of, or otherwise dealing in any 'security' or 'securities' issued by others, or of underwriting any issue of 'securities,' or of purchasing such 'securities' with the purpose of reselling them, or of offering them for sale to the public. The word 'securities,' as used in this paragraph, includes the following 'securities' issued by 'individuals':

"Any instrument offered to the public by an 'individual' evidencing or representing any right to participate or share in oil, gas or other hydrocarbon substances or other minerals of any sort, as yet undeveloped, or in the proceeds of sale thereof;

"All bonds, debentures and evidence of indebtedness offered to the public by an 'individual.'

"The following are excepted from the provisos of this paragraph:

"(a) Any owner of any security who is not the issuer or an underwriter thereof, who sells or exchanges the same for his own account; provided, that such sale or exchange is not made in the course of repeated and successive transactions of like or similar character by him. * * *"

The word "agent," in subdivision 9, refers to an agent of a company or broker, as defined by subdivision 8.

Section 3 provides, among other things, that no company shall sell any security of its own issue until it shall have first obtained from the corporation commissioner a permit so to do. Section 5 provides that—

"No person or company shall act as an agent or broker until such person or company shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a certificate, then in effect, authorizing such person or company so to do. * * *"

[1] Under his proposition that the court had no jurisdiction to impose upon him a prison sentence, it is the contention of petitioner that the information attempts to charge him with commission of the alleged felonious act, not as an individual in the ordinary sense of the word, but as a corporation or "company" under those provisions of the act, which under stated circumstances, define the word "individual" as one included within the word "company," as defined in subdivision 3 of section 2. He therefore, as we understand the argument to be, contends that the judgment purports to be based upon conviction of an act done by him as a "company," and that therefore he could not in any event be punished by imprisonment, since the only punishment for a "company" violating the act is by a fine, as provided by section 13 thereof. It is a sufficient reply to this argument that said section 13 provides penalties which cover illegal issuance of securities. That section does not apply to the act or business of selling securities after they have been issued. Petitioner was not charged with the doing of any act prohibited by section 13. The charge was that he sold the described property, contrary to the provisions of the act. Such selling, by any person, is declared to be subject to punishment as provided by section 14. Therefore we shall consider the present matter further solely upon the theory that the purported offense, to which petitioner pleaded guilty as charged in the information, related to something done by him as a natural person and not to something done by an "individual" acting as a "company" within the definition of those terms in the statute.

Petitioner also contends that the alleged acts set forth in the information would be denounced by the statute as a crime only if the instrument was offered to the public, and only if the instrument represented a right to share in gas "as yet undeveloped;" and that the act of selling the security would not be a crime unless the sale was made in the course of successive transactions of similar character by the defendant. Based upon this construction of the statute, petitioner claims that, assuming that the statute is in all respects valid, the information failed to charge him with the commission of a crime even under the terms of the statute, because it does not charge that the gas contracts covered undeveloped property, and because it does not charge that the security was offered to the public, and because it does not charge that the alleged sale was made in the course of repeated and successive transactions of like or similar character.

[2] But on the assumption that none of the provisions of the statute under which the defendant was prosecuted are unconstitutional, we find that the information attempts to charge a crime, in that the defendant violated the Corporate Securities Act by selling the described property without having obtained from the state corporation commissioner a permit so to do. While the fact that the information may be defective in the particulars above suggested might have required a ruling in defendant's favor on demurrer to the complaint, and while upon appeal from the judgment he might have raised these questions for appropriate consideration by this court, nevertheless, we are of the opinion that such supposed defects in the information cannot be recognized as a ground for relief of the defendant in a habeas corpus proceeding directed against a judgment of the superior court. "We think the true rule is that where an indictment purports or attempts to state an offense of a kind of which the court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, the question whether the facts charged are sufficient to constitute an offense of that kind will not be examined into on habeas corpus." Matter of Ruef, 150 Cal. 666, 89 P. 605. While this rule is not applied to courts of inferior as distinguished from courts of general jurisdiction, it does apply to the superior courts. Ex parte Greenall, 153 Cal. 767, 770, 96 P. 804; Matter of Kavanaugh, 180 Cal. 181, 180 P. 533.

Disclaiming any intention to suggest or contend that the Corporate Securities Act as a whole is unconstitutional, petitioner does contend that subdivisions 3 and 5a and 6a of section 2 are unconstitutional and void. The argument is, that by the limits which they place upon the right of an individual person to sell or exchange a certain described kind of his own property, these provisions of the statute deprive one of his property without due process of law; are an unreasonable restraint upon the right of contract; are an unreasonable restraint upon trade and commerce; destroy the right of acquiring, possessing, protecting and alienating property; deny the equal protection of the laws as guaranteed under the fourteenth amendment of the federal Constitution and under article 1 of section 13 of the Constitution of California. And so it is contended that, because the sale made by the defendant as charged in the information was by the charge limited to a particular kind of property, the free and uncontrolled sale of which (when sold by the owner) is lawful except as the above-mentioned portions of the statute attempt to make such sale unlawful, and because said provisions of the statute are void, a question is presented which may properly be considered in this proceeding. It remains true, however, that if the defendant in selling the said property was acting as a broker, and did not have a broker's license, then he would be guilty of violation of the act. The information may have been defective in failing to show all of these things; but it was an attempt to charge the commission of an offense, in the selling of property, in violation of the Corporate Securities Act. We therefore conclude that, as settled by the decisions to which we have referred, the remedy by habeas corpus is not available to petitioner.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner is remanded to custody.

BARKER v. MORRELL. (Civ. 5071.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 13, 1925.)

Brokers ⟸86(1)—Evidence held sufficient to support findings that plaintiff and defendant participated as real estate brokers in an exchange.

In action by one broker against another for commissions arising from transactions wherein defendant had brought plaintiff a customer under agreement for equal division of commissions, and exchange of properties had been effected with assistance of other brokers, evidence held to support finding that plaintiff and defendant participated as real estate brokers in effecting exchange.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Myrtle F. Barker against Eva D. Morrell. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, for appellant.

Rea & Caldwell, of San Jose, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to obtain a judgment for moneys alleged to be due and owing. The defendant answered and the action was tried before the court sitting without a jury. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Shortly prior to the 8th day of June, 1921, M. J. Mahoney and W. Sicotti were real estate brokers occupying the same office in San Jose. At the same time Myrtle F. Barker was a real estate broker and had an office at Los Gatos. At the same time the defendant, Mrs. Morrell, was a real estate broker and had an office in San Jose. Among other properties, the plaintiff had listed the property of W. H. Crawford and wife. Shortly before the date last mentioned, Mrs. Morrell called at the office of the plaintiff and stated that she would like some properties in that neighborhood, and that all deals consummated between the plaintiff and the defendant should be shared equally fifty-fifty on the commission. A few days later the defendant again called and brought with her Ambrose Taylor, who owned some properties in San Jose. The plaintiff entered the automobile which the defendant was driving and together all three went to the property so owned by Mr. Crawford. Thereafter Mr. Mahoney entered into the transaction and took some part in the negotiations. Mr. Sicotti did the same thing. Still later such negotiations were had that an exchange was agreed upon as between Mr. Crawford and Mr. Taylor. At that time a dispute arose as to how the commissions should be disbursed. The amount of the commissions was not at all in dispute, but the question arose as to what individuals were entitled to share in the payments. Mahoney and Sicotti maintained that they were entitled to the whole; Mrs. Morrell claimed that she was entitled to one-half; this plaintiff claimed that she was entitled to one-half. A conference was held between the owners of the properties and the real estate brokers and the disbursement of the commissions was gone over. At that time the plaintiff was not present; however, as a result of the conference, a writing was executed as follows.

"San Jose, June 8, 1921.

"We, the undersigned, do hereby agree to accept one-third each of any and all commissions coming from the sale or exchange of the properties owned by Ambrose Taylor and his wife, Amelia, and W. H. Crawford and his wife, Maude. Provided: That Mrs. E. Morrell is to settle with Mrs. Barker of Barker & Barker, real estate dealers of Los Gatos for any claim that she may have against the above commissions. We agree to accept our money as it is paid in taking notes from Mr. and Mrs. Taylor for their portion of the commissions.

"[Signed] M. J. Mahoney, W. Sicotti, E. Morrell.

"Witnesses: Maude Crawford, W. H. Crawford."

After that paper was executed, the commissions were paid in accordance with the terms thereof and when the plaintiff heard that the payment had been made to Mrs. Morrell she demanded that she be paid one-half of the payment so made to Mrs. Morrell, and when the demand was refused she commenced this action.

The trial court made findings which are full and complete, and which are in favor of the plaintiff. The appellant contends that the finding to the effect that the plaintiff and defendant participated as real estate brokers in effecting the exchange is not supported by the evidence. In this behalf, appellant quotes the plaintiff's language, wherein she stated that the oral contract was that the plaintiff and defendant agreed "that all deals consummated between us should be shared equally." Then appellant cites evidence to the effect that the deal was consummated by Mahoney and Sicotti, and therefore the evidence did not show that the plaintiff had brought herself within the terms of the oral contract as she stated its terms. The appellant also contends that the original contract was abandoned, and that the exchange which was made was made pursuant to another and different contract.

The latter point is predicated on the testimony of the defendant. After she had had her conversation with the plaintiff, and after she had taken Mr. Taylor to see the Crawford property, she met and had a conversation with Mahoney. In that conversation Mahoney claimed that the business in hand was wholly his business. The defendant testified thereupon she said:

"Well, if it is your deal then I will give it up and have nothing more to do with it."

Conceding that the defendant by that statement attempted to abandon the contract, the utmost that can be said as to the legal effect is that she was attempting, so far as she was concerned, to abandon it. However, her act would not constitute a contract of abandonment which would be binding on the plaintiff. The appellant shows no portion of the record in which the plaintiff ever agreed to an abandonment. As to the first point regarding the consummation of sales or exchanges, we understand the appellant to contend that the oral contract as stated by the plaintiff would not apply to any case, unless the business should be transacted wholly by the plaintiff and the defendant. The evidence does not support the contention. The plaintiff alleged that all four of the brokers effected the exchange. The trial court found that all four of the brokers "performed services as real estate brokers, all being duly authorized under the laws of the state of California to act as brokers in real estate transactions, and took part in the exchange. * * *" The exact value of the factor as to the amount of labor and the effectiveness of the labor of each of the brokers is a question on which the evidence is distinctly conflicting. However, there is an abundance of evidence to support the finding as made by the trial court, and this court is not at liberty to disturb that finding.

The judgment is affirmed.

HANSEN v. CARR, County Auditor, et al. (Civ. 5220.)

1. Counties ⟸196(4)—Taxpayer cannot bring action for recovery of public moneys, before making demand of district attorney.

In an action by taxpayer against county treasurer, to enjoin payment of certain claims, for an accounting of claims paid, and for recovery of claims paid, amended complaint not showing any demand or refusal upon district attorney, demurrer was properly sustained, under Pol. Code, § 4005b, providing the method for such actions, since taxpayer has adequate remedy by complaint to district attorney.

2. Evidence ⟸83(1)—Until contrary alleged public officer presumed to have done duty.

A public officer is presumed to have done his duty, until facts are alleged to the contrary.

3. Action ⟸48(1)—Cause of action, involving three separate claims, held misjoinder by statute.

In an action by taxpayer against county treasurer, causes of action covering employment of person on tax board, employment of assistant district attorney, and hiring of special counsel, by county commissioners, held misjoinder, under Code Civ. Proc. § 427, providing for joinder of causes of action.

4. Parties ⟸29 — "Necessary parties defendant" are those whose rights are affected by action.

Necessary parties to an action in capacity of defendants are those who are interested in resisting demands of plaintiff immediately or consequently, and whose rights will be affected thereby, in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 382.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Necessary Parties.]

5. Pleading ⟸52(2)—Several causes of action in same complaint must be separately stated.

Where a complaint contains three causes of action, each containing a suit for injunction, suit for accounting and suit to recover funds, held, that the causes of action joined therein must be separately stated as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 427.

6. Pleading ⟸14—Complaint for accounting against county treasurer held demurrable, as failing to state cause of action.

In an action by taxpayer against county treasurer, a complaint for accounting on claims illegally paid, alleging that payments were made by warrants, approved by county auditor, held subject to demurrer because of insufficient facts to state cause of action, since the records were public, and plaintiff could easily have ascertained the amounts.

7. Appeal and error ⟸959(1)—Pleading ⟸225(2)—Leave to amend after demurrer sustained discretionary with trial court, and ruling not reviewable save for abuse.

The granting of leave to amend, after a demurrer has been sustained, is discretionary with trial court, and, in absence of showing of abuse, will not be disturbed on appeal.

8. Appeal and error ⟸918(1)—Where record fails to show request and denial of leave to amend after demurrer, assumed no offer was made.

Where the record fails to show that leave to amend was requested after demurrer was sustained, and application denied, court assumes that no offer of amendment was made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by Frederick W. Hansen against Thomas K. Carr, Auditor of Humboldt County, and others, in which J. F. Quinn intervenes. From a judgment for defendants and intervener, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Logan Beamer, of Eureka (Henry L. Ford, of Eureka, of counsel), for appellant.

Arthur W. Hill, Dist. Atty., and J. J. Cairns, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of Eureka, for respondent Carr.

H. C. Nelson, of Eureka, for respondent Quinn.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff brought this action as a citizen and taxpayer of the county of Humboldt against the county auditor, the county treasurer, and six members of the board of supervisors of the county, one of whom had succeeded another during the time over which the controversy extended. The complaint was framed upon the theory that certain illegal claims against the county had been authorized by the board of supervisors, audited by the county auditor, and paid by the county treasurer. The purpose of the action was threefold: To restrain the allowance, auditing, and payment of similar claims against the county; to have an accounting of the moneys paid by virtue of the claims so allowed, audited, and paid, and to recover for the benefit of the county the moneys so found to have been illegally paid. The case comes to us on the amended complaint, to which the demurrers were sustained, and upon which judgment was entered in favor of the defendants and the intervener, J. F. Quinn, who came into the proceeding for the purpose of defending against plaintiff's third alleged cause of action.

This amended complaint contains three distinct and separate causes of action. The first cause involves the claims of three persons who are alleged to have been appointed or employed by the board of supervisors of the county for the purpose of advising and assisting the board in the matter of equalizing and revising property values for the purpose of taxation in the county. The second cause of action involves the legality of the employment of an assistant district attorney. The third cause of action involves the legality of the employment, under a resolution of the board of supervisors, of legal counsel to assist the district attorney in defending certain applications which had been made for the diversion of the water of Trinity river, the middle fork of the Eel river and Thatcher and Elk creeks to places outside of the county of Humboldt, which diversions, it was claimed, would seriously injure the public interests of the county. These three separate and distinct causes of action were all joined in the one complaint, and in each of the three causes of action three distinct grounds for relief were stated: An action for an injunction, an action for an accounting, and an action for the specific recovery of money.

[1, 2] The demurrer of the defendants who were joined in the amended complaint was both general and special. Among the grounds specified in the special demurrer are the want of legal capacity on the part of the plaintiff to maintain the action and the improper union of several causes of action as heretofore pointed out. Upon the grounds assigned in the general demurrer, the action of the trial court in sustaining the demurrer was proper, and the failure of the plaintiff to ask leave to amend in this respect justified the entry of judgment in favor of the defendants. In this connection we refer to the absence of any allegation of demand upon or refusal of the district attorney, as a duly constituted legal officer of the county, to maintain the action for the recovery of the moneys alleged to have been illegally expended and for the prevention of further illegal expenditures. Section 4005b of the Political Code provides that:

"Whenever any board of supervisors shall, without authority of law, order any money paid as salary, fees, or for any other purposes, and such money shall have been actually paid; * * * the district attorney of such county is hereby empowered, and it is hereby made his imperative duty, to institute suit, in the name of the county * * * to recover the money so paid, * * * and no order of the board of supervisors therefor shall be necessary to maintain such suit."

The same section authorizes similar proceedings on the part of the district attorney to restrain the payment of such moneys. In Burr v. Board of Supervisors, 96 Cal. 210, 213, 31 P. 38, 39, our Supreme Court affirmed an order of the superior court sustaining a general demurrer to the petition of a taxpayer seeking to review an order of the board of supervisors allowing a certain claim against the county which was alleged to be illegal. The rule of that case is that by virtue of the provisions of section 8 of the County Government Act of 1897 (section 4005b, Pol. Code, as quoted above) a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy was available to the petitioner by complaint to the district attorney, and that the petition failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in that it did not show that any information of an alleged wrong had been laid before the district attorney, or that he had failed to perform his statutory duty. In this connection the Supreme Court said:

"To say the least, the interest which a mere taxpayer has in the matter does not entitle him to bring suit in his own name until after the district attorney has refused to perform the duty enjoined upon him."

In Keith v. Hammel, 29 Cal. App. 131, 133, 154 P. 871, 872, in an action in mandamus to compel the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles to pay into the county treasury certain fees which the petition alleged had been illegally retained by the sheriff, the District Court of Appeal of the Second District, following the rule in Burr v. Board of Supervisors, supra, held that the petition failed to state a cause of action, because it was not alleged therein that demand had been made upon the proper county officers to commence and prosecute the proceeding, and that they had refused to do so. In the Keith Case the appellate court referred to section 526a of the Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes a taxpayer's action against public officers to obtain a judgment restraining and preventing certain described illegal expenditures. The court pointed out the proviso in section 526a to the effect that its provisions did not affect any right of action in favor of a county, city, or public officer. It was then said that:

"From the many decisions of the courts of this and other states dealing with this subject, we derive the principle that in the conduct of the ordinary business of a county or city, where the care and protection of the rights of the corporation have been committed to public officers, the primary right goes with the duty belonging to those officers to control the ordinary business of the corporation without the interference of private citizens, even though they be taxpayers."

It was further said that it was not necessary for the court to determine whether the officers of the county were exercising wise discretion by refusing to commence the action, because there was no intimation in the petition that they had refused or neglected to do so. The same may be said as to the amended complaint in the case before us. There is no intimation that the district attorney had refused to institute the action for the recovery of the alleged illegal expenditures, and it is not sufficient to say that a demand upon him would have been unavailing because of interest which he may have had in the second and third alleged causes of action. We are not permitted to assume that because he did not commence a similar action he thereby neglected to perform a duty which the statute imposes upon him as the official legal officer of the county. On the other hand, we are required to presume that he has performed his official duty, until the plaintiff alleges facts to the contrary. For these reasons, the amended complaint fails to state a cause of action, and this defect goes to each of the three alleged causes of action.

[3] In addition to this, the demurrer was properly sustained upon the special ground of misjoinder of actions. Though the main reliance of the defendants is placed upon the specifications in their special demurrer, the plaintiff has been content to argue the general question of the constitutionality of certain statutes and acts of the board of supervisors as arising under the general question of the sufficiency or legality of the claims which are under attack. He has not answered any of the arguments raised by the defendants in their special demurrer; he has failed to file any brief in reply to respondent's brief, and did not appear at the oral argument to support his appeal. For these reasons, we are compelled to make our own assumptions as to what position the plaintiff might take in response to the attack upon his complaint by the special demurrer. The causes which may be united are specified in section 427, Code of Civil Procedure. We assume that it would not be contended that plaintiff's causes of action come under any of the first seven subdivisions of this section, but that they come under the provisions of subdivision 8, which reads:

"Claims arising out of the same transaction, or transactions connected with the same subject of action, are not included within one of the foregoing subdivisions of this section."

[4] Turning to the amended complaint, it appears that the first alleged cause of action relates to the employment of three named individuals as assistants to the board of supervisors in the matter of the equalization and revision of property valuations for the purpose of the assessment and levying of taxes; the second alleged cause of action relates to the employment of a deputy district attorney; the third cause of action relates to the employment of special counsel for a special proceeding pending before the state water commission. No two of the claims involved in the three alleged causes of action arise out of the same transaction, nor are they connected with the same subject-matter of the action. In addition to this, section 427 provides that all the causes of action so united "must affect all the parties to the action." It must be apparent that if the plaintiff had complied with the mandatory provision of section 382, Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that "of the parties to the action, those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants," he would have joined as parties defendant to the first cause of action the three persons whom he names in his complaint as having been illegally employed by the board of supervisors, and would have joined as a party defendant to the second cause of action the person whom he names therein as having been illegally employed as deputy district attorney, and would have joined in the third cause of action the person whom he names therein as having been illegally employed as special counsel to assist the district attorney. If a demurrer had been interposed by the defendants for the nonjoinder of these persons, it must have been sustained under the well-settled rule stated in Rowland v. Horst, 188 Cal. 772, 778, 207 P. 373, 375.

"Necessary parties to an action in the capacity of defendants are those who are interested in resisting the demands of the plaintiff either immediately or consequently and whose rights would be prejudicially affected by the controversy."

Though the demurrer did not raise the ground of nonjoinder of parties defendant, we refer to this fact as illustrating the complete distinction between the three alleged causes of action, and the inapplicability of the code sections authorizing the joinder of several causes of action in the same complaint.

[5] In addition to this, several causes of action are joined in the same complaint and have not been separately stated as required by section 427, Code of Civil Procedure. We have in each of the three counts, or causes of action, a suit for injunction to restrain the payment of claims alleged to be illegal, a suit for an accounting to determine the amount of money which is claimed to have been paid, and a suit to recover on behalf of the county moneys which are alleged to have been illegally expended. Plaintiff's suit for an injunction is one which is properly brought by the taxpayer in his own right within the provisions of section 526a, Code of Civil Procedure. The suit to recover the moneys, alleged to have been illegally expended, is a suit brought by the taxpayer on behalf of the county, the taxpayer standing in the relation of a minor stockholder of a corporation. He does not sue in his own right, so to speak, but sues for the county to recover moneys which he alleges have been illegally diverted from the county funds. This right of action is recognized in the decisions of our Supreme Court, though not specially granted by statute. Osburn v. Stone, 170 Cal. 480, 482, 150 P. 367; Mock v. City of Santa Rosa, 126 Cal. 330, 349, 58 P. 826.

[6] In so far as the complaint seeks an accounting of the moneys paid out on the claims alleged to have been illegally paid, there is a failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it is alleged that these payments were all made by the county treasurer upon warrants approved by the county auditor, and these, being matters of public record, were available to the plaintiff. It would have been an easy matter for him to have examined these records and to have pleaded the amounts claimed to have been illegally paid, rather than to place this burden upon the trial court under the guise of a suit for an accounting.

[7, 8] The appellant insists that, not withstanding the defects in his complaint (and from his failure to defend it we may assume that he concedes that these defects are present), he should have been permitted to amend, and that the trial court abused its discretion in entering judgment for the defendants without giving such leave to the plaintiff. The difficulty confronting the plaintiff on this point is that the record does not disclose that he asked leave to amend, or that permission was denied him by the trial court. The granting of leave to amend after a demurrer is sustained is, of course, a matter resting primarily in the discretion of the trial court. The refusal to grant such permission will not be disturbed upon appeal in the absence of a showing of abuse of that discretion. Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 252, 81 P. 516; Stewart v. Douglass, 148 Cal. 511, 512, 83 P. 699. Where, therefore, the record fails to disclose that leave to amend was requested, and that the application was denied by the trial court, we must assume that no offer of an amendment was made, for otherwise we would be asked to hold that there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in denying something that was never sought until after the appeal was taken. Mullarky v. Young, 9 Cal. App. 686, 690, 100 P. 709; Simons v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 64 Cal. App. 74, 78, 220 P. 425; Whyte v. City of Sacramento, 65 Cal. App. 534, 224 P. 1008.

PEOPLE v. RUSSELL. (Cr. 856.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 6, 1925. Rehearing Denied Aug. 5, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 31, 1925.)

Bastards ⊂⊃17½ — Truth of conflicting testimony concerning fatherhood of child exclusively for jury.

In prosecution for failure to support a minor child, where defendant's evidence, if true, would make it impossible for him to be the father of the child, and if evidence of prosecution be true the reasonable conclusion would be otherwise, the question as to which evidence to believe was exclusively for the jury, and its finding will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. F. Pullen, Judge.

Lowell Russell was convicted of failure to provide for a minor child, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John R. Connelly, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PLUMMER, J. Appellant was tried and convicted of the crime of failing, without lawful excuse, to furnish necessary support for his minor child, and sentenced to serve 180 days in the county jail of the county of Sacramento. Defendant's motion for a new trial being denied, he appeals to this court therefrom and from the judgment of conviction above named. The only question assigned for reversal is that the judgment is contrary to the evidence. It appears from the transcript that during the year 1923 the defendant took the prosecuting witness, Mrs. Russell, then an unmarried woman, out for an automobile ride, and during the course of this automobile ride an act of illicit intercourse took place, which resulted in her pregnancy. During the month of February following the prosecuting witness and the appellant intermarried. The appellant made the defense that he was not the father of the child.

The testimony on the part of the prosecution is to the effect that the automobile ride just mentioned took place some time between the 1st and 16th days of July, 1923; that the child was born the 10th day of May, 1924. The testimony is all to the effect that only one act of sexual intercourse took place prior to the marriage. The prosecuting witness testified particularly as to the occurrences, as to the automobile ride, as to the dates, and as to the fact of the appellant being the father of the child. The prosecution also introduced the testimony of five additional witnesses, who all testified that the appellant had said to them at different times that the child was his. The testimony also shows that the father visited the mother at the hospital a few days after the child was born, that he participated in naming the child, and did some other acts indicating acknowledgment of parentage. On the part of the prosecution there was further additional testimony to the effect that the automobile ride in question was taken in a roadster.

On the part of the defendant and appellant, testimony was introduced to the effect that the illicit act took place on the 19th or 20th day of May, 1923; that the roadster referred to in the testimony of the prosecuting witness was in the town of San Mateo from the 1st to the 23d day of July, 1923; that the ride was taken in a Page roadster on the evening of the 19th or 20th day of May before stated, and that the same Page roadster was not in the city of Sacramento at any time during the month of July, 1923. Witnesses, other than the defendant, testified to circumstances and matters indicating that the act of intercourse did not take place during the period of time claimed by the prosecution; that it took place at the earlier date, and at such an earlier date that the parentage of the child cannot be attributed to the defendant. If the matters testified to by the witnesses for the defendant were absolutely true, then the conclusion should have been drawn therefrom that the defendant was not the father of the child for the nonsupport of which he was being prosecuted. On the other hand, if the facts and circumstances testified to by the mother of the child and the wife of the defendant, and other witnesses introduced on behalf of the prosecution, be true, then, and in that case, the reasonable conclusion would be the defendant is the father of the child. Such being the case, the questions presented to us upon this appeal are matters only within the exclusive province of the jury. It was the province of the jury to determine whether the testimony introduced by the prosecution should be accepted, or whether the testimony introduced on the part of the appellant should be believed and acted upon. The mere fact that the testimony on behalf of a defendant is directly contrary to the testimony introduced on the part of the prosecution does not furnish any grounds upon which this court can order a reversal, and this is true irrespective of whether or not the greater number of witnesses testify on one side or the other, unless the testimony introduced is inherently improbable. The jury having accepted the version given by the mother of the child and of the other witnesses supporting the theory of the prosecution, and such testimony, if believed, being sufficient to support the verdict, there remains nothing further for this court to do except to affirm the order and judgment of the trial court; and it is so ordered.

BERMAN v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 5089.)

1. Master and servant ⟸405(4) — Evidence held to support finding that employee's disability was not due to injury.

Evidence held sufficient to support findings of Industrial Accident Commission that disability of employee, overcome by carbon monoxide gas, was result of disease and not of injury.

2. Master and servant ⟸417(7)—Finding of Industrial Accident Commission on evidence conclusive.

The finding of Industrial Accident Commission in matters of award stands on the same footing as the finding of a judge, or verdict of a jury, and will not be set aside, if there is any substantial evidence upon which it may rest.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Application for certiorari by Harry Berman against the Industrial Accident Commission, the Thomas H. Ince Studios, and the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Company, to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission, refusing compensation for injuries. Order affirmed.

D. B. Maxell, of Venice, Cal., for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. From the petition of the applicant herein for a writ of review it appears that, while acting in the course of his employment, he suffered an injury in that he was overcome by carbon monoxide gas. For a period covering several months after he sustained the injury, petitioner suffered from some sort of illness, and the ultimate question submitted to the respondent Industrial Accident Commission was whether or not such illness was proximately caused by the injury of which petitioner complained.

The findings by the Commission regarding the matter were that:

"The disability from which the employee was found to be suffering after the expiration of seven days from the date of said injury was caused by a disease or condition, and not to any injury or injuries arising out of said employment, nor proximately caused by said employment."

The only question which this court may decide in this proceeding is whether or not there was sufficient evidence to support such finding. Pruitt v. Industrial Accident Commission, 189 Cal. 459, 209 P. 31; Walker v. Industrial Accident Commission, 177 Cal. 737, 171 P. 954, L. R. A. 1918F, 212; Roebling's Sons Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 36 Cal. App. 10, 171 P. 987.

[1] At the hearing before the commission, two doctors expressed the opinion, in substance, that the illness of petitioner was directly traceable to the injury so received by him. In rebuttal thereof, one physician filed his report with the commission to the effect that he saw no relationship between the carbon monoxide poisoning and the major symptoms exhibited by the petitioner. The conclusion reached by a second medical expert was that the gas poisoning to which petitioner had been subjected had little or nothing to do with the illness from which he was suffering at the time the examination was made by said doctor; and from a report to the commission made by a third doctor, who had been appointed by the commission for the express purpose of making a special examination and report on petitioner's condition of health, it appears, that, in his opinion, at the time his report was made there were "no present manifestations of the original injury; * * * no per cent. of disability in relation to the original injury; no disability with reference to work in which the applicant was engaged when injured as far as the original injury was concerned; no permanent disability."

[2] It is therefore clear that the evidence was sufficient to support the findings. As is said in the case of Pruitt v. Industrial Accident Commission, 189 Cal. 459, 466, 209 P. 31, 34:

"The finding of the commission in such matters stands upon the same footing as the finding of a judge, or the verdict of a jury, and is not to be set aside if there is any substantial evidence upon which it can rest"—citing cases.

The award of the commission is affirmed.

It appears from the petition that William Locke Paddon was, on the 5th day of September, 1924, adjudged guilty of contempt of court for having failed and neglected to obey a certain subpœna, issued out of the superior court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, state of California. See William Locke Paddon v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. App. 34, 223 P. 91.

The petition herein further recites that no penalty was imposed for such contempt until the 10th day of July, 1925, when the superior court ordered petitioner to be imprisoned in the county jail for a period of five days. It is here claimed that the judgment of contempt is void on its face, as it does not state or recite the facts constituting the contempt.

The judgment of commitment, however, which is not made a part of the record, contains a full résumé of the facts, and recites that petitioner was adjudged guilty of a contempt of said court committed in its immediate presence on the 21st day of May, 1923, and that the matter was, with the consent of petitioner, duly continued from time to time until the 10th day of July, 1925, for the purpose of sentence, at which time petitioner was ordered imprisoned, by reason of his duly adjudged contempt of court, in the county jail of the city and county of SanFrancisco for a period of five days.

Under these circumstances it cannot be said that the judgment and commitment are void.

The writ is denied.

GAFFNEY et al. v. GRAF et ux. (Civ. 5173.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 16, 1925.)

1. Fraud ⟸13(2)—False statement of fact without knowledge actionable.

Where seller makes a misstatement of fact, not knowing it to be true, to induce sale, and sale is made as result of buyer's reliance on representations, seller is answerable to buyer to same extent as if he had actually known that his representations were false.

2. Appeal and error ⟸766—On appeal on typewritten transcript, adverse judgment on cross-complaint affirmed, where no part of record relating to cross-action appears in brief.

Where appellant appealing on typewritten transcript under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a from adverse judgment on his cross-complaint prints no part of the record pertaining to his cause of action in his brief, the judgment will be affirmed.

3. Fraud ⟸25—Damage essential element.

In an action for fraud in the exchange of automobiles, both parties having misrepresented the facts, where evidence showed that cross-complainant had suffered no damage by reason of the misrepresentations, no recovery could be had, since an essential element in an action for fraud is the occurrence of both fraud and damage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by J. Wyman Gaffney and others, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Gaffney Motor Sales Company, against F. C. Graf and wife, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment denying recovery to either party, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. C. Jensen, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Dave F. Smith, Walter T. Casey, and Andreani & Haines, by M. L. Haines and Martin L. Haines, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued the defendants for damages for fraud growing out of the exchange of two automobiles. The defendants' cross-complaint against the appellants also charges fraud in the same transaction. The trial court found that both parties were guilty of concealment of facts material to the exchange, and denied recovery to both. The defendants appealed from that part of the judgment "wherein and whereby it is and was decreed that defendants and cross-complainants take nothing in said action." The appeal is based upon a record prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The facts of the case are that on May 27, 1921, the plaintiffs sold a new Owen Magnetic automobile to defendants for the sum of $7,750, which was covered by a payment of $4,000 in cash and the delivery of a secondhand Daniels automobile, which was taken in the transaction at a valuation of $3,750. This Daniels car was represented to the plaintiffs as being a 1920 model, whereas in truth and fact it was a 1919 model. The allegations of the complaint are that if the Daniels car had been as represented it would have been of the value of $3,750, but that being a 1919 model it was not worth more than the sum of $1,750. The plaintiffs were automobile dealers, and soon after the delivery to them of the Daniels car they made a sale of it, but the purchaser thereof returned the car to the plaintiffs soon thereafter when he discovered that it was a 1919 model. The plaintiffs canceled their sale with this customer, and thereafter sold it as a 1919 model for the sum of $1,500, which it was shown was a fair value for the car at that time.

The fraud on which the defendants relied in their cross-complaint was the concealment on the part of plaintiffs' agent of the fact that the Owen Magnetic car was manufactured by a factory which was at that time in the hands of a receiver The defendant F. C. Graf testified that if he had known that fact he would not have accepted the Owen Magnetic car in the trade. However, it appears from his own testimony, and this is not disputed in any way, that he used the car for a period of five or six months after he had learned that the parent company was in the hands of a receiver, and that he then traded this car with $500 in cash for a second Owen Magnetic car manufactured by the same company, which was still in the hands of a receiver, and which was taken in at a valuation of $9,300. It also appears from his testimony that, while he was using the car the plaintiffs traded to him, he expended about $700 in alterations and repairs. Allowing this in the second trade, it appears that in addition to six months' use of the car which the plaintiffs traded to them, the defendants made a clear cash profit when they traded for a second car of the same make.

On this appeal the appellants frankly concede that they told respondents that the car was a 1920 model, and that in truth and in fact it was a 1919 model. They also concede the well-settled proposition that, when parties are in pari delicto, neither one should recover as against the other, and that this rule is not modified or altered by reason of the fact that one party sustained more damage than the other. The sole ground of appeal urged by the appellants is that the facts do not justify the finding of the trial court that the allegations of fraud and false misrepresentations made in the complaint were true. They insist that it was incumbent upon the respondents to show that the appellants knew that the statements were false, or that they made the statements with reckless disregard as to the truth or falsity of them, and that they made them with intent to deceive. The plain answer to the appellants is that they had every opportunity to know the truth of the matter contained in their representations as to the model of the car, and that they knew that the year of the car was an inducing feature to the sale.

[1] When a party makes a positive statement of a fact which he does not know to be true, but which he intends to influence the purchaser to a sale, and these representations are relied upon by the purchaser, and the sale is thereby effected, the party is answerable to the purchaser to the same extent as if he had actually known that his representations were false. In other words, a person may not take it upon himself to state as a fact that of which he is wholly ignorant, and escape legal responsibility such as would follow if he had known the falsity of the representations.

Here it is conceded that the representations as to the model of the car were made by the appellants and that they were false. The proof is without dispute that the appellants either knew them to be untrue or had every opportunity to know the true facts, and thus that they were recklessly made. The essential elements are present in the proof—that the representations were made for the purpose of inducing the respondents to make the change, and that the respondents relied upon them and were induced to make the exchange thereby to their injury.

[2] In addition to this, as this appeal is taken from that portion of the judgment which decreed that the cross-complainants should take nothing, all the issues in the cross-complaint must be open to us for review. The appellants have wholly failed to comply with the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, in that no portion of the record relating to the cause of action appearing in their cross-complaint has been printed in the brief. The only attempt which the appellants have made to comply with the provisions of that section is the printing of a portion of the testimony of one of the defendants which related to the matter of the purchase and registration of the Daniels car, and was confined to the cause of action raised by the original complaint. As the record presented by the appellants does not meet the demands of the statute, the judgment should be affirmed under the rule of Estate of Berry (Cal. Sup.) 233 P. 330.

[3] But an examination of the typewritten transcript discloses a state of facts under which any recovery by the appellants on their cross-complaint must be denied. It is axiomatic that deceit or misrepresentation without damage does not give a cause of action; that the essential element of an action of deceit or fraud is the concurrence of both fraud and damage. It has been put in another way, that neither fraud without damage or damage without fraud is sufficient to support an action. 12 R. C. L. § 10. The evidence in the typewritten transcript shows without dispute that the misrepresentations or fraud upon which the appellants relied in their cross-complaint was without damage to them because they lost nothing by it. It was their claim that the concealment by the respondents of the fact that the parent company of the Owen Magnetic car was in the hands of a receiver was the concealment of a fact which, if it had been known to them, would have impelled them to refuse to accept the car. Notwithstanding this, however, and long after they learned that the company was in the hands of a receiver, they continued to operate the car and traded it in for another car of the same make, and at a time when the parent company was still in the hands of a receiver. In this trade they made a clear cash profit over the amount allowed in the trade with the respondents, and in addition to this had used the car for their own purposes for a period of five or six months. This evidence has been pointed out to us by the respondents as conclusively showing the failure of the appellants to make proof of the essential elements of their cross-complaint, and the appellants have failed to make any reply thereto. We have not found any evidence in conflict with what has been referred to, and, upon the record, it necessarily follows that the appellants failed to sustain by proof the essential allegations of their cross-complaint, and for this reason they were not entitled to recover.

The portion of the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

INTERNATIONAL INDEMNITY CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5027.)

1. Master and servant ⊂⊃417(7)—Finding contributions by deceased reasonable rental for home held conclusive.

In an application for certiorari to review an award of Industrial Accident Commission, where deceased had contributed $50 monthly toward paying a mortgage on the home of his mother, and nothing in the record shows the contrary, court will hold this amount to be a reasonable rental for premises occupied, as found by the Commission.

2. Master and servant ⊂⊃388—Reasonable contribution for support of family may be used to acquire home.

A reasonable amount, used out of contributions for support of family for the purpose of acquiring home, is within the intent and purpose of the Workmen's Compensation Act, particularly section 69 thereof.

3. Master and servant ⊂⊃388—Award for death of workman making contributions to pay mortgage on parent's home held proper.

An award made by Industrial Accident Commission for death of boy who had contributed $50 monthly to support of mother and minor brothers and sisters, the $50 being used to pay mortgage on home of mother, held proper, on theory that the $50 monthly was a contribution for support of family.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Application for writ of certiorari by the International Indemnity Company against the Industrial Accident Commission, Sarah E. Foster, and Fred Foster and others, minors, by their guardian ad litem, Sarah E. Foster, to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation for death of Terry D. Foster. Award affirmed.

Clarence B. Runkle, Joe Crider, Jr., and W. I. Gilbert, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. This matter comes before the court upon a writ of certiorari, the petitioner asking that an award of the Industrial Accident Commission of California be reviewed by this court.

It appears from the record that Terry D. Foster, an unmarried man, met his death while in the course of his employment with the Reliance Oil Company at Huntington Beach, Cal. The deceased left surviving him a mother and father and also four brothers and sisters, who were minors. At the time of Foster's death, and for some time prior thereto, he was residing with his mother, father, and family, although he was absent from home temporarily in his employment. The home located at Los Alamos stood in the name of the mother, and was subject to a $2,000 mortgage, which was made payable in monthly instalments of $50 each. At the time of the accident, and for several months prior thereto, the deceased had been working at Huntington Beach, and had been monthly sending $50 to his mother at Los Alamos. The father of the deceased was working in the oil fields near Norwalk, and was sending to his wife on an average of $3.62½ a day. The wife and mother maintained the home for the four minor children, who were attending school, and the money which she received from both her son and husband was placed in a common fund upon which the mother drew for the funds necessary to pay the $50 monthly on the mortgage, and also to provide food, clothing, and maintenance for herself and the four minor children.

The Industrial Accident Commission made the following finding and award in favor of the mother of the deceased and her four minor children:

"Said employee left surviving him Sarah E. Foster, Fred Foster, Bernice Foster, James Foster, and Ruth Foster, his mother, minor brother, minor sister, minor brother, and minor sister respectively, who were partially dependent upon him for support. The annual contribution for their support was $700, this amount being based upon payments of $50 a month and the additional sum of $100 a year. Said sum of $50 a month was paid by the deceased to the dependents to be applied upon the payment of installments due upon a mortgage on the real property which constituted the home of said applicants, said payment being in fact and ultimate effect for the purpose of meeting current expense equivalent to rent, and necessary to be paid to provide said dependents with a house in which to live. The payment of $100 a year was devoted to the purchase of clothing for said dependents. The death benefit to which said dependents are entitled is $2,100, payable in weekly installments of $20.83. Claimants are also entitled to an award for $100 for burial expenses, payable to Angus McCauley. Said weekly payments are based upon wages in excess of the maximum. Amount accrued to October 4, 1924 (thirteen weeks) is $270.79, on account of which nothing has been paid."

The petitioner herein attacks the award of the Industrial Accident Commission on the ground that the finding of the Commission is to the effect that the $50 per month contributed by the deceased prior to his death was used for the payment of the monthly instalments due on the mortgage, which, in effect, is a finding that these monthly payments were not contributed for the maintenance and support of the mother and minor children, but rather for an investment in the home. It appears that the Commission in making the findings and award did so upon the theory that the $50 per month contributed by the deceased and used toward the payment of the mortgage was, in effect, the equivalent of the payment of rent, and if these payments on account of the mortgage had not been made, that the mortgage presumably would have been foreclosed, and the mother and minor children ejected from the home, and thus would have been without shelter. The petitioner concedes that it would have been well within the power of the Commission to have made a finding and award for rental, or as the equivalent of rental, but that the finding that the entire sum of $50 per month was the equivalent of rental is not supported by the evidence in the case, and, furthermore, that such a sum for rental, compared with the entire sum contributed for the maintenance of the mother and minor children, was out of proportion.

[1] There is nothing in the record to show that the reasonable rental value of the premises occupied by the dependents was less than $50 per month; nor is there any evidence to support petitioner's contention that a dwelling place was obtainable at a less sum than $50 per month that would have met with the needs and income of the family. Hence this court is not in a position to hold that the $50 per month, as found by the Commission, was not a reasonable amount to be allowed in lieu of rental for the family; and upon the further ground that where there is any evidence that will support the finding of fact made by the trial body or court, this court will not disturb such finding.

But even were we to assume for the sake of argument that the Commission was not justified in finding that the entire sum of $50 per month was the equivalent of rental, there is both reason and authority for the contention urged by the respondent that, even though a portion of the $50 payments was in fact used or operated as a fund for the acquisition of a home, nevertheless such payments would be regarded as well within the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831).

In the case of Milwaukee Basket Co. v. Wiecki, reported in 173 Wis. 391, 181 N. W. at page 308, the court, considering the question as to whether or not payments made for the purchase of a home occupied by the alleged dependents should be treated as part of the necessary support of the family, said:

"Under present day conditions there cannot be any question but that payments, to a reasonable extent at least, for the purpose of maintaining the roof which shelters the family, either in the shape of rent if it be not their own, or interest upon existing indebtedness on such home if it be theirs, and for repairs, insurance, or such like items, should be considered a part of the necessary support of the family within the meaning of the statute."

Again, in the case of Pushor v. American Ry. Express Co., 149 Minn. 308, 183 N. W. page 839, the court had under review a judgment arising out of the Workmen's Compensation Act of Minnesota. It appears in that case that the deceased, an unmarried son, was contributing his weekly wages of $20 to the family fund. This fund was used to maintain the family, and, in addition, to make payments on account of a home purchased by the young man's father. The opinion, reversing the lower court in finding against the claimant, says:

"A year before the boy's death the parents had purchased the house where the family lived. During the year $900, taken from the common earnings of the family, had been paid on the purchase price. The remainder of the earnings was used to support the family. It was held that the boy's parents were partially dependent for their support upon the earnings of their son, and that compensation should be fixed on the basis of the difference between the amount he earned and the amount necessarily taken from the general family purse for his individual care and support. With respect to the payments for the house, the court remarked that they should be considered as part of the necessary support of the family sheltered under its roof and as the equivalent of rent, which, under present day conditions, is so large an item in the household budget."

In the case of In re McMahon, 229 Mass. 48, 118 N. E. 190, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held that the sum of $288.87, saved by the deceased and contributed by him toward the payment of costs of certain alterations on the family home, was a contribution to the support of the dependents. That a reasonable amount contributed to the payment for a home occupied by the family is a contribution toward the support of the dependents is held in Atwood v. Connecticut Light & Power Co., 95 Conn. 669, 112 A. 269. To the same effect is the rule recognized in Day v. Sioux Falls Fruit Co., 43 S. D. 65, 177 N. W. 816.

[2] We believe that a reasonable amount used out of the contributions made for the support of the family for acquiring a home or permanent place of abode for the dependents is well within the purpose and intent of the Workmen's Compensation Act of California. A home that implies the elements of permanency, where the children of the family may gather at the fireside, and out of which as a rule emanates certain elements of pride and sacrifice, is quite as important in the general welfare and raising of children as many other elements which are regarded as essential to the maintenance of the family in addition to mere clothing and food. That the Legislature intended the act in question to be interpreted as including more than mere food and raiment is apparent when we read section 69 of the act:

"Whenever this act, or any part or section thereof, is interpreted by a court, it shall be liberally construed by such court with the purpose of extending the benefits of the act for the protection of persons injured in the course of their employment."

[3] For the foregoing reasons, and upon the considerations set forth, we are of the opinion that the monthly sum of $50 contributed by the deceased to his mother was properly held by the Commission as a contribution for the support of the dependent family. The petition for writ of certiorari is therefore dismissed, and the finding and award of the Commission is approved.

I concur: CURTIS, J.

CONREY, P. J. (concurring). I am not prepared to agree that payments of the character here in question would be a sufficient basis for compensation beyond the point where the amounts of the payments made to be applied on the mortgage were the reasonable equivalent of rental of the premises. But under the findings, which I think are justified by the evidence, it may fairly be inferred that the payments which were applied on account of the mortgage indebtedness were nothing more than a substitute for rental, which otherwise would have been paid for leased premises occupied by the family.

Subject only to this reservation of opinion on the point stated, I concur in the decision.

DIMITY v. DIXON et al. (Civ. 5218.)

Appeal and error ⊂=792—Supreme Court without jurisdiction to entertain appeal not taken within prescribed time.

Where appeal is not taken within time prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 939, nor extension of time given, appellate court is without jurisdiction to entertain it whether respondents raise point or not, since provisions of statute are jurisdictional and mandatory, and it is duty of court to dismiss appeal on its own motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Erwin W. Owen, Judge.

Action by Ethel M. Dimity, as administratrix of the estate of O. G. Dixon, deceased, against A. H. Dixon and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Alfred Siemon, of Bakersfield, and L. E. Nathan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Claflin & Lambert and W. A. McGinn, all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. On February 13, 1923, plaintiff commenced this action to procure an accounting of the affairs of the partnership which she alleged had been formed by her former husband, O. G. Dixon, his father, F. S. Dixon, and his brother, A. H. Dixon, some time in the year 1908 for the conduct of an undertaking business in the city of Bakersfield. The plaintiff also sought to impress upon certain real property a trust which she alleged arose from the purchase of such property with funds of the alleged partnership. The complaint alleged that her husband, O. G. Dixon, died on October 6, 1914, and that his father, F. S. Dixon, died some time after February 10, 1920. Jessie C. Dixon was joined as a defendant on the theory that she was a purchaser of a portion of the property without consideration and with full knowledge of the alleged trust. Answers were filed, and the cause went to trial before the court, sitting without a jury, on November 7, 1923. At the close of plaintiff's case defendants A. H. and Hannah Dixon moved for a nonsuit, in which motion the defendant Jessie C. Dixon joined. The motion was granted, and on November 9, 1923, judgment of dismissal as to A. H. and Hannah Dixon was duly entered therein and recorded on November 10, 1924. On January 28, 1924, a paper entitled "Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law" was filed, which concluded with a judgment of nonsuit in favor of Jessie C. Dixon. On February 13, 1924, the plaintiff filed her notice of appeal from the judgment, the notice specifying the judgment "dated November 10, 1923," and "entered November 10, 1923." The appeal was taken under what is usually termed the old method, and the record is presented upon a bill of exceptions which was settled on May 8, 1924. It does not appear from the record that any motion for a new trial was pending, that a motion for a new trial had been made, or that any similar motion was pending between the period of the entry of the judgment and the filing of the notice of appeal.

Under the provisions of section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, an appeal from any judgment may be taken within 60 days from the entry thereof. By the terms of the same section this time may be extended if a motion for a new trial is pending. The provisions of this section are jurisdictional and mandatory. "If an appeal is not taken within the time limited by the statute, the appellate court is without jurisdiction to entertain it." 2 Cal. Jur. § 165. As this objection goes to the jurisdiction of the appellate court to entertain the appeal, it is not waived by the failure of the respondents to raise it. On the other hand, it is the duty of the appellate court to notice the defect and to dismiss the appeal on its own motion. Id.

On the record before us it appears that the appeal was taken more than 60 days after the entry of the judgment appealed from, and that none of the circumstances is present which the statute specifies as working an extension of the time given. This applies to the judgment in favor of A. H. and Hannah Dixon. As to the judgment in favor of Jessie C. Dixon, it appears that no appeal was taken. But anticipating that the appellant might insist that she intended to appeal from the judgment of January 28th as well, we have examined the entire record, and find that she wholly failed to sustain her burden of proof as to Jessie C. Dixon, as there is no showing that she was not an innocent purchaser for value.

The appeal is therefore dismissed.

73 Cal. App. 495

PEOPLE v. CARTER et al. (Cr. 1189.)

1. Larceny ⟸66, 68(2)—Evidence held sufficient to convict of attempted larceny, question of intent being for jury.

In prosecution for attempted grand larceny of car, evidence of defendant's conduct in fleeing from car on owner's approach, and contradictory statements concerning his connection with offense, held sufficient basis for conviction, notwithstanding defendant's positive statement that he had no intention of stealing car, question of intent being for jury.

2. Larceny ⟸68(1)—Question of voluntary abandonment of attempted crime for jury.

In prosecution for attempted grand larceny, where defendant left car which he was attempting to start on seeing approach of two men, the question of whether there was a "voluntary abandonment" of the crime not prompted by an outside cause, so as to prevent completion of the offense charged, was for the jury.

3. Criminal law ⟸44—Abandonment of attempted crime no defense, where there is intent coupled with an overt act under the Code.

Where there is intent to commit a crime, coupled with an overt act, the abandonment of the criminal purpose is no defense to charge of attempt to commit the crime, in view of Penal Code, § 664.

4. Larceny ⟸66—Jury justified in finding an overt act in attempted larceny of car.

In a prosecution for attempted grand larceny, the jury was justified in finding overt act constituting more than mere preparation for the crime, where they could have found that defendant's attempt to steal the car failed because of inability to start it or fear of arrest by approaching men.

5. Larceny ⟸68(2)—Existence of criminal intent is for the jury, and finding is conclusive.

Existence of a criminal intent in a prosecution for attempted grand larceny is a question of fact to be determined by the jury from all the circumstances of the case, and its finding is conclusive.

6. Criminal law ⟸427(4)—The relation of defendants jointly indicted is relevant to issue of conspiracy to commit crime.

In a joint indictment of two defendants, where claim is conspiracy to commit grand larceny, evidence of relation of the defendants is relevant as tending to prove conspiracy, and defendant's objection to evidence, impeaching his testimony denying acquaintance with codefendant as being of a collateral issue, was properly overruled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Willis E. Carter and Ernest G. Booth were convicted of attempted grand larceny, with a prior conviction of felony and defendant Carter appeals. Affirmed.

Shapiro & Shapiro and Marshall A. Stutsman, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Hamish B. Eddie, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. In the information, the defendants were charged jointly with the commission of the crime of attempting to commit grand larceny, with a prior conviction of a felony.

Defendant Carter appeals from a judgment of conviction and from an order of the court denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant contends that the judgment is contrary to law, and that the verdict of the jury is not supported by the evidence.

From the record on appeal, it appears that the jury was justified in believing the followings facts to be true: A man named Shrader, who was the owner of an automobile, parked it near the curb on the street directly opposite a building in which his office was located, and from which place he saw defendant Carter seated in Shrader's automobile, manipulating the levers thereof. At the same time, Shrader could hear the "starter gears working in the car." After watching Carter for several minutes, Shrader and a man named James started across the street in the direction of the automobile, and when they arrived near the center of the street "Carter got out of the car and started to walk down the street." By the time Shrader reached his automobile, Carter and his codefendant Booth, who had been standing near Shrader's automobile while Carter was seated therein, were perhaps 25 feet away from Shrader, who "motioned" to them and called out "Wait a moment," or that he would like to speak to them. Instead of stopping or walking back to where Shrader, James, and a uniformed policeman, who had also arrived on the scene, were standing, the two defendants ran down an alley until it intersected with a street; thence along that street until they came to an open garage fronting on the street, on the inside of which garage defendant Booth stopped and was arrested by the policeman.

The keeper of the garage testified:

"He (Carter) ran into my place of business and I ran after him and told him to stop, if he didn't stop I would shoot; I took out my revolver and told him if he didn't stop I would shoot. He didn't stop, so I shot in the air, and that didn't stop him; so then I went after him. He went in my place of business, in the garage, between Hope and Grand, down through the alley, through the store onto Pico street, around on Pico street to Grand avenue, down on Grand avenue again to the alley, through the alley, and run into the police officer's arms."

In the course of Carter's flight, as he rounded a corner, he met Shrader, who attempted to stop him. As Carter was running he was calling out "Stop thief!" When Shrader took hold of Carter's arm, Carter struck Shrader, from whom he escaped and continued to run until, as he turned another corner in the street or alley, he met the same officer who had arrested defendant Booth, whom he had in custody, but which officer immediately arrested defendant Carter. A day or two after the occurrence just narrated, Carter made a statement to the effect that he was not at the wheel of the automobile, but that it was another man, who was an ex-convict, who was seated in the automobile at the time in question. He also said that he and Booth "were walking south on Grand avenue about Tenth street, and that they had followed this party south on Grand where the man got into the Packard car" (the car belonging to Shrader); that he (Carter) was standing about 10 feet from this car; that Booth was standing still farther away, and that they "saw the man (Shrader) coming across the street, and they proceeded away from there"; that the reason why they had left the vicinity was that "they had been in trouble, and they didn't want to get caught around there with—when possibly an automobile was being stolen—get into more trouble again." The statement thus made by Carter was in most respects inconsistent with testimony which he gave on the trial of the case.

It also may be said that defendant Carter and his witnesses gave a plausible explanation of his conduct, which was consistent with his innocence, on the occasion to which reference has been had.

[1] Carter testified in effect that he had no intention of stealing Shrader's automobile, and his counsel here contend that the facts are insufficient to authorize a jury to find against his positive statement in that regard. But the question of intent is one that must be solved by the jury. The facts (as shown by the evidence) that defendant was seated in the automobile, manipulating the levers thereof; that the starting motor was running; that he got out of the automobile and walked away when Shrader and James approached him; that when "motioned" to and called upon to "Wait a moment," as Shrader wished to speak to him, after he and James were joined by a uniformed policeman, he did not stop; that he so persistently ran away, even when called upon to stop, or that the man who was following him would shoot; that he failed to stop even after a shot was fired; that he ran, not in a direct line, but in a devious course, along and upon different alleys, streets, and through storerooms, in a manner evidently well calculated to elude and evade his pursuers; that as he ran he shouted "Stop, thief!" that in his efforts to avoid arrest he struck at least one man in the face with sufficient force and violence to break the cartilage of his nose; that thereafter he continued to try to make his escape until intercepted and arrested by a police officer; and that he made inconsistent and contradictory statements regarding his connection with the affair—argue, if not conclusively, at least presumably, that he was guilty of the offense of attempting to commit grand larceny, as charged in the information.

[2] Appellant urges the point that:

"If an attempt to commit a crime be voluntarily abandoned before the act is put in process of final execution, there being no outside cause prompting such abandonment, then this is a complete defense."

The assumption that there was a "voluntary abandonment" and that there was "no outside cause prompting such abandonment" was apparently not shown by the evidence to the satisfaction of the jury. The jury may have concluded that the "outside cause prompting the abandonment" was that defendant saw Shrader and James approaching the automobile which defendant was endeavoring to start, and surmised that one of them was the owner of the automobile; or, the jury may have been convinced from the evidence that Carter had attempted to steal the automobile, but had failed to do so, because he was unable to start it.

[3] There can be no doubt that mere intent by a single individual to commit a crime is not sufficient to amount to a criminal act. However, it is also unquestionable that after the intent has been formed, and such intent has been coupled with an overt act toward the commission of the contemplated offense, the abandonment of the criminal purpose will not constitute a defense to a charge of attempting to commit a crime.

In the case of People v. Oates, 142 Cal. 12, 75 P. 337, it is ruled that in a proper case the giving by the trial court of an instruction that "a person who attempts to commit a crime, but fails, or is prevented or intercepted in the perpetration thereof, is punishable for said attempt," was not error, as the instruction was substantially in the language of section 664 of the Penal Code.

As is said in the case of People v. Stewart, 97 Cal. 238, 32 P. 8:

"The fact that he [defendant] abandoned his wicked purpose upon the approach of other parties has not the slightest tendency to purge him of the legal consequences of his criminal conduct. If an assault with the intent here alleged is made, it is no less a crime, though the aggressor should abandon his intentions before the consummation of the act, by reason of the pains of a stricken conscience alone."

To the same effect see People v. Johnson, 131 Cal. 511, 63 P. 842; People v. Dong Pok Yip, 164 Cal. 143, 127 P. 1031; People v. Bowman, 6 Cal. App. 749, 93 P. 198.

[4] It is also contended by appellant that no overt act was shown on the part of defendant. The authorities appear to be harmonious to the effect that mere preparation, however elaborate the acts in connection therewith may be, will not suffice to support an accusation of the commission of an overt act as an essential element in an attempt to commit a crime. Something must be done in addition to the mere laying of the plans or the devising of the means by which it is hoped that the criminal offense may be committed. In the leading case of People v. Stites, 75 Cal. 570, 17 P. 693, where the defendant had conspired with a confederate to place a bomb on the track of a street railroad, it appeared that after constructing the bomb he placed it in his pocket and left his home with the intention of meeting his confederate with the ultimate purpose of carrying out the preconceived scheme to wreck one of the cars belonging to the street railroad company. It was there held that, notwithstanding the fact that each step taken by the defendant carried him just that much farther away from the spot which had been selected for the placing of the bomb, nevertheless it constituted an act which would have ended in the consummation of the criminal offense had there been no intervention of circumstances independent of the will of the defendant. To the same effect in principle are the cases of In re Magidson, 32 Cal. App. 566, 163 P. 689; People v. Paluma, 18 Cal. App. 131, 122 P. 431; People v. Petros, 25 Cal. App. 236, 143 P. 246; People v. Mann, 113 Cal. 76, 45 P. 182; People v. Heinrich, 65 Cal. App. 510, 224 P. 466.

In the instant case the jury was justified in believing from the evidence either that an attempt on the part of defendant to steal the automobile had failed because of his inability to start it, or that he had taken fright and abandoned his criminal purpose for the reason that he feared detection and arrest by Shrader and James, whom he saw approaching the automobile as he was manipulating its levers. If, in the nighttime, a man had attempted to pry open a window in a house not belonging to him, and while so engaged had seen two citizens and a policeman approaching him, and thereupon had left the house, and on being called upon to "wait a moment," instead of complying with such request had run away, and thereafter conducted himself as did the defendant on the occasion here in question, no one could doubt the intention of the man who was trying to break into the house.

[5] The decision of the question of the criminal intent, necessary to be attributed to defendant in order that he should be lawfully declared guilty of an attempt to commit grand larceny, rested wholly with the jury. It was one of the component parts necessary to the commission of the offense with which defendant was charged. What defendant's intention was could not be mathematically demonstrated. It was a question of fact to be proven just like any other fact in the case—by the acts and the admissions of the defendant and by other circumstances. If, from such evidence, the jury was satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant intended to steal the automobile, so far as the conclusion reached by the jury in that regard is concerned, it is final and conclusive (People v. Barker, 137 Cal. 557, 70 P. 617; People v. Johnson, 131 Cal. 511, 63 P. 842); and in the case at bar such decision was not only warranted and justified by the testimony of the witnesses and the physical facts presented, but, manifestly, it is the only logical conclusion that could have been deduced from the evidence.

[6] Defendant was a witness in his own behalf. On cross-examination he was asked for how long a time he had known his codefendant Booth. He replied in substance that he was unacquainted with him and knew him only by sight. In rebuttal thereof, over defendant's objection, the prosecution showed that, after defendant Carter was arrested, certain letters and papers purporting to be the property of Booth, together with three photographs of Booth, were found in Carter's room. Appellant contends that the action of the court in overruling defendant's objection, and in admitting such evidence, was prejudicial error. It is suggested that whether or not defendant was acquainted with Booth was collateral to the issue; and the principle that there can be no impeachment on such matters is invoked. It should be remembered, however, that by the information defendant Carter was charged jointly with defendant Booth. The prosecution claimed that a conspiracy to commit grand larceny existed between the two defendants.

In the case of People v. Childs, 127 Cal. 363, 59 P. 768, where the defendant Childs was charged jointly with a man by the name of Piggott, the question here presented by appellant was ruled on as follows:

"The court did not err in permitting the prosecution to show that Childs and Piggott had been frequently seen together on occasions other than the one at which the larceny is alleged to have been committed. The evidence tended to show that Childs committed the larceny by aiding and abetting Piggott in taking the stolen property from the person of the complaining witness. It was necessary therefore for the prosecution to show that the defendants were coconspirators in the commission of the crime; and it cannot be said that the fact of their being seen frequently together was entirely irrelevant, and did not tend in any degree whatever to establish the conspiracy."

And so it may be said in this case that the fact that defendant Carter was not only acquainted with defendant Booth, but that they were on terms of intimate friendship was a relevant circumstance in the case tending to prove that a conspiracy existed between them for the purpose of stealing the automobile referred to in the evidence.

In the case of People v. Tiley, 84 Cal. 651, 24 P. 290, which, as to the point raised by appellant, is to the effect that "a party cannot cross-examine his adversary's witness upon irrelevant or collateral matters for the purpose of eliciting something to contradict or impeach him"—is clearly distinguishable in its facts from those presented in the case at bar, in that in the Tiley Case the person regarding whom the defendant was asked as to his acquaintance was a wholly disinterested person and apparently connected with the action only as a witness; while in the instant inquiry, as heretofore mentioned, the individual as to whom the attention of defendant was directed by the question was a codefendant with the defendant on trial, and the question was asked for the purpose of tending to establish that a conspiracy existed between the two defendants.

We perceive no error in the record. The judgment and the order, denying the motion for new trial, are affirmed.

KRUGER v. VERNON et al. (Civ. 3991.)

1. Chattel mortgages ⊂=278—Evidence held not to show conversion by mortgagee of mortgaged property.

In suit to foreclose chattel mortgage covering diamond ring which mortgagor had delivered to broker, who had negotiated mortgage, and who had taken care of its assignment to plaintiff, evidence held not to show broker was authorized by plaintiff to hold ring for her, so as to authorize recovery by mortgagor on cross-complaint for conversion of the ring.

2. Principal and agent ⊂=123(1)—Broker held not ostensibly general agent of assignee of chattel mortgage, under evidence.

In suit to foreclose chattel mortgage covering diamond ring which mortgagor had delivered to broker, who had negotiated mortgage, and who had taken care of its assignment to plaintiff, broker held not ostensibly plaintiff's general agent authorized to represent her in all matters pertaining to her investments, under evidence, within meaning of Civ. Code, §§ 2315, 2317.

3. Principal and agent ⊂=137(1)—Assignee of chattel mortgage not estopped to deny that she authorized broker to hold security for her.

In foreclosure suit by assignee of chattel mortgage covering diamond ring, plaintiff held not estopped to deny that broker was authorized to hold ring for her as her agent, merely because he had secured assignment of mortgage to her.

4. Chattel mortgages ⊂=237—Tender of payment of debt secured by mortgage not sufficient, where accompanied by condition wrongfully imposed.

Where mortgagor of chattels had delivered property, in violation of mortgage, to broker, who had acted as agent for mortgagee and assignee of mortgage, tender of payment of amount due on condition that property be returned held not effective tender, in absence of right of mortgagor to impose such a condition.

5. Appeal and error ⊂=1048(6)—Cross-examination of owner of mortgage as to whether broker, who absconded with security, had not been her general agent, not prejudicial error.

In foreclosure suit by assignee of chattel mortgage covering diamond ring, which had been delivered by mortgagor to broker negotiating assignment of mortgage for plaintiff, and converted by him on absconding, exclusion of cross-examination of plaintiff as to whether broker had not absconded with her securities, papers, and documents, being an attempt to show that he was her general agent in all matters, held not prejudicial error, where witness elsewhere testified that broker did not have charge of her papers or safe deposit box.

6. Appeal and error ⊂=1058(1)—Exclusion of hearsay evidence admissible for purpose otherwise proved not prejudicial.

In foreclosure by assignee of chattel mortgage covering diamond ring, which had been taken by broker, who acted as mortgagee's agent, and also as agent for assignee of mortgage, on absconding after delivery of ring to him by mortgagor, exclusion of testimony of mortgagee as to what broker had told her concerning possession of ring held not prejudicial, where his possession was proved by other and uncontradicted evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by L. M. Mann against Geo. T. Vernon and others to foreclose a chattel mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants Vernon appeal. On death of plaintiff after appeal. Fannie Kruger, administratrix, was substituted for deceased. Affirmed.

L. E. Dadmun, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

W. S. Staley, of San Diego, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to foreclose a chattel mortgage given to secure a promissory note for the principal sum of $150. The appeal is by the defendants George T. and Zoe Vernon. The action was begun by Lillian M. Mann, who departed this life subsequently to the appeal, but prior to the submission of the case here. The administratrix of her estate has been substituted in this court. Because it will conduce to brevity, we shall refer to the decedent, throughout this opinion, either as the "plaintiff" or as the "respondent," notwithstanding her death and the substitution of her personal representative.

On January 10, 1917, at San Diego, the defendant Anna Archer loaned the Vernons the sum of $150 and took from the latter their promissory note for that amount payable to her order three months after date. To secure payment of the note, and contemporaneously with its execution, the Vernons executed a chattel mortgage to Mrs. Archer. The property mortgaged consisted of a piano, certain household furniture, a watch, and a diamond ring. The mortgage expressly declares that all of the mortgaged property is "located and contained in and about the premises at No. 3536 Grim street, San Diego, Cal.," and that "the same is to remain at aforesaid address and not to be removed without the consent of the mortgagee herein."

On March 11, 1919, the mortgagee, for the consideration of $150 paid to her by plaintiff, executed to the latter a written assignment of the note and mortgage. Thereafter plaintiff brought this action. The Vernons filed an answer and likewise a cross-complaint. In the latter pleading the cross-complainants allege that the diamond ring mentioned in the chattel mortgage had been delivered to and is now in the possession of plaintiff; that its reasonable value is $700; that on November 29, 1920, they tendered to plaintiff an amount equal to the principal of the note and the accrued interest thereon, and offered to pay the same, provided plaintiff would cancel the note, satisfy the mortgage, and deliver the diamond ring to them; that plaintiff refused to do any of these things; and that by reason of such refusal plaintiff has wrongfully converted the ring to her own use. Wherefore they pray damages against plaintiff in the sum of $700, and that the latter do not recover on the note or mortgage.

In her answer to the cross-complaint plaintiff denied that the diamond ring was ever delivered to her, and denied all knowledge of the ring, save such as may be afforded by the mortgage itself. The court found that the ring never was delivered to plaintiff and that she never had possession of it; also that the Vernons never tendered to plaintiff the amount due on their promissory note or any part thereof. As conclusions of law from its findings of fact, the trial court found that plaintiff did not convert the ring to her own use; that the Vernons have not been damaged in the sum of $700 or in any amount whatever; that plaintiff is entitled to recover from the Vernons the principal of the note, with interest thereon from September 10, 1919, and to have the mortgage foreclosed; and that the action should be dismissed as to the defendant Anna Archer. Judgment was entered accordingly, and, as we have said, the appeal therefrom is taken by the Vernons.

Appellants present several points. The contention upon which they lay especial emphasis is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that the diamond ring was not delivered to, and was never in the possession of, respondent. At or about the time when the note and mortgage were executed, one of the mortgagors, without any previous authority from the mortgagee, delivered the ring to a brother-in-law of respondent, one S. H. Kruger, who appears to have conducted a brokerage business in San Diego, and who absconded on August 8, 1919. It is probable that Kruger disposed of the ring for his own use and benefit before he left San Diego, or that he took it with him when he departed for regions unknown. At any rate, the ring was never in the actual possession of respondent or of her assignor, Mrs. Archer. Kruger represented Mrs. Archer in the matter of her loan to the Vernons and in the negotiations which led up to the execution of the note and mortgage. He also represented respondent in the matter of the assignment of the note and mortgage to her. Appellants claim that because they delivered the ring to Kruger he held it for Mrs. Archer as her agent while she was the owner of the note and mortgage, and that upon and after the assignment of those documents to respondent he held it for the latter as her agent. Wherefore it is claimed that Kruger's possession of the ring, at all times subsequent to the assignment of the note and mortgage to respondent, was her possession, and hence that the finding that she never had possession of the ring is unsupported by the evidence.

We think the evidence was amply sufficient to support the finding. The sole grounds advanced by appellants to support their contention that upon the assignment of the note and mortgage to respondent Kruger held the ring as her agent are: (1) That respondent conferred upon Kruger ostensible authority sufficient to make him respondent's agent to hold the ring for her; (2) that Kruger was respondent's general agent and as such was authorized to represent her in all matters pertaining to her investments; and (3) that respondent is estopped from denying that she authorized Kruger to hold the ring for her as her agent. No other reason has been suggested by appellants why it should be held that Kruger's possession of the ring was respondent's possession, and we therefore shall confine ourselves to a consideration of the three theories so advanced by them.

[1] We do not think the evidence warrants the conclusion that respondent, either intentionally or by want of ordinary care, caused or allowed appellants to believe that Kruger was authorized to hold the ring for respondent as her agent; that is to say, so far as appellants are concerned, respondent did not confer upon Kruger ostensible authority for the purpose mentioned, or any authority beyond that actually delegated to him. Respondent, who took the witness stand in her own behalf in the court below, testified that she never had possession of the ring; that she never saw it; that she did not learn that it had been delivered to Kruger until some time after she had purchased the note and mortgage; that shortly before the purchase she had arranged with Kruger to let her know whenever he had a good mortgage to sell and to give her an opportunity to buy it; that, when she was not in San Diego, Kruger, if he had a mortgage to sell, would write her, and, if he said the security was good, she would send him the money to purchase the paper; that she was in San Francisco at the time when she bought this note and mortgage from Mrs. Archer; that Kruger wrote to her and told her he had a mortgage to sell, referring to the mortgage here in question; that she mailed him a check for the necessary amount, and that Kruger, at San Diego, acted for her in procuring the assignment for Mrs. Archer; that, if at any time when she was in San Diego Kruger told her he had a good mortgage for sale, she always looked at the property, and then, if the security met with her approval, she would purchase it; that prior to the assignment to her of this particular mortgage she had procured through Kruger, during her absence from San Diego, the assignment to her of three other mortgages executed by other mortgagors; and that she had seen Kruger upon but a few occasions prior to her purchase of the Vernon mortgage.

[2] Manifestly, Kruger possessed no ostensible authority such as is claimed by appellants and of which the latter can avail themselves in this action. In each instance when respondent purchased a mortgage through Kruger, she made him her special agent for that particular transaction. If Kruger had held the ring for respondent as her agent, then the contract of mortgage, in so far as it related to the ring, would have been converted into a contract of pledge. But respondent, when purchasing the note and its security, knew naught of a pledge. She knew only of a mortgage, and supposed that she was purchasing a mortgage and the note secured thereby. An agent has such authority as the principal actually or ostensibly confers upon him. Civ. Code, § 2315. The actual authority conferred upon Kruger by respondent did not authorize him to procure the assignment to his principal of a pledge. Respondent actually authorized Kruger to procure the assignment to her of the only security of which she had any personal knowledge, namely, a mortgage, not a pledge, and for that purpose she conferred upon him special authority. To entitle appellants successfully to claim that respondent conferred upon her agent ostensible authority sufficient to authorize him to procure the assignment to his principal of a contract of pledge, they must first show that, at the time when respondent purchased the note and mortgage, they had knowledge of the facts which they claim gave color of authority to the agent. Their contention that Kruger possessed ostensible authority of the nature and to the extent claimed by them is based upon the fact that Kruger represented respondent in a number of other similar transactions. But there is no evidence that appellants possessed any knowledge of these other transactions at the time when Kruger exercised the actual authority which respondent specifically conferred upon him in this particular transaction. Ostensible authority, as defined by our statute, "is such as a principal, intentionally or by want of ordinary care, causes or allows a third person to believe the agent to possess." Civ. Code, § 2317. As a necessary ingredient of this definition it is held that a party maintaining that such authority existed "must prove that he knew of the facts giving color of authority to the supposed agent." Rodgers v. Peckham, 120 Cal. 238, 52 P. 483, quoting from Harris v. San Diego Flume Co., 87 Cal. 526, 25 P. 758. It follows, therefore, that appellants, who had no dealings with Kruger when the latter represented respondent in the purchase of this note and mortgage from Mrs. Archer, and who knew nothing of the other transactions in which respondent was represented by Kruger, are not in a position to claim that the latter possessed any ostensible authority, or any authority whatever beyond that which respondent actually and intentionally conferred upon him.

If appellants find themselves the victims of Kruger's fraud, they have no one but themselves to blame. One cannot read this record without perceiving that Kruger deliberately deceived respondent, intending all the while to keep her in ignorance respecting his possession of the ring in order that he might wrongfully convert it to his own use. But this was made possible by appellants' willful violation of that provision of their mortgage contract whereby they obligated themselves not to remove any of the mortgaged property from No. 3536 Grim street without the consent of their mortgagee. There is no evidence that the mortgagee ever authorized or consented to the removal of the ring prior to its delivery to Kruger.

There is no evidence to justify the claim that Kruger was respondent's general agent with authority to represent her in all matters pertaining to her investments. Appellants seem to think that, because Kruger acted as respondent's agent in a number of transactions in which she purchased securities through him, he was her general agent to purchase securities for her. As we have pointed out, he was in each instance clothed with special authority only. In Barrett v. Irvine, 2 Ir. 462, it was held that no multiplication of acts as special agent could convert a special agent into a general agent. See, also, in this connection, Nourse v. Jennings, 180 Mass. 592, 62 N. E. 974; Rice v. James, 193 Mass. 458, 79 N. E. 807; Gregg v. Wooliscroft, 52 Ill. App. 214; and Campbell v. Sherman, 49 Mich. 534, 14 N. W. 484. In Gregg v. Wooliscroft, supra, the Illinois Appellate Court, holding that one Evans was the special and not the general agent of the appellee, said:

"It is in proof that Evans bought many cars of oats and of other grain for the appellee. This is relied upon as establishing the claim that he was a general agent. It is not, however, shown that he made such purchases otherwise than in pursuance of special directions given him from time to time to do so, as was his general custom or system of transacting the business in which he was engaged."

[3] Equally without merit is the claim that respondent is estopped to deny that she authorized Kruger to hold the ring for her as her agent. In Post v. City, etc., Bank, 181 Cal. 244, 183 P. 805, our Supreme Court quotes from Corpus Juris to the effect that—

"An estoppel does not arise from the mere fact that the agent has acted for the principal on one or more previous occasions, but not under appearance of a general authority so to act."

[4] It next is urged that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that appellants did not tender to respondent the amount due on the promissory note. The argument advanced to sustain this contention is based upon the assumption that Kruger held the ring as respondent's agent at all times after the assignment to her of the note and mortgage. The only tender ever made by appellants was an offer to pay the amount due on the promissory note, provided respondent delivered the ring to appellants. As we have seen, respondent did not have possession of the ring, either actually or constructively as Kruger's principal, and the offer, therefore, was ineffective as a tender, since it was accompanied by a condition which appellants had no right to impose.

The court found the value of the ring to be $150, and not $700 as claimed by appellants. It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support this finding as to value; but, since respondent was not accountable for the ring, the finding as to its value is entirely inconsequential.

[5] On the cross-examination of respondent, appellants' counsel asked her if it was not a fact that Kruger, at the time he absconded, had in his possession securities, papers, and documents which she had intrusted to him. In propounding this question, it doubtless was the purpose of appellants' counsel to show that Kruger was respondent's general agent in all matters pertaining to her investments. The court sustained an objection to the question upon the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial. In this there was no error and no prejudice to appellants' rights. Elsewhere in her cross-examination respondent testified that Kruger did not have charge of her papers or of her safe deposit box.

[6] On the direct examination of Mrs. Archer, who had been made a defendant in the action, her counsel sought to show that Kruger told her, at the time when she transferred the note and mortgage to respondent, that he had the ring in his possession. At this stage of the witness' examination, the court, of its own motion, said:

"Anything he [Kruger] said may be stricken here. We don't want hearsay testimony in here."

It is claimed by appellants that the statements of Kruger were admissible under the principle that admissions made by an agent in the course of his employment are binding upon his principal. But it was not necessary to show by Kruger's statements to Mrs. Archer that the ring was in his possession. It was proved by other and uncontradicted evidence that the ring had been delivered to Kruger and that he had it in his possession.

Finally, it is claimed that the court failed to find upon all of the issues raised by appellants' cross-complaint and respondent's answer thereto. Appellants have not seen fit to favor us with a particularization of the issues upon which it is claimed the court failed to find. If there is any issue upon which the court made no finding, it is not of a character which would warrant a different judgment, even if the court had found thereon in appellants' favor.

The judgment is affirmed.

LITTLE v. UNION OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 5121.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 16, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 10, 1925.)

1. Pleading ⊂=53(1) — Special demurrer on ground of inconsistent counts not aided by reference to other counts.

Special demurrer to complaint as a whole and to separate counts therein, on ground of ambiguities and uncertainties, appearing from the fact that certain allegations of one count are inconsistent with those of another, cannot be aided by reference to other counts.

2. Contracts ⊂=35—Typewriting name of party in contract not intended as subscription.

Where complaint alleged that contract was drawn in the office of one of parties, not being signed at the time but with the understanding that it was to be signed later, held, that the typewriting of the name therein was not intended as subscription.

3. Pleading ⊂=34(2) — Special facts pleaded control when inconsistent with conclusion drawn therefrom.

Where a conclusion is alleged and also special facts from which conclusion is drawn, but special facts are inconsistent with and do not support conclusion, former control, and sufficiency of complaint is to be determined from special facts pleaded.

4. Frauds, statute of ⊂=144—Circumstances rendering it fraud for opposite party to assert invalidity of contract under statute created estoppel.

Where terms of contract were reasonably shown, and opposite party agreed not to assert invalidity under statute of frauds, and party had, in reliance on contract, changed his position to his injury with knowledge of opposite party, circumstances being such as to render it fraud for opposite party to assert invalidity under the statute, such facts created estoppel.

5. Frauds, statute of ⊂=119(2)—Refusing to carry out promise to put contract within statute in writing is not such fraud as to take contract out of statute.

Refusal to carry out a promise to put in writing a contract within the statute is not such fraud as takes the case out of the statute even when party, in reliance on promise, has changed his position to his injury.

6. Frauds, statute of ⊂=126 — Agreement to execute an agreement within statute is itself within statute.

Agreement to enter into or reduce to writing and execute an agreement within the statute of frauds is itself within the statute, and neither promise is enforcible unless statute is satisfied.

7. Sales ⊂=411—Complaint for breach of contract for sale of gasoline held insufficient to state cause of action.

Complaint alleging that contract for purchase of gasoline was written at office of defendant, but not signed; that defendant promised to sign later, and that relying thereon, plaintiff entered into contract with third party for resale of gasoline, but was later released therefrom, held insufficient to state cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by H. O. Little against the Union Oil Company of California. From a judgment for defendant, after demurrer was sustained, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. James, Jr., and C. A. S. Frost, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Edwin T. Cooper, of San Francisco, Paul M. Gregg, of San Luis Obispo, and Jerry H. Powell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. Action by appellant, H. O. Little, against respondent, Union Oil Company of California, a corporation.

Appellant, by his amended complaint, alleges, in the form of two separate causes of action, facts arising from the same transaction. As a first cause of action it is alleged that on August 24, 1923, a writing—in part a printed form used by respondent in the conduct of its business as a dealer in gasoline, and in part typewritten—was caused to be prepared in duplicate by one A. R. Atwood at the office of respondent in San Francisco, California, the writing being in words and figures as follows:

"Memorandum of Agreement.

"Effective Date: October 1, 1923.

"City: San Francisco, Cal.

"Union Oil Company of California: Please enter our order for the following products at the prices stated:

"Yearly requirements: Minimum 2,400,000, maximum 4,800,000, gals. of Union gasoline, deliveries to be made by Union Oil Company of California into the trucks of H. O. Little, in quantities not to exceed one-twelfth of the above amount in any calendar month. Price of above gasoline to be five cents (5c) per gallon under the prevailing tank wagon market price on date of delivery, on all delivered up to 200,000 gallons per month. If 200,000 gallons per month is exceeded the price on the total month's purchases to be five and one-half (5½c) cents per gallon.

"Upon the following terms and conditions: Deliveries f. o. b. Potrero plant, San Francisco, and to cover a period of one year from date. All orders to be filled with reasonable promptness. The portions typewritten, with the exception of the place therein provided for delivery, to wit, "Potrero plant, San Francisco," in the third paragraph, and the place and date of making the writing were, as shown by photostatic copy of the writing filed by stipulation as a supplement to the transcript on appeal, the first and second paragraphs thereof. It is further alleged that the writing contained all the promises and conditions to be kept and performed by plaintiff and defendant, and that, in the words of the pleading, "plaintiff and defendant then and there intended said typewritten agreement to be then and there mutually operative and binding on each other, and intended that the names of plaintiff and defendant typewritten therein should be and be deemed to be a subscribing by them of said agreement and authentication thereof, and in that behalf plaintiff alleges: * * *"

Appellant then proceeds to allege the circumstances of the transaction and the conversation between himself and Atwood preceding and following the preparation of the writing, from which his conclusion as to the intention of the respondent as above quoted is drawn, and which allegations are as follows: That respondent on the date mentioned had in writing authorized Atwood to execute on its behalf an agreement with appellant for the sale to him of the gasoline described upon the terms and conditions set forth in the writing, such being the subject, terms, and conditions of an oral offer by appellant made on that day and orally accepted by Atwood. That at the time of such oral acceptance appellant was negotiating with an organization known as the Garage Owners' Association for the sale and delivery by him to it of the quantities of "Union" gasoline mentioned in the writing at a net profit to appellant over the price mentioned therein of 1¼ cents per gallon. That on said date and before the acceptance of the offer by Atwood, appellant had informed Atwood of the terms of his proposed agreement with the association, stating that he desired the immediate execution of the writing. That he might on the evening of that day execute the agreement with the association. That the hour was then late, and that it was necessary for him to procure from his attorney drafts of the proposed agreement before his meeting with the association that evening. That Atwood then stated that appellant should, in the words of the pleading, "hurry to his attorney's office, there get said forms of contract with said Garage Owners' Association, and go ahead and execute his said proposed contract with said Garage Owners' Association that evening. That said typewritten agreement was effective, and was all that was necessary to enable plaintiff to sign up with said Garage Owners' Association," thereupon delivering a duplicate of the writing to appellant and retaining the original thereof, neither the original nor the duplicate being signed by the manual subscription of either party. That appellant received the writing so delivered in the belief that such was a concluded and mutually binding agreement between himself and respondent, and, acting on such belief and the representations of Atwood, executed on the same day the proposed contract mentioned above with the association. That respondent was the sole producer of "Union" gasoline; that appellant has performed the terms and conditions contained in said writing by him to be performed, and that respondent refused to perform. That due to such refusal appellant was unable to perform his contract with the association or to purchase Union or other gasoline at a price equal to or below the price provided in the writing, to his damage in the sum of $60.000.

As a second cause of action are alleged the same facts as above, with the exception of the allegation that the names of the parties typewritten therein were deemed to be a subscription by them thereto, and with the further allegation that Atwood, at the time of the delivery of the writing, stated that he would subscribe his name thereto as agent for respondent later in that week, and which he afterwards refused to do, stating that he had instructions from respondent not to go further with appellant.

It is not alleged that the name of respondent printed below the typewritten and printed portions of the writing containing the description of the subject, the price, the terms, and conditions of the alleged contract, was intended to constitute or was adopted as a subscription by respondent thereto.

Respondent demurred generally and specially to the complaint and each count thereof, and moved to strike out the allegations hereinbefore mentioned. The motion as to all the allegations above except that respondent was the sole producer of "Union" gasoline, the demand for and the refusal of performance and the damage alleged, was granted, and the demurrer sustained without leave to amend. Judgment was thereupon entered for respondent, and the appeal is taken therefrom. No application for leave to further amend so far as shown by the record was made.

Appellant contends that the first cause of action states facts which sustain his conclusion that it was the intention of respondent to adopt its name typewritten in the writing as a subscription thereto, that the question of such intention was one for the jury, and that the facts alleged estop respondent from asserting that the writing was invalid under the statute of frauds; that the motion to strike was improperly granted, and that the demurrer should have been overruled.

[1] Certain grounds of respondent's special demurrer to the complaint as a whole and to the separate counts therein were the uncertainties and ambiguities appearing from the fact that certain allegations of one count were inconsistent with those of the other. The form of pleading adopted by appellant has been approved, and a demurrer on the grounds stated could not be aided by reference to other counts in the complaint (Stockton, etc., Works v. Glens Falls Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 167, 53 P 565; Cameron v. Ah Quong, 175 Cal. 377, 382, 165 P. 961; Froeming v. Stockton, etc., Ry. Co., 171 Cal. 401, 404, 153 P. 712, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 408.

The writing alleged as a memorandum of the agreement of the parties stated with sufficient certainty the essential terms of contract, with the name of the seller, and, from the provision therein naming the person to whom delivery should be made, by reasonable inference the name of the buyer. Sanborn v. Flagler (Mass.) 9 Allen, 474, 476.

[2] It is clear from the pleading that the act of typewriting the name of respondent in the writing was not intended as the subscription by respondent thereto, no facts being alleged supporting such conclusion other than that the writing was typewritten by a stenographer in the office of respondent, and from which alone such intention could not fairly be inferred.

While no California case directly in point has been called to our attention, it is the rule in other jurisdictions, and the case of California Canneries Co. v. Scatena, 117 Cal. 447, 49 P. 462, is authority for the conclusion that a subscription by a party to be charged need not be at the end of the writing, but, the intention being shown, such signature placed on any part of the writing is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the statute; and that the words "signed" and "subscribed" are in meaning substantially the same except where in a statute some peculiar or additional meaning to either of the words is indicated.

The majority of cases in other jurisdictions hold that the signing required by statute is a signature to the memorandum placed there or adopted or appropriated with the intention of authenticating the writing, but that the statute is not satisfied by the writing, printing or stamping of the name of a party to the contract by him or by his authority, or by the adoption or appropriation of a name not for the purpose of signing and authenticating the instrument but for some other purpose. 27 Corp. Jur. p. 288, § 357.

If it was not the intention of respondent's agent to adopt or appropriate the name printed in the form shown at the end of the writing as its signature thereto, the form of acceptance so printed being obviously for the purpose of enabling its agent to authenticate agreements of this character, and appellant's pleading negatives such intention, it is not, in our opinion, a fair or reasonable inference from the circumstances and conversation alleged that its name typewritten therein as a part of a clause providing that deliveries should be made by it into the trucks of appellant and the quantities of gasoline so to be delivered each month, was intended by its agent to be adopted or appropriated as an authentication thereof.

All that might reasonably be inferred therefrom, in view of the fact that the whole transaction took place in the office of respondent, where the signatures of both could have been attached without appreciable delay, was the intention of the agent to assure appellant that the invalidity of the writing would not be asserted by respondent, and that the oral acceptance of the offer made would suffice as an effective and binding agreement between them.

[3] It is a general rule that where a conclusion is alleged and also the special facts from which the conclusion is drawn, if the special facts are inconsistent with and do not support the conclusion, the former control, and the sufficiency of the complaint is to be determined from the special facts pleaded. Ohm v. San Francisco, 3 Cal. Unrep. 314, 318, 25 P. 155; Horton v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 462, 187 P. 1070; 31 Cyc. 85; Wright v. State, 104 Okl. 57, 230 P. 268; Heinzman v. Whiteman (Ind. App.) 139 N. E. 329; Wood v. Pynetree Paper Co., 29 Ga. App. 81, 114 S. E. 83; First Nat. Bank v. Grow, 57 Mont. 376, 188 P. 907; Phillips v. Vermeule, 88 N. J. Eq. 500, 102 A. 695; United States v. Union Pac. Ry. Co., 169 F. 65, 94 C. C. A. 433; Lovell v. Marshall (Minn.) 202 N. W. 64; Louisville & U. R. Co. v. National Bank, 188 Ala. 109, 65 So. 1003; Gymther v. Brown, 67 Or. 310, 134 P. 1186; Koehler v. Wilson, 144 App. Div. 473, 129 N. Y. S. 532, 534.

[4] Where the essential terms of a contract are shown with reasonable certainty, with representations by the opposite party that its invalidity under the statute will not be asserted, and it appears that the party urging the estoppel has, pursuant to the contract, in reliance upon and induced by the representations, changed his position, the intention to make such change being known at the time to the one making the representations, and as a result loss or injury is suffered, and the element of fraud appears in the transaction, in that the case is one where circumstances and conduct are such as to render it a fraud for the opposite party to assert the invalidity of the contract under the statute, such facts create an estoppel. Long v. Long, 162 Cal. 427, 122 P. 1077; Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 106 P. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154.

Appellant's claim of damages suffered is based upon the anticipated profit of 1¼ cents per gallon on the resale of the quantities of gasoline mentioned in the writing, to wit, 4,800,000 gallons. It is not alleged that the profit anticipated from performance of the contract with the association would have been greater than from a resale of the gasoline in the open market, or that appellant could not have procured the same quantity, kind, and quality at any price between the price mentioned in the writing and the selling price to the association. The change of position alleged as a ground of estoppel was the assumption of an obligation to deliver the above quantities to the association, the violation of which resulted in no loss, the association, as alleged in the complaint, having relieved appellant from liability thereon. This obligation was the consideration for the promise of the association to purchase, which promise was not procured until after the representations alleged were made.

While the act of the association restored appellant to his original position, in that he was relieved from obligation and suffered no loss therefrom, the act in its effect caused a second change in the position of appellant in the loss of the benefit of the obligation of the association. The latter change, however, was not the result of the representations alleged, but the consequence of defendant's refusal to perform.

Appellant's position, in view of the facts pleaded, is that of one who, while he has relied on representations which, the other elements being present, would result in an estoppel, has not changed his position to his injury; but, the general market conditions being such that a resale at a profit is certain, contends that to permit the seller to assert the invalidity of the oral agreement would result in a change of his otherwise advantageous position in the market and a consequent loss. The result of such application of the doctrine would be its use as an instrument of gain or profit, while its object is protective and limited to saving harmless or making whole the person in whose favor it arises. 21 Corp. Jur. p. 1118; Adler v. Pin, 80 Ala. 351; Lindsay v. Cooper, 94 Ala. 170, 11 So. 325, 16 L. R. A. 813, 33 Am. St. Rep. 105; Ramsey v. Chilson, 57 Cal. App. 785, 788, 208 P. 319.

Appellant alleges in the second count of the complaint that the agent of respondent, following the conversation hereinbefore set forth, agreed to subscribe the writing on behalf of respondent later during the same week.

[5] As the rule is stated in 12 California Jurisprudence, section 104, statute of frauds, the mere fact that one acts on an oral promise, hoping that it will be carried out by the promisor, does not estop the latter. So, as a general rule, the mere omission, coupled with performance, is insufficient to create an estoppel. The refusal to carry out a promise to put in writing a contract within the statute is not such fraud as takes the case out of the statute; and this is ordinarily true even when a party, relying simply on the word, favor, or promise of another, has changed his position to his injury on account of it. In all these cases, however, there must be, to avoid an estoppel, an absence of actual fraud. Seymour v. Oelrichs, supra; Long v. Long, supra.

[6] An agreement to enter into or reduce to writing and execute an agreement within the statute of frauds is itself within the statute, and neither promise is enforcible unless the statute is satisfied. 27 Corp. Jur. p. 355; Fuller v. Reed, 38 Cal. 99.

A fraudulent intent in making the representations or in refusing to perform, or that respondent took advantage of the information imparted by appellant to its agent, was not alleged in the complaint.

Notwithstanding the absence of actual fraud, a representation of a future intention absolute in form, deliberately made for the purpose of influencing the conduct of the other party and acted upon by him, is generally the source of a right, and may amount to a contract enforcible in a court of equity. Seymour v. Oelrichs, supra. As held, however, in the case last cited and in Standing v. Morosco, 43 Cal. App. 244, 246, 184 P. 954, the person to whom the representation or promise is made must have so altered his position as that he would be made to suffer loss or unconscionable injury. If no such injury or loss is shown, the rule of estoppel fails, and the excepted case is not established.

[7] It is our conclusion that the facts alleged were not sufficient to constitute a cause of action, that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. HAMIL. (Cr. 1252.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 17, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 10, 1925.)

1. Bastards ⇐17½—Prosecution for nonsupport of illegitimate child proper, without first establishing duty to support in civil action under Code.

To prosecute an alleged father of an illegitimate child under Pen. Code, § 270, as amended by St. 1923, p. 592, for nonsupport, it is not necessary to first establish his duty to do so in a civil action, under Civ. Code, § 196a.

2. Bastards ⇐17½—Indictment in a prosecution for nonsupport of an illegitimate child held sufficient.

In a prosecution for nonsupport of an illegitimate child, an indictment, charging defendant with being the father of the child, and willfully failing to support it, sufficiently describes the offense charged, under Pen. Code, § 270, as amended by St. 1923, p. 592, no further particulars being required in view of sections 959, 960.

3. Criminal law ⇐688—Reopening case to recall prosecuting witness held within discretion of court and proper.

Permitting reopening of case for purpose of recalling prosecuting witness, after district attorney had announced his case closed and defendant had moved for a directed verdict of not guilty, was not error, such matter being within discretion of court.

4. Indictment and information ⇐176—To convict for failure to provide for child not necessary to prove failure to provide on date named in indictment.

In a prosecution for nonsupport of an illegitimate child, it is not necessary under Pen. Code, § 955, for the prosecution to prove that defendant failed to provide for child on or about date alleged in indictment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Louis Hamil was convicted of failing to provide for an illegitimate minor child, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. D. Jerrett, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Leon French and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. The defendant was indicted by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco for unlawfully failing, without lawful excuse, to furnish necessary food, clothing, etc., for an illegitimate minor child, and thereby violating the provisions of section 270 of the Penal Code as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 592). To this indictment defendant entered a plea of not guilty and went to trial before a jury, and the jury found him guilty. Defendant made a motion for a new trial and a motion in arrest of judgment, both of which were denied, and the court pronounced judgment imposing imprisonment in the county jail for a period of two years and a fine of $500. From this judgment, and the order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

Resolving all conflicts in the testimony against the defendant, as the jury did in finding him guilty of the offense charged, it appears that he is the father of a child who was born at St. Elizabeth's Infants Hospital in San Francisco on October 8, 1922, to a young, unmarried mother; that at all times during his acquaintance with the mother of this child, the defendant was married to another woman and that there were three children of that marriage; that defendant was supporting his legitimate family and earning his living by driving a laundry wagon; that he gave the mother of this illegitimate child, who is the prosecuting witness here, $50 or $60 before she went to the hospital for the birth of the child; that up to the time the prosecuting witness went to the hospital, which was about four or five months before her child was born, she worked as a waitress and earned her living in that way, and that after she left the hospital, about the 4th day of November, 1922, she resumed her work as a waitress, and defendant gave her $7 a week for the support of the child until about April, 1923. Since April, 1923, he has provided nothing towards the support of the child. The indictment charges the defendant with failing to provide for the child on September 1, 1924.

This defendant was convicted of failing to provide for this same child on April 1, 1923, under section 270 of the Penal Code, prior to the amendment of 1923, and the judgment of conviction was reversed by this court on February 26, 1924. People v. Hamil, 65 Cal. App. 786, 225 P. 10.

The present case is prosecuted under section 270 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1923, which provides, among other things, that the "father of either a legitimate or illegitimate minor child who willfully omits without lawful excuse to furnish necessary food, clothing, shelter or medical attendance for his child is guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding two years or by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars ($1,000) or by both," and shall not be relieved from criminal liability "for such omission merely because the mother of such child, or any other person, or organization, voluntarily or involuntarily, furnishes such necessary food, clothing, shelter or medical attendance for such child," etc.

A great many contentions are made by appellant for a reversal of the judgment in this case. It will only be necessary, however, to discuss a few of them.

[1] It is contended by appellant that there can be no prosecution of an alleged father of an illegitimate child for his failure to support it until his duty so to do has been established in a civil action, under section 196a of the Civil Code. This contention is wholly without merit; see People v. Stanley, 33 Cal. App. 624, at page 626, 166 P. 596.

[2] It is next contended by appellant that the court erred in overruling defendant's demurrer to the indictment. The charging part of the indictment is as follows:

"Louis Hamil is accused by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco of the crime of misdemeanor, to wit: Violation of the provisions of section 270 of the Penal Code, committed as follows: The said Louis Hamil, on the 1st day of September, 1924, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, was the parent and father of a certain minor child, to wit, David Sweet, then and there of the age of one year, and the said Louis Hamil did then and there on the said 1st day of September, 1924, at the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, willfully and unlawfully, and without excuse, omit to furnish said minor child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, and medical attendance, or any thereof. * * *"

The demurrer is both general and special, and the portion of the demurrer especially relied upon by the defendant is "that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense against the defendant Louis Hamil, for the reason, and in particular, that said indictment does not sufficiently describe the offense charged to have been committed." In support of this demurrer, appellant contends that the portion of the indictment which charges that the defendant "was the parent and father of a certain minor child, to wit, David Sweet, then and there of the age of one year," etc., states merely a conclusion of law and that the indictment should have alleged "the date when, and the place where, and the person upon whom the child was begot; the name of the person who begot the child, the place where, and the time when, the child was delivered; that the child was born illegitimate, and that the defendant was the father of said child."

No such particularity is required in an indictment or information under section 270 of the Penal Code. The essential elements of the crime denounced by this section are that defendant is the father of said minor child, and the willful omission of the father, without lawful excuse, to furnish certain designated necessaries mentioned in this section to the minor child, etc. When these facts are clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended, it is all the statute requires. Sections 959 and 960, Pen. Code. Measuring the indictment by this rule, it states all the necessary elements to constitute a complete offense under section 270 of the Penal Code, and is amply sufficient. People v. Murphy, 39 Cal. 52.

[3] It is also contended by appellant that the court erred in permitting the reopening of the people's case in chief for the purpose of recalling the prosecuting witness, after the district attorney had announced the close of his case in chief for the people, and counsel for defendant had moved the court to advise the jury to return a verdict of not guilty. This contention is wholly without merit. The reopening of a case for further evidence was within the discretion of the trial court, and the record shows no abuse of that discretion. This proceeding is a very common occurrence in the trial of criminal cases and within the discretion of the trial court, and not violative of any of the defendant's rights. People v. Kennedy, 48 Cal. App. 545, 192 P. 556; People v. McPherson, 6 Cal. App. 266, 91 P. 1098; People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 57 P. 470, 45 L. R. A. 783.

[4] It is next contended by appellant that it was incumbent upon the prosecution to prove that the defendant omitted to provide for the minor child in question on September 1, 1924 (the date alleged in the indictment), or immediately prior or subsequent thereto. This contention, likewise, is without merit, and in answer thereto it is only necessary for us to cite section 955 of the Penal Code; People v. Stanley, supra; People v. Swiggy (Cal. App.) 232 P. 174; People v. Curry (Cal. App.) 231 P. 358.

Many other contentions are made by appellant for a reversal of the judgment, but we have examined the record and the voluminous briefs filed by appellant with care, and the jury could not have arrived, in our opinion, at any other verdict than that of guilty. Appellant does not advance any points upon the merits of the case, but relies upon a multitude of technicalities, all of which, as above stated, we have examined and found without any substantial merit.

From an entire review of the record in this case, we think the defendant was fairly tried and justly convicted upon evidence that admits of no reasonable doubt.

Judgment affirmed.

WETZLER et ux. v. PATTERSON (two cases). (Civ. 4003.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⇐184(2)—Lease construed as providing not for deposit but for advance payments of rent not recoverable on breach by tenant.

Where tenant in written lease agreed to pay $933.33 on execution of lease, $700 of which was to be credited by lessor for rental due for last three months, and on default by tenant such sum to be forfeited to landlord, the $700 is to be construed as advance payment and not as deposit to secure performance of lease, and cannot be recovered by tenant on termination of lease for his default, nor offset against rent sued for by landlord.

2. Damages ⇐78(6)—Lease construed as providing for advance payment despite words of forfeiture to construe as a penalty would make it void under Code; "reserve."

Where lease provided that sum paid on execution of lease was to be "credited by lessor for the rental due upon said lease for the last three months," a further provision that on default by lessee the rent reserved for those months should be forfeited to the lessor held to nullify the covenant for advance payment of rent as one for penalty or forfeiture of liquidated damages, void under Civ Code, § 1670; "reserve" meaning "to keep; to hold; to retain."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Reserve—Reserved.]

3. Landlord and tenant ⇐233(1)—Finding that tract contained 80 acres, "more or less," held not to imply less than 80 acres.

In landlord's actions for rent and unlawful detainer, in which tenant counterclaimed for abatement of rent because of shortgage of acreage in land demised, a finding that the leased premises contained "80 acres, more or less," does not necessarily imply that tract contained less than 80 acres, the words "more or less," when used in a description of land in connection with quantity or as qualifying distances, being but words of safety and precaution intended to cover the possibility of some slight and unimportant inaccuracy.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, More or Less (Realty).]

4. Landlord and tenant ⇐200(1)—Abatement of stipulated rent not allowed by reason of physical burdens shortening area.

A lessee is not entitled to abatement of stipulated rent for shortage of plantable area because of canals and roads on land, since lessee is deemed to have had notice of such physical burdens.

5. Evidence ⇐441(4)—Terms of written lease cannot be changed by contemporaneous parol agreement.

A complete written lease, which says nothing of acreage suitable for cultivation, cannot, in absence of fraud or mistake, be changed by a contemporaneous parol agreement that a specified acreage would be cultivated.

Appeals from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Separate actions by Charles L. Wetzler and wife against P. A. Patterson, tried together. Judgment for plaintiffs in each action, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. H. Smith and Lamy & Smith, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry W. Norton, of El Centro, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiffs, who are husband and wife, brought two actions in the court below. In the one first commenced they sued for the recovery of three months' rent, due, respectively, on the 15th of November, 1920, and the 15th days of February and March, 1921, and also for a sum alleged to be due for water used by defendant as the lessee, and which the latter, under the terms of his lease, had undertaken to pay. Later plaintiffs brought the other action, one for unlawful detainer, commenced after due service of the statutory notice to pay the overdue rent which had accrued since the first action was commenced, or to vacate the leased premises within three days. By this second action plaintiffs sought the recovery of the rent which became due on, respectively, the 15th days of April and May, 1921, damages for the unlawful detainer, and a forfeiture of the lease. In a separate answer and counterclaim filed in each of the actions, defendant alleged that, under the terms of the lease, plaintiffs undertook to rent to defendant a tract of land containing 80 acres: that in fact the tract contained but 65 acres; that by reason of this shortage in area the amount of the agreed rent should be proportionately abated; that at the date of the execution of the lease defendant paid plaintiffs the sum of $700; that this sum should be offset against the accrued rents; and that when so applied there would be left a balance due to defendant amounting to $263.52, for which sum defendant prayed judgment. The two actions were tried together, findings and judgment in favor of plaintiffs were filed in each case, and from the judgment entered in each of the actions defendant has appealed. The appeals were ordered by this court to be heard and considered together.

The facts necessary to an understanding of the points presented by the appeals are briefly these: On July 7, 1920, plaintiffs, as the lessors, and defendant, as the lessee, executed a written lease whereby the former leased to the latter, for the term of three years, commencing July 15, 1920, a tract of land in Imperial county, described in the instrument as follows:

"The south one-half (S.½) of the west one-half (W. ½) of tract 77 in section * * * township 14 south, range 13 east, containing 80 acres."

Of the covenants on the part of the lessee, the instrument contains the following:

"* * * The lessee agrees and binds himself: (1) To yield and pay to the lessors as rental for use of the above premises for the term above mentioned the full sum of $8,400, payable at the times and in the amounts as hereinafter set forth, to wit, $933.33 upon the execution and delivery of this lease, of which amount $233.33 shall be credited by the lessors upon the rental of the premises for the first month, to wit, the month beginning upon the 15th day of July, 1920, and ending upon the 15th day of August, 1920; $700 of this amount shall be credited by the lessor for the rental due upon said lease for the last three months of the full term of said lease, to wit, for the three months beginning on the 15th day of April, 1923."

It is then provided that a monthly rental of $233.33 shall be paid on the 15th day of each of the remaining months of the term, namely, on August 15, 1920, and on the 15th day of each succeeding month thereafter until and including the 15th day of March, 1923. Following certain other covenants on the part of the lessee, this paragraph occurs:

"It is further agreed by the lessee that upon the breach of any of the conditions above mentioned the sum of $700 heretofore mentioned as rent reserved for the last three months of this lease shall be forfeited to the lessor for breach of the conditions of this lease."

It is further provided that "the lessor may enter * * * to expel the lessee if he shall fail to pay the rent as aforesaid." We have set forth all of the provisions of the instrument which relate to rent, including the times, amounts, and manner of its payment.

On July 7, 1920, defendant took possession of the premises under the lease, and regularly paid the rent until the following month of November. He vacated the premises within a week after the commencement of the unlawful detainer action.

Though the lease does not mention the particular government section in which the tract is situated, no question is raised as to the sufficiency of the description. Indeed, the court found that the leased premises "are known and described as the south half of the west half of tract 77 in township 14 south, range 13 east." (Italics ours.) Defendant was shown the land before he executed the lease, and at the same time he observed the ditches, canals and roads on the premises.

In the findings filed in each case the trial court found, among other facts, the following:

"That said premises so leased * * * contain 80 acres, more or less;" also that "there were certain canals and highways located upon the sides of said tract so leased by the plaintiff to the defendant, covering approximately 11 acres, the major portion of which canals and roads were a necessary part of a general irrigation and road system for ingress and egress to said property and the irrigation thereof, along with other property; and that the amount of land actually occupied as farming land by defendant under said lease was approximately 68 acres."

No contention is made as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support the court's findings.

Appellant's several points, reduced to their simplest form, are: (1) That the court erred in not applying the $700 deposit to the satisfaction of the unpaid monthly rentals; and (2) that the court erred in failing to conclude, as a matter of law, that there was a shortage in the amount of land leased to appellant, due to a defect in respondents' title to approximately 11 acres, thereby entitling appellant to a corresponding abatement of the rent in diminution of the amount mentioned in the lease.

[1] The first of these contentions turns upon the true meaning and purpose of that provision of the lease whereby it was agreed that, of the $933.33 to be paid to respondents upon the execution of the lease, $700 should be credited to the rentals for the last three months of the term. If the $700 was intended to be a mere deposit by way of security to insure the faithful performance of appellant's covenants, then upon the forfeiture of the lease, which occurred when appellant failed to pay the accrued rent within the time fixed by the three days' statutory notice, the latter would be entitled to a return of the sum so deposited by him, less the amount of the rent then due and unpaid; and in such case it would be immaterial whether the sum so deposited as security be regarded as a penalty or as liquidated damages. Green v. Frahm, 176 Cal. 259, 168 P. 114; Rez v. Summers, 34 Cal. App. 527, 168 P. 156; Blessing v. Fetters, 40 Cal. App. 471, 181 P. 108. If, however, instead of intending the $700 to be a deposit to secure the faithful performance of appellant's covenants, the parties intended that this sum should be regarded as a payment to respondents upon the contract, by way of part performance by appellant; i. e., if it was intended to be an advance payment for and on account of the last 3 months' installments of rent—then and in that case no part of the $700 can be recovered by appellant, nor can any part of it be offset against the amounts sued for by respondents in these actions. The general rule deducible from the authorities is that rent paid in advance cannot be recovered by the tenant upon the termination of the lease for condition broken, when such termination was not brought about by the wrongful act of the landlord. Curtis v. Arnold, 43 Cal. App. 97, 184 P. 510;

Galbraith v. Wood, 124 Minn. 210, 144 N. W. 945, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1034, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 609, and authorities cited in the note thereto; Dutton v. Christie, 63 Wash. 373, 115 P. 856; Rockwell v. Eiler's Music House, 67 Wash. 478, 122 P. 12, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 894; Evans v. McClure, 108 Ark. 531, 158 S. W. 487; Collier v. Wages (Tex. Civ. App.) 246 S. W. 743; Hepp Wall Paper, etc., Co. v. Deahl, 53 Colo. 274, 125 P. 491. "In case the rent has been paid in advance under a stipulation that it shall be so paid, and the landlord re-enters for conditions broken, even in the absence of an agreement to that effect, the landlord is entitled to retain the rent so paid, though the re-entry is before the expiration of the period for which the rent was paid." Galbraith v. Wood, supra. In Curtis v. Arnold, supra, Mr. Presiding Justice Waste, speaking for the court, said:

"If the money be regarded as given in consideration of the covenants of the lease when paid, the title thereto passed to the lessor (Ramish v. Workman [33 Cal. App. 19, 164 P. 26], supra; Dutton v. Christie, supra); if it is to be regarded merely as an advance payment of rent, the lessor is entitled to retain it (Galbraith v. Wood, supra * * *)."

In that case our Supreme Court denied a petition to have the cause heard in that court after judgment in the District Court of Appeal. The rule is stated in Ruling Case Law as follows:

"Provision is sometimes made in a lease for the payment in advance of the rents of the last or later periods of the lease, and such a provision has been held not to be a security merely for the lessee's performance of his agreements in the lease, but purely a payment of rent in advance, and therefore may be retained by the lessor though he terminates the lease for the default of the lessee as provided for in the lease." 16 R. C. L. p. 931.

Thus we are brought to a consideration of the proper interpretation to be placed upon the clauses in question. Do they mean that the $700 was a deposit to secure the payment of rent and the faithful performance of the lessee's other promises, or do they mean that the $700 is to be considered as an advance payment of the rent for the last three months of the term? We think the latter interpretation expresses the true meaning of the contract. It will be recalled that in the first of appellant's covenants in which the subject of rent is mentioned he binds himself to pay the $8,400—the total rent for the whole term—"at the times and in the sums hereinafter set forth, to wit, $933.33 upon the execution and delivery of this lease," etc.; and that of this sum, $700 "shall be credited by the lessor for the rental due upon said lease" for the last three months of the term. Here is an unequivocal covenant by the lessee to pay the total rental of $8,400 "at the times" and "in the sums" set forth in the paragraph wherein this covenant occurs. One of the sums thus to be paid by the lessee on account of the total rental for the whole term is the sum of $933.33. That sum was to be paid immediately "upon the execution and delivery" of the lease. Of the sum so to be paid to the lessors, $700 was to be "credited" for "the rental due upon said lease for the [last] three months of the full term." There is no reason why the lessors could not or should not credit this sum of $700 upon the rentals for the last three months immediately upon their receipt of the $933.33, i. e., immediately upon the execution of the lease. And it doubtless was the intention of the parties that the money should be so immediately credited by the lessors upon its receipt by them. Nowhere in the instrument is any provision made for the repayment to the lessee of the $700, or for the repayment of any part of the $933.33 which the latter undertook to pay upon the execution of the lease. No provision is made for its repayment at any time or upon any contingency. On the contrary, the language of this part of the lease clearly implies that all of the $933.33, including the $700 in question, was to belong absolutely to the lessors from the moment of its receipt by them. For these reasons we think it clear that the covenant which we are now analyzing, the one found in the first part of the lease, provides for and contemplates the payment of money, and not the deposit of security. That is to say, it is a covenant by the lessee for the immediate partial performance by him of his contract to pay rent by making immediately an advance payment of the rent for the last three months of the term.

[2] If there had been no further mention of the $700 than that found in the first part of the lease, it necessarily would follow from what thus far has been said that respondents own the money and may rightfully retain it. Is the nature of the above analyzed provision concerning the $700 changed from one for the advance payment of rent by the added stipulation, found in a subsequent paragraph of the lease, wherein it is provided that upon the breach of any of the lessee's covenants the "$700 heretofore mentioned as rent reserved for the last three months of this lease shall be forfeited to the lessor?" We think not. The reference to the $700 as "rent reserved for the last three months" is readily reconcilable with the true meaning of the covenant already analyzed by us—the one which, as we have stated, unmistakably provides for the advance payment of rent. "Reserve means to keep; to hold; to retain." Myers v. Conway & Co., 90 Ala. 109, 7 So. 639. The reference to the $700 as rent "reserved" for the last three months of the term is entirely consistent with the idea that the sum so reserved was intended to be an advance payment of rent, to be kept, held and retained by the lessors.

The one and only word in the whole lease which might cast any possible shadow of doubt upon the conclusion that the $700 was intended to be an advance payment of rent is the word "forfeited," occurring in the later paragraph—the one which provides that upon the breach of any of the lessee's covenants the $700 "shall be forfeited to the lessor." This word "forfeited," if it stood alone, might imply that the lessee still retained some sort of an interest in the $700 which he could lose by forfeiture. What, then, was the purpose, within the intention of the parties, of the provision that upon the breach of any of the lessee's covenants the $700 "shall be forfeited to the lessor?" If the lessee, in his covenant to pay the rent at the times and in the sums as set forth in the first part of the lease, had not unequivocally covenanted to pay the $700 in partial performance of his contract, as an advance payment of rent, or if there had been some provision for the return of this sum to the lessee upon any contingency whatever, there might have been some ground for construing the word "forfeited" as containing the implication that the lessee retained some forfeitable interest in the money. The contract must be considered as a whole, and the intention of the parties gathered from within the four corners of the instrument. It is the covenant first considered by us which deals with "the times" when and "the sums" in which the rentals are to be paid. That covenant, as we have seen, discloses an unmistakable intention to regard the $700 as a payment and not as a deposit—to regard it as an advance payment of rent. And, as we have shown, where rent is paid in advance the law itself, in the absence of any agreement therefor, authorizes the landlord to retain the rent so paid though he re-enter before the expiration of the term. We think the most reasonable conclusion to be deduced from a consideration of the lease as a whole is that in using the word "forfeited" in the subsequent paragraph of their writing it was the purpose of the parties to "make assurance doubly sure" by declaring what the law itself, in the absence of any provision for a forfeiture, would have declared. It is true that by putting this construction upon the word "forfeited" we in effect deprive it of all practical efficacy. But the same result would follow if we were to adopt the only other possible interpretation of the first-mentioned covenant. That covenant means either that the $700 was intended to be an advance payment of rent or that it was intended to be a mere deposit to secure the performance of the lessee's covenants to pay the rent. There is no other possible interpretation. If the second of these alternative interpretations should be adopted, then the word "forfeited" in the subsequent paragraph of the writing would be just as inoperative as it would be under the first and more obvious interpretation. That is to say, if we should interpret the earlier covenant as meaning that the $700 was intended to be a deposit by way of security for the payment of the rent, so as to leave some interest in appellant capable of being forfeited, then the provision for forfeiture found in the subsequent clause of the lease would be either a penalty or a provision for liquidated damages. But whether it were the one or the other, it would come within the terms of section 1670 of the Civil Code, and would be illegal and void. Green v. Frahm, supra. It follows, therefore, that under neither interpretation can any really operative effect be given to the forfeiture clause. And as it is not to be presumed that the parties deliberately entered into an illegal contract for a forfeiture, as would be the case if we treated the $700 as a sum deposited by way of security, we think that the more reasonable interpretation to put upon the forfeiture clause is that the parties intended thereby to emphasize their previously manifested intention that the $700 should be an advance payment of the last three months' rent, to be retained by the lessors in any event—to be retained by them as money unconditionally owned by them, regardless of whether the lease ran its full term of three years or was sooner terminated on account of the lessee's default.

[3, 4] We come now to appellant's second point—his claim that he is entitled to an abatement of the accrued rents in diminution of the amounts fixed in the contract. There was no shortgage in the area of the land actually leased to appellant. The finding of the trial court that the leased premises contain "80 acres, more or less," does not necessarily imply that the tract contained less than 80 acres. The words "more or less," when used in a description of land in connection with quantity or as qualifying distances, are but words of safety and precaution, intended to cover the possibility of some slight and unimportant inaccuracy, and do not weaken or destroy such indications of quantity or distance when no other guides are furnished. Oakes v. De Lancey, 133 N. Y. 227, 30 N. E. 974, 28 Am. St. Rep. 628. See, also, Hills v. Edmund Peycke Co., 14 Cal. App. 32, 110 P. 1088. Indeed, the evidence shows that the leased premises, the south half of the west half of tract 77, contained exactly 80 acres. In his brief filed in this court appellant admits that "there were 80 acres of land in the tract leased." What he does claim is, not that there was a shortage in the area of the land leased, but that there was a failure of title to 11 acres, more or less, because that amount of acreage was burdened with servitudes for the use of ditches and canals and the road which ran along them. But physical and visible burdens of that sort afford no ground for an abatement of the stipulated rent. The lessee, who saw the ditches, canals, and roads before he executed the lease, is presumed to have leased the land with notice of the servitudes, and to have made his bargain with knowledge of the inconveniences resulting from them. In Ferguson v. Edgar, 178 Cal. 17, 171 P. 1061, the court had under consideration the question as to whether a public highway and a district canal used to convey water for irrigating a farm, in common with other lands in the district, constituted a burden thereon within the meaning of a covenant against incumbrances. Referring to that covenant, the court said:

"It was not considered as having reference to obvious and physical burdens, permanent in character, such as a state highway [or irrigating canal], the use of which was open and notorious. As to such obvious burden the party proposing to buy, having full knowledge of the servitude and the necessity therefor as a means of egress and ingress to the premises, contracts subject to the physical and visible burden imposed upon the land."

See, also, Jaques v. Tomb, 179 Cal. 444, 177 P. 280; McCarty v. Wilson, 184 Cal. 194, 199, 193 P. 578; Cement Co. v. Land Co., 187 Cal. 175, 201 P. 126; Weller v. Fidelity, etc., Co., 64 S. W. 843, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 1136; Wetherby v. Griswold, 75 Or. 468, 147 P. 388. In Dodds v. Toner, 3 Ind. 427, a farm was conveyed by warranty deed. At the time of the purchase the vendee knew that there was a schoolhouse on a part of the premises, occupied by a school and owned by the school district. In holding that the purchaser was not entitled to any abatement of the purchase price, the court in that case said:

"The purchaser of the farm was entitled to no deduction from the purchase money in this case by way of damages on account of the location of the schoolhouse, as he purchased with notice of its existence, location, and the condition of the title to the ground on which it stood."

The principle enunciated in these cases is equally applicable to the present case.

[5] Appellant claims that before he signed the lease it was represented to him that 80 acres of the land was suitable for the production of alfalfa. But since the leased premises contain the precise amount of acreage called for by the lease, to wit, 80 acres, and since 11 of those 80 acres were occupied by ditches, canals, and roads, it is obvious that appellant, who saw those visible and physical incumbrances, must have known that the whole area of 80 acres could not possibly be put under cultivation. Moreover, he has not pleaded either fraud or mistake. In the absence of fraud or mistake, the written lease, which is complete in itself and which says nothing about the amount of acreage suitable for cultivation, is the controlling evidence of the terms and conditions upon which the property was leased. Its terms cannot be changed by a contemporaneous parol agreement.

The judgment in each case is affirmed.

CHAPMAN v. OSTERGARD. (Civ. 5192.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 10, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 31, 1925.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⊂=229(2) — Good faith necessary to hold under prior recording of subsequent deed.

Plaintiff recorded a quitclaim deed given her by her husband for a valuable consideration, the deed having been recorded before, but given subsequent to a deed to defendant. Plaintiff had participated in proceeds of sale to defendant, knowing money was for property and had acquiesced in continued possession of defendant. Held, plaintiff was not entitled to decree quieting title under Civ. Code, § 1214, requiring that subsequent purchaser must have purchased in good faith.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⊂=242—Burden of proof on plaintiff to show good faith in prior recording of after-acquired deed.

In action to quiet title, where deed was recorded before but acquired subsequent to deed of defendant, burden was on plaintiff to show that purchase was made in good faith and without notice, actual or constructive.

3. Trusts ⊂=44(1)—Actions of plaintiff held to show no contemplation of trust.

Where, after a sale by a husband, the wife claimed the property sold by reason of express trust for advances made by her as against a prior purchaser holding under a subsequently recorded deed, no testimony showing that advances went into property nor that there was any written agreement, held that wife having knowingly received part of proceeds from sale, her actions showed that no trust in the property was contemplated by the parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Katherine C. Chapman against Peter Ostergard. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. J. Hennessy, M. J. Mazuran, and Geo. D. Collins, Jr., all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Pierce & Carlson, of Richmond, and J. E. Rodgers and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. The plaintiff commenced this action to quiet title to certain property situated in El Cerrito park, Contra Costa county. The complaint is in the usual form. The answer denies the material allegations of the complaint and sets up two separate defenses—ownership of the property by the defendant and plaintiff's acceptance of the deed under which she claims with full knowledge of the fact that the property had therefore been conveyed to the defendant, and that he was the owner thereof, and that the plaintiff did not purchase the lands in good faith or for a valuable consideration. The cause was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff has appealed from the judgment on a record prepared under the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The facts of the case are that on the 16th day of March, 1922, the defendant entered into possession of the premises under a written lease executed by the then owner, Edwin Chew, and dated the 1st day of April, 1922, by which the premises were leased to the defendant for a period of one year from the 1st day of March, 1922, at the yearly rental of $540. One of the covenants of the lease was that, if the defendant at any time during the term of the lease or within 30 days after the expiration thereof "shall be minded to purchase the leased premises, the above amount paid as rent shall apply on the purchase price." On March 8, 1922, the said Chew executed and delivered to the defendant his receipt for the sum of $475 on account of the rental of the premises. After the defendant's occupancy began, he paid the further sum of $25, making the full sum of $500 paid on account of rental, and which was afterwards applied to the purchase price in the manner hereinafter stated. He immediately made numerous improvements on the premises which he occupied as his home, and frequently stated to the plaintiff that he intended to live on the place and that he intended to purchase it from Chew. The place had been previously occupied as the home of the plaintiff and said Chew, the plaintiff having recently been divorced from her husband, who was at that time confined in the county jail following a conviction for some misdemeanor. When the plaintiff and Chew removed from the premises for the purpose of giving possession to the defendant, plaintiff left in the house some of her household possessions.

After her former husband had been released from confinement, he returned to the premises and removed some of these household goods and placed them in storage. The plaintiff, however, claimed that some of her possessions had been left in the house and called frequently at the place while defendant was in possession for the purpose of securing what she claimed had been left behind. At these times she had conversations with the defendant in which he gave her to understand that he intended to exercise the option contained in the lease and to purchase the property for his own home. On April 21, 1922, a letter was mailed from the office of one of plaintiff's attorneys in the city of San Francisco to the defendant, and on the behalf of the plaintiff, in which the defendant was notified that the plaintiff claimed some interest in the property and that any conveyance thereof or any payment thereon from Chew, without the signature of the plaintiff, or that of one of her attorneys, would be treated as fraudulent by the plaintiff. In the same letter the defendant was given further notice "that any agreement to sell said property made and executed by and between Mr. Chew and yourself * * * will also be treated as being made for the express purpose to defraud Mrs. Chapman of her interest in said property." This letter was delivered to the wife of the defendant on the 25th of April, 1922, and she immediately turned it over to Chew and the evidence is that its contents were not brought to the attention of the defendant. On the same day, the defendant and Chew met at the Mechanics' Bank in the city of Richmond and completed the transaction for the sale of the premises. Chew executed his grant, bargain, and sale deed, and delivered the same to the defendant, who at the same time delivered his promissory note in the sum of $1,000, payable on or before the 1st day of July, 1922. The defendant immediately delivered his deed to an officer of the Mechanics' Bank, to whom he advanced sufficient funds for the payment of the internal revenue taxes and for the recordation of the instrument, and who, in turn, promised to see that it was duly recorded. Thereafter, and on April 27th, the said Chew executed and delivered to the plaintiff a deed purporting to convey all his right, title, and interest in and to the said property to the plaintiff. This document, which is in the usual form of a grant, bargain, and sale deed, contains a paragraph inserted between the conveying clause and the description of the lands purported to be conveyed, which reads as follows:

"All my right, title, and interest which I may now have or hereafter acquire in all real, personal and mixed property of whatever kind or nature or wheresoever situate."

This deed was duly recorded on the 4th day of May, 1922, and the prior deed executed to the defendant was duly recorded on the day following. The consideration for the deed to the plaintiff was found to be the sum of $1,500, part of which the plaintiff testified she had advanced to Chew in small amounts over a considerable period of time following his purchase of the property, and part of which she claimed for board and lodging of Chew while she was living with him. The trial court also found that prior to the making and execution of the deed from Chew to plaintiff she did not make any inquiry from the defendant or any other person concerning what interests or right the defendant had in the premises and that "at the time she received the aforesaid deed from Chew (she) had no actual notice or knowledge that Chew had previously conveyed the said premises to Ostergard."

There are further facts appearing in the record upon which the trial court did not find, which are important as bearing upon the issue raised by the defendant that the plaintiff had constructive knowledge of defendant's interests and that she was not a purchaser in good faith. In this connection it was shown that the plaintiff had been informed of the existence of the lease by both Chew and the defendant; that she had been frequently informed of defendant's intention to exercise the option contained in the lease and to purchase the property; that as early as April 21, 1922, she knew, or at least had reason to believe, that a sale was contemplated and that an agreement for sale existed between Chew and the defendant, as on that date she attempted to notify the defendant through her attorney that she would treat the agreement to sell, as well as any contemplated conveyance, as a fraud on her; that within a day or two after the execution of the deed to the defendant—April 25th—the plaintiff discussed the transaction with Mr. Downer, president of the Mechanics' Bank of Richmond, informed him that the property had been transferred to the defendant, and stated that it would be necessary for her to consult her attorneys in order to protect her interests. It is in the testimony of this witness also that during this conversation nothing was said by the plaintiff regarding any deed having been made to her, and the inference may be properly drawn that the entire conversation took place prior to the date of the execution of the deed of Chew to the plaintiff. In addition to this it appears that the deed from Chew to the plaintiff was executed in the office of one of plaintiff's attorneys, who witnessed its execution, and that this deed contained the insertion not common to an ordinary grant, bargain, and sale deed to the effect that the grantor was conveying all his "right, title, and interest" which he might have in the property.

The actions of the plaintiff, subsequent to the execution and delivery of the two deeds, have an important bearing upon the issue of good faith on the part of the plaintiff, particularly as this is an action in equity in which the element of good faith is of first importance. It appears that, immediately after the passing of the deeds, Chew began to make insistent demands upon the defendant for moneys on account of the balance of the purchase price which was evidenced by the defendant's promissory note due July 1, 1922. These calls were made almost daily and payments were made to Chew in small amounts, either by the defendant directly or by his agent. On nearly all of these occasions the plaintiff was present with Chew and frequently took from Chew a part of the money which he received from the defendant. On other occasions the plaintiff would come herself to the home of the defendant and wait for the arrival of Chew for the purpose of collecting money from the defendant. The evidence is that the plaintiff knew at all times that these moneys which the defendant paid to Chew were being paid on account of the purchase price of the premises, and that she participated in the fruits thereof. On May 20, 1922, the defendant's note was paid in full and canceled, and Chew executed to the defendant his receipt for the payment of the full sum of $3,000. This transaction consisted of the payment to Chew by the defendant of $300 in cash, the delivery to him of a draft in the sum of $500, payable upon a bank in the city of Ukiah, and the delivery to him of an automobile valued at $700. It does not appear that the plaintiff was present on this occasion, but it does appear that immediately thereafter Chew went to Ukiah and that on his return, some time in July, he delivered to the plaintiff an automobile. On May 29, 1922, Chew executed to plaintiff an assignment of all moneys due or to become due him from the defendant arising out of the sale of the property in controversy, and on June 1st of the same year appointed and designated one of the plaintiff's attorneys as his attorney in fact and at law for the purpose of enabling said attorney to appear for said Chew in all matters, legal or criminal, and particularly in the matter of Chew against this defendant, to demand, sue for, or collect all sums of money which may be owing to said Chew. This power of attorney was made irrevocable, because it conferred upon the said attorney an equal one-half of the value of what he might recover. Notice of the execution of this document was served upon the defendant by letter addressed to him by the said attorney, acting as attorney in fact and attorney at law for both Mr. Chew and Mrs. Chapman.

[1, 2] It is argued on the part of the appellant that because of the provisions of section 1214, Civil Code, her deed having been recorded prior to that of the respondent, the latter is void and she is, therefore, entitled to a decree quieting her title to the property. The priority of appellant's recordation is not disputed, and the trial court found that the conveyance was made for a valuable consideration, a finding which is binding upon the respondent on this appeal, because there is some evidence which supports it. However, an essential requirement of the Code section is that the subsequent purchaser must have purchased in good faith. Upon this issue, the trial court did not make any finding, and we are unable to conceive, in view of all the facts above related, how, if the trial court had made a finding on that issue, it could have been favorable to the appellant. Unquestionably, the burden of proof is on the appellant to show that she had made the purchase in good faith and without notice, actual or constructive. The rule is laid down in Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 163, 167, 3 P. 641, 644, where the court say:

"To entitle a party to protection as such a purchaser he must aver and prove the possession of his grantor, the purchase of the premises, the payment of the purchase money in good faith, and without notice, actual or constructive, prior to and down to the time of its payment."

This rule has been approved in all the later authorities which are aptly discussed by Mr. Justice Shaw in Bell v. Pleasant, 145 Cal. 410, 78 P. 957, 104 Am. St. Rep. 61.

The purpose of the Code section is to protect the innocent and bona fide purchaser from one who may procure a deed with an earlier date for the purpose of defrauding the other. It was never intended that the section should be applied to defraud one, who has in good faith and for a valuable consideration purchased property, and who has delayed placing his conveyance of record. The trial court here found that, at the time of the execution of the appellant's deed, she did not have actual knowledge of the existence of respondent's deed, and that she did not take her conveyance for the purpose of defrauding the respondent. However, it did not find that the appellant did not have constructive notice of the existence of respondent's conveyance or that she was acting in good faith. From the reading of the entire record, we are inclined to believe that the finding of the trial court as to the want of actual notice on the part of the appellant was a more favorable finding than she was entitled to, but as we have said, there being some evidence to support it, we must accept that finding as conclusive here. There is no escape from the conclusion, however, that if she did not have actual notice of the existence of respondent's conveyance she had every opportunity to obtain knowledge of that fact, and furthermore, that if she did not have actual notice thereof prior to the execution of her own conveyance she certainly did have actual notice before she recorded it. The fact that, when Chew executed his conveyance to her in the presence of her attorney, he inserted the paragraph which is commonly known as a "quitclaim" clause, or a safety valve to relieve the grantor from the responsibility of a fraudulent conveyance of a title which he did not possess, cannot be viewed in any other light than that the appellant and her counsel (who were also the counsel for Chew) knew or had some intimation that Chew was not legally capable of passing to the appellant a clear title. In addition to this, all the subsequent acts of the appellant, her participation in the fruits of the sale, her acquiescence in respect to the continued possession and improvement of the premises, compel the inference which we must draw in support of the judgment that she was not acting in good faith.

[3] On this appeal the appellant has raised for the first time the point that the facts show the existence of an express trust concerning the property wherein Chew was the trustee and the appellant was the beneficiary. This claim is based upon the testimony of the appellant, which was brought out on cross-examination, and which is to the effect that when Chew purchased the property, in October, 1921, he told the appellant that he would give her half of it. This agreement, the appellant testified, was made after Chew purchased the property. There was no testimony that the appellant advanced any of the money that went into the property; there was nothing to show the creation of a constructive trust, and there was no evidence showing any writing of any nature indicating the creation of an express trust. Upon the testimony of the appellant, she bases her claim at this time that an express trust was created, and argues that the statutory provisions requiring such trusts to be in writing are not applicable here, because they merely fix a rule of evidence governing the manner of the proof of agreements creating trusts in realty. It would serve no purpose to discuss the rules of law involved, because the facts show indisputably that the appellant did not at any time during the entire transaction, nor at the time of the trial in the court below, believe or understand that any trust had been created and no intimation of the purpose to claim the existence of such a trust was made at the time of the trial so that the respondent would be enabled to meet it with evidence. From the reading of the entire record, the conclusion necessarily follows that the advancements which the appellant made to Chew were in the most cases simply gifts which she did not expect to be returned; that no proof was made of any promise to repay any of these advancements to Chew at the time, and no writing of any kind was produced by the appellant, either acknowledging receipt of any of these moneys by Chew or obligating him to pay them. We cannot escape the conclusion that any promise which he made to her regarding the property was nothing more than an agreement to secure her for some of the moneys advanced, and all the circumstances leading up to the transaction of April 27th and following indicate that these transactions were had for the same purpose, particularly as the amount claimed to be due by the appellant was $1,500, whereas the admitted value of the property conveyed on April 27th was $7,000, upon which was a bank mortgage of $4,000, executed by Chew alone. The actions of the appellant, in accepting the moneys and the automobile from Chew after the sale, are alone sufficient to negative any theory that a trust in the property was contemplated by the parties at any time prior to this litigation.

The outstanding consideration in the case is that the appellant failed to sustain the burden of proof that the conveyance to her was taken in good faith and without constructive knowledge, at least, of the interests of the respondent. Though the trial court did not find upon either of these issues, we are unable to conceive from the evidence how any finding could have been made favorable to the appellant. This being an action in equity, and the burden of proof being upon the appellant to prove the equities in her favor, we must assume in support of the judgment that the trial court would have found against her if a finding had been made. She is not, therefore, injured by the failure to find thereon. Hulen v. Stuart, 191 Cal. 562, 572, 217 P. 750.

ESTES v. DELPECH. (Civ. 5117.)

1. Evidence ⟸441(9)—Contemporaneous parol agreement modifying written contract not a defense, under Code, to action on contract.

In an action to rescind a written contract for purchase of one-half interest in business, defense that plaintiff had failed to perform a contemporaneous parol agreement to devote full time to business, not omitted from contract by mistake, cannot be made under Civ. Code, §§ 1625, 1698, prohibiting modification by parol of terms of written contract.

2. Partnership ⟸21—Defendant held not justified in refusing to complete sale.

In an action to rescind contract for sale of one-half interest in business, where, as trial court found, there was no alleged oral agreement to devote full time to the business, but an intended subsequent agreement relative to the conduct of business never entered into, the defendant was not justified in refusing to complete sale.

3. Partnership ⟸108—Recovery of money between partners in a personal business transaction proper without partnership accounting.

Money paid by plaintiff to defendant in a personal business transaction, though used in partnership business, may be recovered from defendant without necessity of a partnership accounting.

4. Payment ⟸89(1)—Judgment for money paid, plus agreed value of car, part of consideration of contract, proper, though car sold for less.

In an action to recover money paid on a contract, where the consideration was cash and a car accepted at an agreed value, but which defendant sold for less, a judgment for the plaintiff for cash paid and agreed value of car was proper.

KNIGHT, J. An appeal by defendant from an adverse judgment, given in an action brought by plaintiff as vendee for the rescission of an executory contract for the sale of a one-half interst in a food products business, including certain merchandise, formulas, and recipes thereunto belonging, and to recover purchase money previously paid thereunder. The agreed purchase price was $1,250, and of that amount the vendor, by the terms of the contract, acknowledged having received $1,150 at the time the contract was signed. Said contract provided that title to the interest in the property agreed to be sold should remain in the vendor until the full amount of the purchase price was paid, but that the vendee should "have the possession thereof and be entitled to half the net profits thereof after all expenses and rents in connection therewith were paid"; that upon full payment of the purchase price being made, the vendor should execute and deliver a bill of sale transferring to said vendee one-half interest in said property, and that thereupon title to the same should pass to the vendee; that if said vendee defaulted in making full payment, then the vendor was entitled to retake possession of said one-half interest and retain as liquidated damages all payments previously made.

The complaint alleged that, within the period of time specified in said contract, plaintiff tendered to defendant the balance of the purchase price with interest, and demanded a bill of sale transferring to him said interest in said business, but that defendant refused to accept said tender, and likewise refused to execute or deliver a bill of sale; that thereupon, and on May 12, 1923, plaintiff served notice of rescission of the contract, demanded return of the sum of $1,150 and offered to surrender to defendant everything he had received from defendant, "and otherwise to do all things necessary to restore defendant to the position he had occupied when said contract was made, but defendant refused to comply with plaintiff's demand." Said complaint further alleged that plaintiff performed all obligations and conditions to be performed by him under said agreement, and "is ready and willing to relinquish and restore to defendant as the court may direct all right, title, or interest in and to the said property described in said agreement, which may have accrued to plaintiff by reason of said agreement or otherwise."

Defendant does not dispute the execution of the contract, or the tender by plaintiff of the balance due on the purchase price within the agreed time, or that he refused to accept the same, but he contends that such refusal was justified upon the following grounds: That said contract, in effect, created a partnership between them in relation to the operation of said business; that in addition to the stipulations contained in said contract, it was orally agreed between them that each should devote his entire time to said business, but that owing to a mutual mistake said oral agreement was not made a part of said written contract; that plaintiff failed to devote his entire time to said business, and consequently had not performed his part of said contract, and was not entitled to consummate the purchase.

[1, 2] It would appear that defendant's refusal to complete the sale upon the grounds urged cannot be sustained for two reasons: First, "the rule is elementary that a parol agreement, made at the time of the execution of a written instrument, which upon its face is a complete expression of the agreement of the parties, cannot be introduced for the purpose of modifying or contradicting the terms of such instrument. The rule is one of wide application, and requires no citation of authority for its support. Where parties have deliberately put their agreement in writing in such language as imports a legal obligation, it is conclusively presumed that the whole engagement and the extent and manner of their undertaking is there expressed. This rule has found expression in our Code (Civ. Code, §§ 1625, 1698), and, according to modern authority, has been held to be not one of evidence merely but also one of positive substantive law. Harding v. Robinson, 175 Cal. 534 (166 P. 808)." Lindemann v. Coryell, 59 Cal. App. 788, 212 P. 47. See, also, Code Civ. Proc. § 1856; Dollar v. International Banking Corporation, 13 Cal. App. 331, 109 P. 499; Fleming v. Law, 163 Cal. 227, 124 P. 1018. Secondly, although the trial court liberally allowed defendant to testify as to the existence of said oral agreement, it expressly found that it was not true that it was agreed that each party should give his entire time to said partnership business, or that the omission to include such a provision in the contract was due to mutual mistake, the court further finding in this regard that the parties "intended to make another and subsequent agreement relative to the conduct of said business, which should prescribe the services to be rendered to such business by plaintiff and defendant, but that such other subsequent agreement was never made or entered into." It is therefore apparent that defendant's refusal to accept the balance of the purchase price and to complete the sale upon the strength of said oral agreement was not justified under either the law or the facts.

[3] Further contention is made by defendant that the court was precluded from giving judgment in the action until a partnership accounting was had, it being claimed in this connection that the amount paid by plaintiff on the purchase price was, with plaintiff's knowledge and consent, used by defendant in the operation of said business, and that therefore there was nothing due plaintiff. Even assuming, as defendant contends, that a partnership in fact existed, we are unable to sustain defendant's contention that an accounting was essential to the rendition of judgment herein, for the reason that this action involved only a personal business affair between the parties themselves as distinguished from a partnership transaction. In re Bull v. Coe, 77 Cal. 54, 18 P. 808, 11 Am. St. Rep. 235, it is said:

"It is well settled in this state, as elsewhere, that one partner cannot sue another upon a demand arising out of the partnership transactions, in the absence of a settlement of the accounts. But by the terms of this rule it does not apply where the transaction is not a partnership matter. And it seems plain that a loan from one partner to another is not a partnership transaction, notwithstanding the fact that the borrower intends to put the money into the firm, and does so. Accordingly, it is well settled that the lender in such a case can maintain an action for the recovery of the money, although there has been no settlement of the partnership accounts. Currier v. Webster, 45 N. H. 226; Crater v. Bininger, 45 N. Y. 545; Morgan v. Nunes, 54 Miss. 312, 313; Scott v. Campbell, 30 Ala. 730; Grigsby v. Nance, 3 Ala. 350, 351; Terrill v. Richards, 1 Nott & McC. (S. C.) 20."

To the same effect are Arnheim v. Gordon, 21 Cal. App. 754, 132 P. 840, 30 Cyc. 465, 467; Bates on Partnership, §§ 868, 874, 875. It is true that the indebtedness here sued upon was not in its nature a loan, but on principle it amounted to the same thing, for the action was based upon a personal indebtedness due from defendant to plaintiff arising from the rescission of the contract by plaintiff. The case at bar is even farther removed from the rule of accounting than were either of the cases of Bull v. Coe, supra, or Arnheim v. Gordon, supra, because the evidence here does not show, as it did in those cases, that the parties intended that the purchase money should be invested in the business.

We are also unable to accede to the propposition made by defendant that plaintiff was not entitled to rescind because plaintiff had collected and withheld the sum of $48 belonging to said business. This matter is disposed of by the finding of the trial court to the effect that plaintiff offered to pay said sum to defendant when he gave notice of rescission, and that defendant refused to accept the same. This amount was in fact afterwards deducted from the sum found by the court to be due plaintiff, and the judgment in plaintiff's favor did not include that sum.

[4] Lastly, defendant complains that the judgment directs him to pay plaintiff $1,102 with interest, which represents the amount defendant acknowledged in said contract as having received from plaintiff, less the sum of $48 collected and retained by plaintiff whereas the evidence shows that the sum of $1,150 for which plaintiff was given credit was made up of the sum of $500 in cash and the transfer to him of an automobile, which he has since sold for the sum of $500. We think the judgment proper, for the reason that the court found upon sufficient evidence that, when the contract was signed, said automobile was of the value of $650, and defendant at that time agreed to accept it as part payment of the purchase price for that amount.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error ⊜1002—Conflict in evidence, as to request for medical attendance and knowledge of physical condition, concluded by verdict.

In an action for damages for breach of contract to furnish plaintiff with medical treatment resulting in his illness, where evidence was conflicting as to whether plaintiff requested medical treatment or advised any one of his condition, this question was concluded by the verdict.

2. Master and servant ⊜77 — Employer not liable for failure to give medical aid in absence of request.

An employer, contracting to furnish employee with medical treatment, is not liable for failure to furnish such treatment in absence of request for medical aid or knowledge of employee's physical condition, there being no affirmative duty to investigate health of employees.

3. Master and servant ⊜77—Instruction on negligence in contracting disease held proper.

In action for damages for breach of contract to furnish plaintiff with medical treatment, instruction that, if plaintiff contracted tuberculosis through own gross negligence, and failure to exercise due care, he cannot recover was proper.

4. Master and servant ⊜77—Cause of illness question for jury.

Question, as to whether or not plaintiff contracted illness through failure to make his condition known, was one of fact for the jury.

5. Master and servant ⊜77—Evidence properly admitted to disprove testimony as to illness.

In action for damages for breach of contract to furnish employee medical attendance where employee's wife testified that he had never had a cough prior to his employment, evidence by fellow employees that he had suffered from a cough was properly admitted.

6. Trial ⊜304—No misconduct in jury filing letter with court requesting defendant to aid plaintiff's family.

Jury's letter, filed with trial court requesting defendant to aid plaintiff's family held not misconduct affecting verdict for defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by I. C. Kleppe against the Alaska Packers' Association. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Plaintiff having died since the rendition of the judgment, Chas. G. Willey, his executor, was substituted as appellant. Judgment affirmed.

H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Chickering & Gregory and Donald M. Gregory, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to recover the sum of $50,000 as damages for the alleged failure of defendant to provide plaintiff with medical and surgical necessities according to the terms of a contract, through which default it is claimed plaintiff contracted tuberculosis.

The complaint alleges that the breach of contract occurred under the following circumstances: On or about April 3, 1922, plaintiff was hired and employed by defendant corporation to serve in the capacity of mate of a certain vessel owned by it and known as the "Star of Finland." The vessel was on a voyage from San Francisco to a salmon cannery located at a place called Alitak, on Kodiak Island, in the territory of Alaska. Under the terms of employment, plaintiff, while in Alaska, was to work as master on a launch called the "Goney."

The shipping articles, among other things, contained a provision that all parties of the second part, of whom plaintiff was one, should "receive medical and surgical attendance and medical and surgical necessities" while engaged under the contract. The complaint charges that, while working on the "Goney" at Alitak, plaintiff was compelled to leave the last-named place at 4 o'clock in the morning and make a 50-mile trip each day, and that defendant did not provide plaintiff at such times with proper food, as the contract of employment required; that he usually returned from these trips at about 7 o'clock in the evening, after meal times, and, generally, he had nothing to eat or drink but coffee and bread, which was not proper food for the work he had to perform, and in consequence of which his system ran down and his vitality became of a very low ebb, which prevented him from resisting any sickness that he contracted or might contract; that on or about the 14th day of August, 1922, while working on the "Goney" under these conditions and with an impaired vitality, he contracted a severe cold, which he was unable to throw off; that he applied to the superintendent and agent of defendant at Alitak for medicine, but was refused the same, although he was in need thereof; that about two weeks thereafter the superintendent did furnish the same to him, but in an insufficient quantity, at which time his cold was worse, and by reason of this lack of medicine and medical attention the cold settled on his lungs and developed into tuberculosis, which it is averred, has become permanent; that upon his return to San Francisco plaintiff went under the care of a physician, and was, at the time of the filing of the complaint, in a hospital.

The answer admits the employment but denies any failure on the part of defendant corporation to provide plaintiff with proper food, and denies that he was compelled to work at unreasonable hours, or that defendant ever refused to furnish him with proper medical or medicinal attention.

Trial was had before a jury, which resulted in a verdict in favor of the defendant corporation. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and this is an appeal from the judgment and order.

Since the rendition of the judgment, Kleppe has died and his executor, Charles G. Willey, has been substituted as plaintiff. As ground for reversal it is first urged that the verdict is against the evidence, as it shows that defendant corporation breached its contract in failing to furnish plaintiff with the proper medical attendance and treatment that its contract and the maritime law demanded.

[1] The record discloses that plaintiff entered into the employment with defendant corporation as alleged in his complaint. That upon arriving at Alitak station he took charge of the "Goney" as master and proceeded to perform his duties. He testified that he contracted a cold and applied to the superintendent for some medicine to relieve it, but the same was not furnished him for some two weeks thereafter. He further testified, in substance, that he was compelled to work at unusual hours without proper food and under conditions that aggravated his complaint, in consequence of which he developed tuberculosis. He admitted that he made no request to be sent to a hospital, as he did not think he was sick enough to be there. Defendant introduced evidence to disprove that plaintiff was obliged to work at unreasonable hours or that he was not furnished with sufficient or proper food. In this connection other evidence was introduced to show that the "Goney," of which plaintiff was master, was used by the corporation to bring fish from fish traps located about 25 miles from the cannery; that on the route to these traps there was located a station about 14 miles from the cannery, where the corporation maintained a kitchen under the supervision of a cook, where food could be procured at all times, and that plaintiff had on occasions availed himself of this opportunity and had never complained of the food furnished. It also appeared that the "Goney" was supplied with provisions. The log book, kept in the handwriting of plaintiff, showed that except upon two occasions plaintiff had not been compelled to work at unusual hours; that he generally left the cannery about 6 a. m. and returned between 2 and 3 o'clock in the afternoon. It also appears that defendant operates, in connection with its business in Alaska, some eight medical stations and five hospitals, comfortably fitted with modern appliances and plentifully supplied with drugs and surgical instruments, and that it employs eight physicians, besides nurses and orderlies. There was other testimony to show that there was at all times a medicine chest at Alitak, but that plaintiff never asked for medicine or in any manner attempted to avail himself of these advantages. The physician whose duty it was to visit the cannery at Alitak denied that plaintiff had ever applied to him for medicine or advice, and that he never refused medicine to any employee who asked for it. The testimony of the superintendent was to the same effect. There being a conflict in the evidence upon the subject as to whether or not plaintiff had ever requested medicine or whether he advised any one of his condition, this question is concluded by the verdict.

[2] The case, therefore, so far as this court is concerned, presents the question as to whether or not defendant corporation was liable in damages for failure to furnish plaintiff with medical treatment in the absence of a request so to do, and where there was nothing to bring to the knowledge of the corporation that such service was required, for apart from his own testimony that he requested aid there is no evidence that any knowledge of his condition was brought home to the officials or agents of the corporation. In other words, was the corporation, under its contract, bound to affirmatively make an investigation of the health of its employees in absence of a demand so to do? We do not think that any such duty rested upon it. If the ailment or injury suffered was of such a character as to be perfectly apparent that aid was required to relieve it, there can be no question but that it would be the duty of the corporation to furnish aid, even though it was not asked for. The Iroquois, 194 U. S. 240–246, 24 S. Ct. 640, 48 L. Ed. 955. But where, as here, plaintiff himself did not consider himself sick, and made no complaint nor asked for aid or assistance, the corporation was not bound to acquaint itself at its peril of plaintiff's latent ailment. The law imposes no such duty upon an employer, and it would be an unreasonable construction of the contract to hold that defendant corporation was, by reason thereof, under a legal contractual obligation to examine, from time to time, every one of its employees, which the evidence shows to be numerous, to ascertain if they might be suffering from some secret affliction. To so hold would be to declare an employer, under such circumstances, an insurer of the health of his employees. Such is not the law.

Complaint is made of many of the instructions to the jury. The trial court was of the opinion that defendant was under no obligation to furnish plaintiff with medical attention, unless it was asked for by him, in the absence of information sufficient to put it upon inquiry, and so instructed the jury.

[3] Most of the instructions complained of have to do with this question, and upon examination we see no errors in any of them. The jury was further instructed that if it believed from the evidence that plaintiff contracted tuberculosis by reason of his own gross negligence and failure to exercise proper care for his own health, he was not entitled to recover.

[4] The instruction was a proper one. A shipowner is not liable for damages on account of the sickness of a seaman where his gross negligence was a contributory cause of his sickness. The question as to whether or not plaintiff had contracted the disease complained of through failure to make his condition known was one of fact for the jury. 5 Labatt's Master & Serv., § 2008.

[5] It is next claimed that the court erred in admitting evidence showing that plaintiff was suffering from a cough prior to his employment by defendant. It appeared in evidence that plaintiff had been employed by defendant in the same capacity and at the same place for three years prior to 1922. His wife testified that up to the date last mentioned, plaintiff never had a cough and his physical condition had been good during their marriage relation, a period of some 10 years. To disprove this testimony, defendant produced fellow employees of plaintiff, who testified that they had known him prior to 1922, and that he always had a cough. Under these circumstances, the admission of this evidence was proper.

[6] And finally, plaintiff complains of misconduct of the jury. The claimed misconduct consisted in the jury filing with the trial court a letter addressed to the defendant corporation requesting it to assist plaintiff's family. This act in no manner affected the verdict, which embodied the conclusion of the jury on questions of fact litigated upon the trial. That the members of the jury, moved undoubtedly by compassion, made such request in no manner qualified or affected their verdict.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PACE. (Cr. 1202.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 10, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 5, 1925.)

1. Constitutional law ⟸87, 240(1), 296(1)—Licenses ⟸7(1)—Act requiring broker's license by owner if he desires to sell his stock in several sales held unconstitutional.

Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 9(a), as amended by St. 1923, p. 89, § 1, making the requirement for license as broker applicable to owner of securities not the issuer thereof, if he desires to sell his stock in more than one transaction, is in violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, and Const. Cal. art. 1, §§ 1, 13, as contravening right to enjoy, acquire, and protect private property.

2. Constitutional law ⟸87—Police power cannot be exercised by Legislature to interfere with sale of private property, though beneficial.

The Legislature cannot exercise its police power under guise of "general welfare" so as to interfere with sale by individual of his own lawfully acquired property, regardless of beneficial results to the public.

3. Constitutional law ⟸87—Act not upheld as a mode of regulating disposal of property, where it contains power to prohibit sale.

Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 9(a), as amended by St. 1923, p. 89, § 1, requiring one to obtain broker's permit, issued only on showing of good business reputation, if he desires to dispose of his stock at successive sales, is more than a regulation of mode of disposing of property, since it gives power to prohibit sale of one's securities, on refusal of permit, and this comes under rule that act is unconstitutional if broad enough to authorize unconstitutional act.

4. Constitutional law ⟸87—Act strengthening legislative control over sale of securities does not justify invasion of rights in private property.

The difficulties of proper enforcement of Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 9, as amended by St. 1923, p. 89, § 1, making more effective legislative control over sale of securities, does not justify invasion of private property rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

5. Constitutional law ⇐240(1)—Act prohibiting successive sales of stock by owner without license, but permitting single sale, unconstitutional.

Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 9, as amended by St. 1923, p. 89, § 1, permitting owner of securities not the issuer thereof to sell them without license in one sale, but not in successive sales, is in violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, as denying the equal protection of law to owners desiring to sell their stock in several sales.

6. Statutes ⇐47—Act prohibiting successive sales of stock by owners without license unstitutional as indefinite.

Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 9, as amended by St. 1923, p. 89, § 1, prohibiting owner of stock not the issuer thereof from selling same without license, at "repeated and successive transactions of like or similar character," is unconstitutional as indefinite and uncertain.

HAHN, Justice pro tem. The defendant in this case was accused by the district attorney of the crime of violating the Corporate Securities Act, committed as follows:

"That the said S. A. Pace on or about the 28th day of November, 1923, at and in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously engage, either wholly or in part, in the business of selling, offering for sale, negotiating for the sale of, and otherwise dealing in securities and securities issued by others, and of underwriting issue of securities and of purchasing such securities with the purpose of reselling them and offering them for sale to the public, to wit, as follows: Shares of stock in the United Candy Shops Corporation, a corporation. And the said S. A. Pace was not then and there an agent of the said United Candy Shops Corporation, a corporation, and did not then and there have any permit from the commissioner of corporations of the state of California as a broker, or otherwise, so to do."

The case was submitted to the jury upon a stipulation of facts based upon the testimony given and the evidence introduced at the preliminary hearing. From this stipulation the following material facts may be gleaned: That the United Candy Shops was a corporation formed under the laws of the state of California; that some time prior to March 8, 1923, (the exact dates not appearing in the stipulation), the commissioner of corporations of California issued an original and several supplemental permits granting to the United Candy Shops permission to sell certain portions of its capital stock; that these permits were all revoked on March 8, 1923; that the defendant, S. A. Pace, was granted a broker's permit on February 21, 1922, which entitled him to sell securities; that this permit was revoked on December 8, 1922; that the defendant was a director of the United Candy Shops and, some time in the month of February, 1923, was elected president of the corporation; that during the period that the permits to sell stock and the defendant's permit as a broker were in full force and effect, a number of subscriptions to treasury stock of the United Candy Shops were obtained and some of this stock was sold to purchasers on time payments. It would appear that the defendant made some of these sales on time contracts. The method pursued in connection with the partial payment contracts was for the purchaser to make the first payment in cash and give a promissory note for the balance of the purchase price. Thereupon the stock was issued in the name of the purchaser and indorsed in blank by the purchaser, and then returned to the corporation to be held as collateral security for the payment of the note. In a number of these contract sales the purchasers defaulted in their payments, and, the company being in need of cash, the defendant purchased from the company a number of these notes that were in default, paying to the company in cash the balance remaining unpaid, and thereupon the notes were assigned by the corporation to the defendant, and the collateral also delivered with the notes. Thereafter the defendant, by reason of the terms and conditions contained in the notes, dealt with this collateral stock as though it was his own stock, and disposed of at least a portion of this stock so acquired in 16 different sales covering a period of about 5 months. It does not appear whether he sold all or only a part of the stock so acquired. All of these sales were made after the permits issued to the corporation to sell stock had been revoked, and also after the permit issued to the defendant to act as broker had been revoked. It appears further from the stipulation that in practically all of these 16 sales the defendant informed the purchasers that the stock that they were buying was not treasury stock, but was being transferred to them from some individual, whose name, however, was not given by the defendant to the purchaser. It further appears that the corporation received no part of the money paid by the purchasers, but all of the money paid for this stock was retained by the defendant as his own funds.

It was not contended at the trial, nor is it urged here on appeal, that the defendant was not the bona fide owner of the stock sold; nor does the Attorney General urge that the defendant, either in acquiring any of this stock or in making sales of any of it, was acting for the corporation. No suggestion is made that, in the defendant acquiring and selling this stock, a subterfuge was resorted to in order to avoid the necessity of the corporation procuring a permit.

The appeal before us squarely presents the question as to whether or not an individual, who is a bona fide owner of securities, may lawfully sell such securities, or any part of them, in repeated and successive transactions for like or similar character, without first complying with certain requirements of the Corporate Securities Act required of brokers, and without securing a broker's license. Paragraph 9 of section 2 of the Corporate Securities Act, as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 89, § 1), reads as follows:

"The word 'broker,' as used in this act, includes every person or company, other than an agent, who shall, in this state, engage either wholly or in part in the business of selling, offering for sale, negotiating for the sale of, or otherwise dealing in any 'security' or 'securities' issued by others, or of underwriting any issue of 'securities,' or of purchasing such 'securities' with the purpose of re-selling them, or of offering them for sale to the public. The word 'securities,' as used in this paragraph, includes the following 'securities' issued by 'individuals':

"Any instrument offered to the public by an 'individual' evidencing or representing any right to participate or share in oil, gas or other hydrocarbon substances or other minerals of any sort, as yet undeveloped, or in the proceeds of sale thereof;

"All bonds, debentures and evidence of indebtedness offered to the public by an 'individual.'

"The following are excepted from the provisos of this paragraph:

"(a) Any owner of any security who is not the issuer or an underwriter thereof, who sells or exchanges the same for his own account: Provided, that such sale or exchange is not made in the course of repeated and successive transactions of like or similar character by him. * * *"

Appellant contends that the last clause in subdivision (a), which reads, "provided, that such sale or exchange is not made in the course of repeated and successive transactions of like or similar character by him," is unconstitutional and void for the following reasons:

First. That it violates the guaranties contained in that portion of the fourteenth amendment to the federal Constitution which reads as follows:

"No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Second. That it is in conflict with the declaration of rights as set forth in section 1 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California, which provides that:

"All men are by nature free and independent, and have certain inalienable rights, among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty; acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; and pursuing and obtaining safety and happiness."

Third. That it is also in conflict with that guaranty set forth in the declaration of rights and contained in section 13 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California, which provides that no person shall "be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

Appellant also urges that the clause in question is so indefinite, uncertain, and vague as to be unconstitutional and void.

Supporting counsel for the defendant in urging these contentions, several counsel interested in the question involved, upon permission being granted by this court, have filed briefs as amici curiæ.

It will readily appear from a reading of the portions of the Corporate Securities Act above quoted that any individual who is the owner of securities, and not the issuer or underwriter of them, may dispose of such securities by selling them for his own account, provided that he accomplishes the disposition of them in one transaction or one sale. But if he should find it inconvenient or impossible to dispose of his securities in a satisfactory manner to one purchaser, but should find two or more purchasers who would take them in separate lots, each lot to a separate purchaser and in a separate transaction, but must first secure a broker's license before he may lawfully make more than one sale.

The act further provides that before any individual may secure a broker's license he must make application to the commissioner of corporations, setting forth in such petition certain information concerning himself and the securities which he desires to sell. He must also file with his application a bond in the sum of $5,000, conditioned upon his compliance with the laws of the state of California in making any sales. However, before the broker's permit may be issued to him, the commissioner must satisfy himself that the petitioner is a man of "good business reputation." If the commissioner should not be satisfied that the applicant possesses a "good business reputation," or if, perchance, he concludes that the business reputation of the applicant is bad, he must refuse to issue a broker's license to the applicant; and, further, if at any time after the issuance of the permit to the broker, the commissioner shall ascertain or conclude that the holder of the permit is a man of "bad business repute," or has violated any provision of the Corporate Securities Act, or has engaged in or is about to engage in any fraudulent transaction, the commissioner of corporations may revoke the broker's permit.

[1] If the provision of the Corporate Securities Act under consideration is a proper exercise by the Legislature of its constitutional power, then this situation may and would inevitably arise: A. and B. are each the owner of $25,000 in par value of bonds, stocks, or other securities; each is desirous of disposing of these securities. A. may be fortunate in having a banking or other connection to which he is able to dispose of all of his securities in one sale or transaction. In such event he would not be required to file an application for a broker's permit, or go to the trouble and expense of furnishing a $5,000 bond. Moreover, he might be a man of a most unsavory business reputation, and stand charged with, or even convicted of, all the crimes enumerated in the decalogue. Without any hindrance or control, the act permits him to exercise his inalienable right to thus dispose of his own property. B., for reasons that might in no way reflect upon his business integrity, honesty, or good character, may not have such a business connection or acquaintance that would enable him to dispose of all of his securities in one sale, but he might be able to make satisfactory disposition of them to two or more purchasers in as many different transactions. After he has made the first sale, he cannot make a second or succeeding sale until he has first filed his application for a broker's permit, posted a $5,000 bond, paid the commissioner's fee, and awaited a sufficient time to enable the commissioner to ascertain whether his business reputation is good or bad. If the commissioner is satisfied with his business reputation, after waiting an indefinite period—as there is no time limit provided in the act within which the commissioner shall issue the permit—a permit is issued, and B. is then enabled legally to dispose of the balance of his securities. If his securities were of a character that fluctuated on the market, this delay may mean a considerable loss to him, which A. is not compelled to suffer. If, on the other hand, the commissioner should find the business reputation of B. unsatisfactory, although nowhere near as unsavory as the reputation of A., the broker's permit is denied, and B. is thus prevented from disposing of the balance of his securities.

Manifestly, any act of the Legislature which creates such a situation is void as being in direct contravention of the inalienable right of every citizen to enjoy, acquire, possess, and protect his property, as guaranteed by the federal Constitution, and also the Constitution of the state of California.

The Attorney General, in his usual able manner, dwells at length in his brief upon the general proposition of the constitutionality of the so-called "Blue Sky" legislation. In view of the fact that the constitutionality of this type of legislation has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States in Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U. S. 539, 37 S. Ct. 217, 61 L. Ed. 480, L. R. A. 1917F, 514, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 643, and by our own Supreme Court in Re Girard, 186 Cal. 718, 200 P. 593, we do not feel it is necessary to discuss this general question, or even to consider in detail the opinions of the various courts in the cases cited by the Attorney General. However, it may be observed in passing that in only two of the many cases cited on the general subject does it appear that the court had under consideration the question of the right of an individual to sell or dispose of his own securities under circumstances such as are involved here, and certainly we have been unable to find any decision wherein a definite declaration is made by the court upon the question here involved.

In the case of Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., supra, the court had under consideration an act of the Legislature of Ohio dealing with investment companies. This act, after defining the term "dealer," uses the following language in making an exception to the class included in the term "dealer":

"An owner, not the issuer of the security, who disposes of his own property, for his own account; when such disposal is not made in the course of repeated and successive transactions of a similar character by such owner; or a natural person, other than the underwriter of the security who is a bona fide owner of the security and disposes of his own property for his own account." Gen. Code, § 6373—2.

The first part of the above-quoted portion of the Ohio statute is almost identical in wording with the clause here under attack, but the last portion of the quoted clause clearly eliminates any question as to the right of a natural person, not an underwriter, to sell his own securities. Apparently the Ohio Legislature, feeling that the language in the first part of the exception might be ambiguous or cause confusion, added the closing paragraph in order to make it clear that the Legislature was not attempting to prevent a natural person from selling his own securities whether in one sale or repeated sales. In view of the wording of the Ohio statute, it is very clear that nothing in the opinion in the case of Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., supra, can be regarded as supporting the constitutionality of the clause here under attack. It is quite clear that it is the business of selling securities that is the subject of regulation. In Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., supra, the court says:

"It will be observed, therefore, that the law is a regulation of business, constrains conduct only to that end, the purpose being to protect the public against the imposition of unsubstantial schemes and the securities based upon them."

In Ex parte Girard, supra, the sole question involved was whether the method of selling units by trustees who held the title to the property under a so-called "Massachusetts trust" came within the purview of the California Corporate Securities Act. The opinion written by Mr. Justice Shaw, sustaining the contention of the Attorney General that the acts complained of by the defendants in selling and transferring units came within the law requiring a permit from the corporation commissioner, clearly indicates that the question of the right of a natural person to dispose of his own securities by sale or exchange, even though in repeated and successive transactions, was not under consideration by the court.

Another type of cases cited in the brief of the Attorney General involves statutes which simply provide for the filing of certain information with some state official before stock securities or patent rights may be offered for sale or sold. In statutes of this type, no authority is vested in the state official with whom the information is required to be filed to exercise any discretionary power in granting or refusing a permit. This type of legislation has been generally sustained as constitutional on the general theory that the Legislature has power to direct the method to be followed in disposing of certain types of property. This power has been recognized in statutes requiring the recording and filing of certain documents, claims, notices, and other proceedings, in order that rights may be established or effectively maintained. Statutes of this type were under consideration by the court in the cases of Goodyear v. Meux, 143 Tenn. 287, 228 S. W. 57, Mason v. McLeod, 57 Kan. 105, 45 P. 76, 41 L. R. A. 548, 57 Am. St. Rep. 327, and Allen v. Riley, 203 U. S. 347, 27 S. Ct. 95, 51 L. Ed. 216, 8 Ann. Cas. 137.

In the case of Bracey v. Darst (D. C.) 218 F. 482, the court had under consideration the constitutionality of certain provisions of the so-called "Blue Sky Law" of West Virginia. The opinion in this case was written prior to the decision in the case of Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., and deals at some length with the general question of the constitutionality of this type of legislation, and reviews all of the decisions rendered at that time on the subject. It is apparent in reading the opinion that the principal reason for holding the act unconstitutional was the fact that the law undertook to require any individual, before disposing of his own personal securities and for his own account, to secure a statement or permit from the state auditor. The opinion dwells at length upon a similar act of the Legislature of Florida which had been sustained, and which included this proviso:

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall extend to any seller of stock, bond or other security, who has purchased the same in good faith for value, and who is the bona fide owner of such stock, bond, or other security at the time of such sale." Comp. Laws Fla. 1914, § 3727f.

The following excerpt from the opinion of the court in Bracey v. Darst, supra, would indicate that the Attorney General in that case conceded that the act could not legally prohibit an individual from selling his own stock:

"It is now substantially admitted that if its intent is to prevent a 'citizen' from selling his own notes or other obligations, or bonds, securities, etc., which he may have acquired in the course of business, without a certificate from the auditor of solvency and 'sound business capacity,' it is clearly subversive of the inalienable right he has to acquire and sell property, and its validity cannot be asserted."

It is interesting further to note that Circuit Judge Woods, who sat in the case and wrote a dissenting opinion, makes the following interpretation of the language of the act as necessary to its constitutionality:

"In the first place, it seems quite clear that the statute is limited in its application to corporations, and to individuals acting in concert by organization—that is, by making a whole of inter-dependent parts—and was not intended to apply to a single individual conducting his own business."

In the case of William R. Compton Co. v. Allen, 216 F. 537, the United States District Court had under consideration the "Blue Sky Law" of Iowa, by the terms of which any person, whether natural or corporate, who was not a resident of Iowa, was required to secure from the secretary of state a statement or permit before he could sell his own stock or securities within the state of Iowa. The constitutionality of this act was attacked by a natural citizen of the state of Illinois as well as corporate citizens of other states. A restraining order withholding enforcement of the act was issued by the presiding judge, and subsequently sustained by the entire court, on the ground that it undertook to prohibit a person, being a citizen of another state, from selling his own stock or securities in the state of Iowa.

[2] In answering appellant's contentions, the Attorney General does not deny that the section of the act under attack will, if upheld, interfere with the freedom heretofore exercised by a natural citizen in disposing of his own securities, nor is any answer offered to the assertion that, under this section of the act, an individual may be prevented altogether from selling his securities. Rather it is urged that this and any other results flowing from the enforcement of the section under consideration, and which may hamper the individual in selling his securities, are incidental to, but necessary in, accomplishing an effective control of investment companies; and inasmuch as the purpose of the act, to wit, the control and regulation of the business of selling securities, has been held to be a proper exercise of the police power, such burdens and restrictions upon the individual's right to sell his own securities as the Legislature may deem essential to accomplish the purpose of the act should be held likewise to be within the police power.

We are thus presented with the oft-occurring problem of determining how far legislative enactments shall be permitted to encroach upon the rights of the individual to acquire, possess, and dispose of his property. When the questions of health, morals, or safety are involved, the path for judicial action is clearly defined by a long course of decisions, but when the test is that of "general welfare," courts are confronted with many difficult and conflicting considerations, as well as a multitude of diverse judicial decisions. It must be conceded that the changes in our social and economic relations require from time to time changes in the rules which govern the relation of the individual towards society, and that these changes must needs be reflected in legislative enactment, and also in judicial interpretation. But there are well-defined limits as to the extent to which such legislation may go in depriving a natural person of his right to possess property. Nor will the argument of the greatest good to the greatest number, or even the unquestioned beneficial results that might flow from such legislation, avail as against the constitutional guaranty.

The Corporate Securities Act belongs to that type of legislation sometimes referred to as the "paternal activity" of government. It is an attempt to throw about the individual who is about to invest his money in certain kinds of property a protecting arm of governmental authority. In other words, by regulating and controlling those engaged in the business of selling certain types of personal property, and if need be prohibiting certain undesirable persons or concerns from engaging in that type of business, the law protects those from loss who, either through carelessness or ignorance, might otherwise become the victims of fraudulent design.

Legislation of this character from the outset has been vigorously assailed, and until the decision in the case of Hall v. Geiger-Jones Co., 242 U. S. 539, 37 S. Ct. 217, 61 L. Ed. 480, L. R. A. 1917F, 514, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 643, judicial opinion was divided on the question of the constitutionality of such legislation. But nowhere in the authorities sustaining the regulation of the business of brokers do we find authority to sustain the contention made here, that the police power under the guise of general welfare may be invoked to interfere with the sale by an individual of his own property when the acquiring and possession of such property is not contrary to law.

[3] The Attorney General in his brief makes this significant statement:

> "It is also true that laws may not be enacted which arbitrarily and without any reason therefor deprive a citizen of his liberty or property, but it must be remembered that it does not necessarily follow that a law which regulates the mode of disposing of property takes away the right of disposition. On the contrary, it is well established that laws which reasonably regulate the mode of disposing of property do not take away the owner's right of disposition."

The section of the act in question, if sustained, in connection with other provisions of the act, "does more than regulate" the mode of "disposing of property." As we have heretofore pointed out, the corporation commissioner would have the power and it would be his duty to refuse a person a broker's permit if he had a "bad business reputation," and by such refusal the person would be prevented from disposing of his own individual property which he had lawfully acquired and lawfully possessed if such disposition were made in more than one transaction. It does not answer the charge that the act in question is unconstitutional to say that a person clothed with such power may not see fit to use the power. The rule in determining whether the act is in conflict with constitutional guaranties is whether or not the act is broad enough to authorize such unconstitutional act.

[4] The Attorney General urges further that if the corporation commissioner is not given the power to control and regulate the individual in the sale of his own securities, the whole purpose of the Blue Sky legislation will be defeated, in that concerns desirous of disposing of securities tainted with fraud would circumvent the law by fraudulently placing such securities in the hands of individuals who would thus claim such securities as their individual property and dispose of them for the benefit of their principal. In answer to this proposal, we would suggest that if the purpose of the section is to prevent fraudulent conduct in the sale of securities, it would not be a difficult matter to draft a provision of the law that would meet such a need. We know of no authority that would sustain the contention that in order to make more effective a worthy regulation, that an invasion of individual rights as guaranteed by the Constitution would be justified. If the regulation of the business of brokers engaged in the sale of securities cannot be enforced in a manner satisfactory to the corporation commissioner without giving him the power to reach out and invade individual rights, then the legislation in question must necessarily fail, in part at least, of the purpose which is sought in this enactment.

In Ex parte Quarg, 149 Cal. 79, 84 P. 766, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183, 117 Am. St. Rep. 115, 9 Ann. Cas. 747, Mr. Justice Shaw, in considering the constitutionality of Legislative enactment prohibiting the sale or offering for sale of theater tickets at a price in excess of that originally charged by the theater, makes this comment:

"The constitutional guaranty securing to every person the right of 'acquiring, possessing, and protecting property,' refers to the right to acquire and possess the absolute and unqualified title to every species of property recognized by law, with all the rights incidental thereto, and, in connection with the right of personal liberty, it includes the right to dispose of such property in such innocent manner as he pleases, and to sell it for such price as he can obtain in fair barter."

The principle enunciated by Mr. Justice Shaw has been declared in frequent decisions, and needs no additional citations. However, it is urged that the opinion in Ex parte Quarg is not in point, because the sale of theater tickets does not involve the "general welfare." It must be conceded that the ownership of a theater ticket finds its basis in the same personal right that the ownership of a bond or any other security finds its law; and if the owner of a theater ticket may sell it unhampered by legislative regulation or prohibition, we are unable to ascertain upon what theory the owner of a bond or other security may not exercise the same untrammeled right.

The Attorney General concedes that it would invade the constitutional rights of a citizen if he were prohibited from selling his securities, which he would have the legal right to buy and possess, but contends that the law under consideration is simply a regulation, and in support of this argument cites certain cases which have sustained laws which were merely regulatory in their requirements. If the act under consideration were confined simply to a requirement that all owners of certain types of securities, before selling them, should file with some official certain information, and thereupon they would have the right to dispose of their property without any other burden or interference, the position of the Attorney General might be maintained. But this is not the situation that confronts us. The act in part provides for regulation, but also provides a power to refuse a permit, which would make absolute prohibition in the sale of one's securities. The only purpose of the act in requiring the filing of certain information in the form of a petition by a person desiring to sell securities is to lay the foundation for action by the corporation commissioner that may or may not, according to his finding, result in an absolute prohibition of the sale of his securities.

In these days when the urge is strong upon legislative bodies to extend the paternal arm of government into the realm of economic activities, it is particularly important that courts, in the exercise of the particular functions imposed upon them by the Constitution, shall scrutinize with care legislation which tends to encroach upon the constitutional guaranties, to the end that the right of the individual to liberty and possession of property shall become, not a mere theory, but shall be maintained as a practical reality. And while it is true that the increasing conflict between the rights of the individual and the general welfare of society presents oftimes difficult and perplexing problems, nevertheless courts should not and will not permit the violation of those most fundamental rights that underlie our very existence as a nation. Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S. 223, 25 S. Ct. 18, 49 L. Ed. 169; Pacific Palisades Ass'n v. City of Huntington Beach et al. (Cal. Sup.) 237 P. 538.

[5] Appellant further urges that the defendant in this case is denied the equal protection of the law by the section of the act under consideration, in this: That any owner of securities who is not the issuer or underwriter thereof, and who sells for his own account, may do so without hindrance or complying with any provision of the act, provided that he accomplishes the disposal of the securities in one sale or exchange; but when, for any reason, he desires to make a second or a third or a fourth sale, he is by the act deprived of the rights which are accorded to one who desires to make only one sale. As we have pointed out in the outset of this opinion, it is readily apparent that if the act in question is sustained a great many individuals who are the owners of securities which they themselves did not issue or underwrite, would be required to secure a broker's license, which involves the filing of a petition, the awaiting of the decision of the corporation commissioner as to whether or not a broker's license will be issued, the securing and filing of a bond, and perchance eventually the refusal of a broker's license; while other individuals who find it convenient or possible to accomplish the same purpose in making one sale would be relieved from such burdens. It is difficult to believe that the Legislature intended to impose burdens on certain individuals in this manner that would not apply to all persons of the same class, for certainly there is no basis in law for such a distinction. We might suggest in passing that undoubtedly thousands of our citizens are selling from time to time securities which they have acquired, and disposing of these securities in repeated and successive sales without having secured any broker's license, and without even the thought that such legitimate and innocent conduct, without securing a broker's license and furnishing a bond, is in violation of the Corporate Securities Act.

Any Legislative enactment that is reasonably subject to the interpretation we have just pointed out manifestly is in conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. In 12 Corpus Juris, page 1144, this proposition is thus stated:

"The Amendment (the Fourteenth) was intended to secure equality of right, and it renders unconstitutional all laws which may properly be construed as applying to persons or property arbitrarily and with discrimination, unequally or unjustly."

[6] The appellant also urges that the language of the section is so indefinite, uncertain, and vague as to make it unconstitutional and void; and in this behalf it is pointed out that the term "in the course of repeated and successive transactions" is indefinite, as is also the term "of like or similar character." We feel that the section is subject to the criticism urged. It probably would be conceded that two or more transactions would constitute "repeated transactions," and necessarily, if one follows the other, they would be "successive transactions." But one contemplating the sale of his securities would be at a loss to know, so far as the section in question indicates, whether he would be liable if he should make one sale every 12 months, or every 36 months, or even every 10 years. In order that an act of the Legislature attempting to prescribe what acts shall be deemed a public offense may meet the test of validity, it is necessary that the language used shall be of such clarity of expression that one of average intelligence would be able to understand what is prohibited and what he may do without violating the law. Mr. Justice Melvin, in his opinion in the case of In re Lockett, 179 Cal. 581, 178 P. 134, discussing this question of clarity, says:

"So important is the liberty of the individual that it may not be taken away even from the most debased wretch in the land, except upon conviction of a crime which has been so clearly defined that all might know in what act or omission the violation of the law should consist"

The same question was before the Supreme Court of this state in the case of In re Peppers, 189 Cal. 682, 209 P. 896, where the court held unconstitutional section 10 of the California Fruit and Vegetable Standardization Act of 1921 on the ground of indefiniteness.

Chief Justice Waite of the United States Supreme Court, in the case of United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214, 23 L. Ed. 563, in discussing a similar question, observes:

"Laws which prohibit the doing of things, and provide a punishment for their violation, should have no double meaning. A citizen should not unnecessarily be placed where, by an honest error in the construction of a penal statute, he may be subjected to a prosecution for a false oath; and an inspector of elections should not be put in jeopardy because he, with equal honesty, entertains an opposite opinion. * * * Penal statutes ought not to be expressed in language so uncertain. If the legislature undertakes to define by statute a new offense, and provide for its punishment, it should express its will in language that need not deceive the common mind. Every man should be able to know with certainty when he is committing a crime."

We do not deem it necessary to burden this opinion with extended citations which are available to support the propositions of law here urged by the appellant, nor the many authorities which may be cited in support of the application of the legal principles to the facts here involved.

We are of the opinion that the section of the Corporate Securities Act under consideration, so far as it attempts to require a natural person to secure a broker's permit as provided in said act before he may lawfully sell his own securities, where he is not the issuer or underwriter of the same, is unconstitutional and invalid for the reasons herein set forth.

It therefore follows that the judgment of the lower court must be and it is reversed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

73 Cal. App. 421

COLVER et al. v. W. B. SCARBOROUGH CO. (Civ. 4797.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 29, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 28, 1925.)

1. Mortgages ⟸151(3)—Judgment for mechanic's claim not affected by foreclosure of trust deed.

A valid judgment by holder of mechanic's claim for services cannot be affected by any such expedient as a foreclosure of a deed of trust on property.

2. Trusts ⟸371(2)—Allegations insufficient to establish a trust.

In suit by former owners of property to hold as trustees for their benefit the party advancing money for construction of buildings on property who had foreclosed trust deed executed in security of loan, complaint, failing to allege that plaintiffs ever borrowed any money from defendant, or that trust deed was executed by plaintiffs in favor of defendant, or that defendant caused property to be sold under deed, or purchased property at sale, or ever acquired property, held insufficient.

3. Trusts ⟸371(2) — Complaint not alleging existence of trust relationship at time of suit fatally defective.

In suit to establish trust relationship between former owners of property and purchaser at foreclosure sale under deed of trust from owners to secure a loan, complaint failing to allege creation and existence of trust at time suit was commenced held fatally defective, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 852, 2221, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1971.

4. Quieting title ⟸34(1)—Allegations insufficient to warrant relief.

In suit alleging that defendant held legal title for use of plaintiffs, and praying that plaintiffs' title be quieted, complaint held insufficient in either form or substance to warrant relief by quieting title.

5. Trusts ⟸87—Evidence of payments to purchaser after foreclosure sale, offered as defense against purchaser's claim to title, properly refused.

In suit to establish trust in purchaser at foreclosure sale, who claimed title thereunder, evidence of payments to purchaser after sale by former owner, having no bearing upon issue of purchaser's title, held properly refused.

6. Limitation of actions ⟸19(3)—Statute defining actual continued occupation of land under claim of title as adverse held not bar to suit to quiet title.

Code Civ. Proc. § 324, providing that actual, continued occupation of land under claim of title will be deemed adverse, held not a bar to a suit to quiet title claimed by purchase at foreclosure sale under deed of trust.

7. Limitation of actions ⟸19(3)—Suit to quiet title not barred by five-year limitation.

Code Civ. Proc. § 336, limiting actions for recovery of real property based upon a judgment or decree of court to within five years, held not a bar to a suit to quiet title based on purchase at a foreclosure sale under deed of trust.

8. Limitation of actions ⟸196(1)—Evidence in support of defense under inapplicable statute immaterial.

In suit to quiet title, to which Code Civ. Proc. § 336, limiting actions for recovery of real property, was inapplicable as a defense, evidence offered in support of defense held immaterial.

9. Trial ⟸388(3)—Findings of fact not required on judgment of nonsuit or on ruling sustaining objection to introduction of evidence because complaint did not state cause of action.

Although, in absence of waiver, parties are entitled to a decision in writing with a finding on all material issues under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 632–634, findings of court are not necessary where nonsuit is granted, or where judgment for defendant is based on ruling of court sustaining objection to introduction of evidence by plaintiff because complaint fails to state a cause of action.

10. Trial ⟸395(6)—Finding of ownership of real property is sufficient without enumeration of evidentiary facts supporting it.

Where ultimate fact to be determined is ownership of real property, finding upon the fact of ownership is sufficient without enumeration of probative or evidentiary facts from which conclusion of ownership may be deduced.

11. Mortgages ⟸8—Deed of trust held not a mortgage, notwithstanding contemporaneous agreement insuring payment of interest and insurance premiums.

Where to secure loans for erection of apartment building property owners executed deed of trust, a contemporaneous agreement which neither added to nor substracted from conditions specified in trust deed, but merely provided for insuring payment of interest to be due on obligation of which trust deed was security, and also insurance premiums, and that balance of income be applied to payment of principal, held not to render transaction a mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Suit by Kate Colver and another against the W. B. Scarborough Company to establish a trust, quiet title, and for an accounting. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Houser, Justice pro tem., not participating.

Wm. M. Morse, Jr., Arthur Lasher, and J. W. Hocker, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Scarborough & Bowen, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. According to the prayer of the complaint herein, the purpose of plaintiffs in bringing suit against the defendant was to procure a decree of court that the defendant held certain real property in trust for plaintiffs, that plaintiffs' title to said property be quieted, and that an accounting be had as to certain moneys alleged to have been paid by plaintiffs to the defendant on account of an indebtedness owing by plaintiffs to the defendant, the payment of which indebtedness being secured by a trust deed or trust deeds to the property involved.

In substance, the allegations of the complaint as amended at the trial were that Kate Colver, one of the plaintiffs, who was 81 years of age and the mother of Fred Colver (the other plaintiff), was the owner of two city lots, upon one of which were located three cottages, and that she was desirous of building an apartment house upon the other of such lots; that formerly she and her husband were socially, politically and religiously associated with W. B. Scarborough, and looked upn him as their friend and confidential adviser; that plaintiffs consulted with him regarding the proposed construction of said apartment house, and that they were "counseled by the said W. B. Scarborough that he would furnish the money to build such apartment house"; that the apartment house was completed about April 1, 1913, and that plaintiff Fred Colver, on his own account, personally bought the necessary furniture to furnish the same; and that W. B. Scarborough later incorporated his business into the W. B. Scarborough Company, a corporation, the defendant herein. The complaint further set forth:

"That the moneys advanced by the defendant corporation were represented by trust deeds in the sum of approximately $22,500, and subsequent thereto various amounts were advanced on an open book account to be used in carrying out the terms of an agreement entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant corporation which agreement is in words and figures following, to wit:

" 'This agreement, made the 25th day of April, 1913, by and between W. B. Scarborough Company, hereinafter designated as the party of the first part, and Kate Colver, hereinafter designated as party of the second part, witnesseth:

" 'That whereas the party of the first part is advancing to the party of the second part certain sums of money for the completion of an apartment building on lot 1 of tract No. 2059, city of Los Angeles, state of California (said sum of money so advanced being secured by a trust deed on lots one [1] and two [2] of tract No. 2059) the party of the second part in consideration of said advancement of moneys agrees to turn the entire income from said apartment house into the office of the party of the first part; out of said income the party of the first part will pay the interest on the trust deed now on said property as the same becomes due, also the insurance premiums, the balance of the income to be applied on the principal due on the second trust deed.

" 'The party of the second part agrees that she will, as soon as 90 days has elapsed from the date of filing notice of completion on said building, endeavor to negotiate a loan or loans on this building with which to take up the loans held by W. B. Scarborough Company on this property.

" 'In the event said party of the second part is unable to secure a loan large enough to lift the entire indebtedness, the party of the second part will secure as large a loan as she can, and the party of the first part agrees to release the first trust deed and take a second trust deed for the balance, which trust deed will be paid out of the income as hereinbefore stated. W. B. Scarborough Company,

" '[Signed] By W. T. McAllister, Secy.

" 'Kate Colver.' "

In addition thereto, the complaint contained allegations in substance that at the time of the execution of the said agreement, and at all times mentioned in the complaint, plaintiffs were in possession of said apartment house; that according to the terms of said agreement, the defendant was to have the net income from the apartment house, and that the plaintiffs were to receive the rents accruing on the cottages located on the property; that at various times after the agreement herein referred to was executed, plaintiffs endeavored to procure from the defendant corporation a statement of the money remaining unpaid under said agreement, but that the defendant refused to furnish same; that in pursuance of the terms of the agreement plaintiffs negotiated for and arranged to get loans in excess of the principal amount of the trust deeds, but that W. B. Scarborough refused to accept the same.

The complaint also contained the allegation:

"That at all times since the date of foreclosure of said trust deed the said W. B. Scarborough Company has been a trustee holding the title to said premises for and on account of the plaintiffs herein, and that the acts of the plaintiffs herein, in paying the large sums of money to the defendant corporation was because of their belief in the existence of such trust, and because of their great reliance in the honesty, integrity, and uprightness of W. B. Scarborough, the manager and owner of said defendant corporation."

It was further alleged that W. B. Scarborough demanded from plaintiffs a quitclaim deed of the premises, and served a notice on the tenants of the apartment house to pay rent to W. B. Scarborough Company; that there were no arrangements entered into between plaintiffs and the defendant regarding the management of the apartment house, and that no compensation was paid to either of the plaintiffs for the use of the furniture belonging to plaintiff Fred Colver; that prior to the bringing of the action defendant threatened to take possession of the premises and to oust plaintiffs therefrom, and that such action, if taken, would cause great and irreparable loss to plaintiffs; that plaintiffs at all times since entering into said agreement diligently and carefully complied with all the terms and conditions thereof, and at the time of filing the complaint were ready, able, and willing to negotiate a loan on the property sufficient to pay off the claims of the defendant, in the event that the amounts due and unpaid could be determined by an accounting—which accounting plaintiffs alleged was necessary in the premises.

When the complaint was filed, it also contained averments to the effect that because of the fact that certain judgments had been recovered by mechanics' lien claimants against plaintiffs, which judgments constituted a lien against the property involved in this action, it was agreed between plaintiffs and the defendant that "they would make a friendly foreclosure of said trust deeds or one of them in order to defeat the said judgments held by the holders of said mechanics' liens, and it was then and there agreed by the defendant corporation that such foreclosure was a friendly foreclosure, and that the status of the plaintiffs would continue to be the same as it was before under the terms of the agreement hereinabove set forth."

On the trial of the action, after the defendant had suggested to the court that because of plaintiffs' allegations of said fraud, in which plaintiffs had freely participated, plaintiffs could receive no relief from a court of equity, plaintiffs made a motion to strike from the complaint all allegations relating to any "friendly foreclosure" of the trust deed—which motion was granted by the court. Plaintiffs then offered evidence to prove the remaining allegations of their complaint, to which an objection was made by the defendant on the ground that the complaint as amended did not state a cause of action—which objection was by the court sustained. Whereupon the defendant offered evidence in support of its cross-complaint, and plaintiffs undertook to present evidence tending to show that the defendant was not entitled to any relief, first, by virtue of ownership of a part of the property by plaintiff Fred Colver, as evidenced by a deed executed by Kate Colver to Fred Colver conveying a portion of the property involved in the action; secondly, by adverse possession of the property by plaintiffs; and, lastly, by a showing of certain payments on the indebtedness secured by the trust deeds on the property, some of which were alleged to have been made before, and some after, the "friendly foreclosure" took place. Defendant's objection to the introduction of such evidence was sustained by the court. From a judgment in favor of the defendant, plaintiffs appeal.

Appellants' first specification of error is that the trial court erred in sustaining the objection of the defendant to the evidence offered by plaintiffs in support of the complaint as amended.

[1] It is contended by appellants that after the complaint was amended, the original complaint ceased to perform any function as a pleading; and while the respondent concedes that such "is true under ordinary circumstances," it is urged by the respondent that the allegations which were stricken from the complaint were of such a nature that they should be considered by this court. If, however, it should be determined that the complaint as finally amended failed to constitute a cause of action, the question of plaintiffs' right to equitable relief because of their failure to come into a court of equity with clean hands would become immaterial and unnecessary of determination. The appellants cannot complain if at their suggestion the complaint was considered by the trial court as though it had never contained any admissions of such fraudulent conduct as ordinarily would be deemed sufficient to justify a court of equity in shutting its doors in the faces of the complainants and denying them any relief from a situation to which, by their bad faith and inexcusable conduct, they had knowingly and intentionally contributed. But without deciding the question, it is not at all certain that, even assuming the allegations of connivance between the parties to bring about a "friendly foreclosure" for the purpose of defeating the judgments of mechanics' lien claimants to be true, it would follow that any fraud was actually committed. No matter what the purpose of the "friendly foreclosure" may have been, the rights of the parties had theretofore accrued; and it is clear that a valid judgment by the holder of a mechanic's claim for services rendered would not be at all affected by any such expedient as a "foreclosure," whether "friendly" or otherwise.

[2] The complaint as amended, and as in substance hereinbefore set forth, was incomplete in many necessary specific allegations in order that a cause of action be stated either to declare a trust, or as founded thereon and as incidental thereto, a suit for an accounting. There is no direct allegation contained in the complaint that plaintiffs ever borrowed any money from the defendant, or that any trust deed was executed by plaintiffs in favor of the defendant, or that the defendant ever caused the property in question to be sold under any trust deed, or that the defendant ever purchased said property at a sale under the powers conferred by any trust deed, or, indeed, ever acquired the property in any manner whatsoever. The most that can be said for the allegations of the complaint as amended, is that it may be inferred that some such things took place.

[3] But even though it might be assumed that the complaint as amended were otherwise perfect in its construction as to necessary allegations in order that it might be decreed by the court that the defendant was holding the property in question as a trustee for plaintiffs, the pleading remains fatally defective in that it contains no appropriate allegations with reference to the creation and the existence of a trust between the interested parties at the time suit was commenced. The provisions of section 852 of the Civil Code, so far as affects the facts of this case, are that no trust in relation to real property is valid unless created or declared by a written instrument subscribed by the trustee; and the same rule of law is to be deduced from section 1971 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 2221 of the Civil Code contains the provision that—

"A voluntary trust is created, as to the trustor and beneficiary, by any words or acts of the trustor, indicating with reasonable certainty * * * an intention on the part of the trustor to create a trust; and * * * the subject, purpose, and beneficiary of the trust."

It is therefore apparent that before it could be rightly claimed that a trust relationship legally existed between the parties, the existence of a written instrument, subscribed by the defendant, setting forth with reasonable certainty an intention on the part of the defendant to create a trust with reference to the property in question, and also containing the "subject, purpose, and beneficiary of the trust," would have to be shown. It is a cardinal rule of pleading that allegations therein must be by direct statements; but even though such rule be not invoked, the complaint herein as amended is wholly lacking in averments from which it might be more than conjectured that there had been any attempt to comply with the requirements of the statute. The only written instrument between the parties which in any manner refers to a possible trust, such as is contemplated by the provisions of the statutes to which reference has been had, is that heretofore set forth herein; and a perusal of the terms of that agreement discloses nothing in the way of a compliance with the provisions of the law. That instrument, as shown by its date, as compared with the date of the deed executed on the sale of the property under the trust deed, as appears by the evidence introduced by the defendant under its cross-complaint, was executed several years before any trust relationship is even suggested as having existed between the parties. For obvious reasons, the agreement is therefore entirely silent with reference to any trust, or its subject, or its purpose or its beneficiary. So far, therefore, as a cause of action being stated to enforce a trust is concerned, we are constrained to hold that the ruling by the trial court sustaining the defendant's objection thereto was correct.

The only foundation upon which plaintiffs' action for an accounting could rest would be that a trust existed between the parties affecting the property in question. If the complaint as amended failed to show the existence of such relationship, it is apparent that a suit for an accounting based on a trust could not survive.

[4] As to the prayer of the complaint that in substance, after judgment by the court the defendant held the legal title for the use of plaintiffs, and after, in accordance with an order of the court, an accounting between the parties had been had, and proper instruments of conveyance had been executed by the clerk of the court granting or assigning rights and interests to the respective parties, as by the court decreed—then that plaintiffs' title be quieted to the property involved in the suit—it is equally clear that the allegations are insufficient in either form or substance upon which might be predicated such relief. Nor is such claim seriously advanced by appellants.

[5] With reference to the several asserted defenses to the cross-complaint regarding which, by order of the trial court in sustaining the objection by the defendant, plaintiffs were precluded from offering evidence, it need only be said that, as to the alleged payments of money made on the indebtedness secured by the trust deed, upon the trustee's sale of the property (which sale was admittedly made under the conferred power of the trust deed), any and all such payments were forever lost to plaintiffs under the provisions of the trust deed to the effect that any deed so executed by the trustee would be "effectual and conclusive as against the said party of the first part" (plaintiffs). See Roberts v. Colyear, 179 Cal. 669, 180 P. 937; Bryant v. Hobert, 44 Cal. App. 315, 186 P. 379; Duncan v. Wolfer, 60 Cal. App. 120, 212 P. 390.

Title in the purchaser at the trustee's sale being thus assured as against any claim by the trustor antedating the sale, it would follow that any payment of money made to the purchaser after the trustee's sale had become effective would at least have no bearing upon the purchaser's title, however consequential might be the result as to any other possible remedy by the former owner of the property as against the purchaser.

[6, 7] As a separate answer to the defendant's claim of title to the property, as set forth in its cross-complaint, plaintiffs pleaded sections 324 and 336 of the Code of Civil Procedure as a bar. The former section is as follows:

"Where it appears that there has been an actual continued occupation of land, under a claim of title, exclusive of any other right, but not founded upon a written instrument, judgment, or decree, the land so actually occupied, and no other, is deemed to have been held adversely."

Section 336 of the Code of Civil Procedure relates to the "time of commencing actions other than for recovery of real property," and provides:

"Within five years: 1. An action upon a judgment or decree of any court of the United States or of any state within the United States. 2. An action for mesne profits of real property."

No authority has been cited by appellants as sustaining their position that either of such statutes constitutes a defense to a suit to quiet title such as is here in question, and this court is unable to perceive the application of either of them thereto.

[8] Appellants, however, suggest that the trial court erred in refusing to permit the introduction in evidence of a deed to a portion of the property here involved, executed by Kate Colver as grantor to Fred Colver as grantee. In appellants' specification of error the statement concerning said deed is that it was "offered in support of the plea of limitation"; but in view of the ruling that no statute of limitation having application to the facts of the case was pleaded, and as it is not contended by appellants that the proffered instrument had any other bearing upon the controversy between the parties, it is apparent that any evidence offered as a defense under an inapplicable statute would be immaterial.

[9] It is next urged that "there were no findings of fact—the pretended findings of fact being merely conclusions of law, and do not constitute a finding of any fact, although the complaint and answer join issues of fact to be determined; and the cross-complaint and answer thereto join issues of fact to be determined," etc. It is unquestioned law that in the absence of a waiver, either express or implied, "upon the trial of a question of fact by the court," the parties to the litigation are entitled to a "decision" in writing (sections 632, 633, 634, Code Civ. Proc.) and that ordinarily a finding must be made on all material issues, although no particular form is required. As is said in Clary v. Hazlitt, 67 Cal. 286, 7 P. 701:

"If the truth or falsity of each material allegation not admitted can be demonstrated from the findings, the requirements of the Code are met."

It will be remembered that the objection by the defendant to the introduction of any evidence by plaintiffs on the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action was sustained by the trial court. It has been repeatedly held that, on the granting of a nonsuit, no findings by the court are necessary. Gilson Quartz M. Co. v. Gilson, 47 Cal. 597; Reynolds v. Brumagim, 54 Cal. 254; Harney v. McLeran, 66 Cal. 34, 4 P. 884; Toulouse v. Pare, 103 Cal. 251, 37 P. 146; Kennedy, etc., L. Co. v. Dusenbery, 116 Cal. 125, 47 P. 1008; Jewell v. Pierce, 120 Cal. 79, 52 P. 132.

There is no difference in principle, so far as the right to findings is concerned, between a judgment for defendant granted on a motion for nonsuit and a judgment for defendant based upon a ruling by the court sustaining an objection to the introduction of any evidence by the plaintiff for the reason that the complaint fails to state a cause of action. In the former case the facts proved are deemed insufficient, and in the latter case the facts alleged, considered as proven, are held insufficient. So that, so far as relates to the complaint herein as amended, plaintiffs were not entitled to any findings thereon by the court.

[10] As to the issues raised by the cross-complaint, and the answer thereto, it appears that by the cross-complaint the defendant alleged in substance that it was the owner of the property in question, and that plaintiffs had no right, title, or interest therein; and, in addition thereto, the defendant set up certain evidentiary matter to support its claim to ownership of the property. Plaintiffs' answer to the cross-complaint, besides containing a specific denial of the defendant's allegations of ownership and the several facts tending to establish same, as a separate defense included a practical repetition of the allegations of plaintiffs' original complaint.

The ultimate issue raised by the cross-complaint and the answer thereto was the ownership of the property described in the pleadings.

The issue tendered by plaintiffs as to the statute of limitations under sections 324 and 336 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as heretofore pointed out, had no bearing upon the facts of the case, and presented no defense to the allegations of the cross-complaint. Quoting the language used by the court in Estate of Aufret, 187 Cal. 34, 37, 200 P. 946, 947:

"We know of no decision to the effect that a judgment or decree for a petitioner may be reversed for want of a finding, where the answer does not set forth any defense. Error is never presumed."

The findings by the court of which complaint is made are as follows:

"That the plaintiffs have not, nor has either of them, any right, title or interest in or to said property as against said defendant; nor have the plaintiffs herein any right to the possession of said property, nor to any of the rents, issues or profits growing out of the same; nor have they any right to rent or lease said property or to collect the rents therefrom; and all claims which the plaintiffs may have in or to said property or any portion thereof, or any interest therein, or to possession thereof as against the defendant herein, are without right or foundation."

It thus appears in effect that the defendant was found to be the owner of the property, and that plaintiffs had no right, title or interest therein. With reference to the sufficiency of a finding of "ownership" of real property as distinguished from a finding of the evidentiary facts from which the conclusion of such ownership may be deduced, it has been repeatedly held by the courts of this state that ownership is the ultimate fact which may be so pleaded and proved by the litigant and afterwards so found by the court. In the case of Gavin v. Swain, 113 Cal. 324, 45 P. 677, where the question was directly before the court, it is said:

"That ownership or (in technical language) seisin of real property is a fact that may be pleaded, proved, and found as a material ultimate fact in all cases involving title to real property is unquestionable in this state. Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 244; Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528 [9 P. 738]; Daly v. Sorocco, 80 Cal. 367 [22 P. 211]; Gill v. Driver, 90 Cal. 72 [27 P. 64]."

Where the ultimate fact to be determined is that of ownership of real property, it is the settled rule in this state that a finding upon the fact of ownership, without any enumeration of the probative or evidentiary facts necessary to support such ultimate fact, is all that is required.

In the case of Adams v. Crawford, 116 Cal.

495, 499, 48 P. 488, 490, the question of the sufficiency of findings in a quiet-title suit is passed upon by the court as follows:

"Appellant also contends that the court failed to find upon several issues. The specifications in that regard are all of probative facts, such as that the court failed to find whether the plaintiff made a valid location, whether the allegations of certain paragraphs of the complaint were true, and other matters of like character. The court found as ultimate facts that the plaintiff is not and was not at any time the owner of the property described in the complaint, and that the defendants are the owners of said property. These are the ultimate facts in the case, and include the finding of all probative facts necessary to sustain the finding of the ultimate facts."

In the later case of Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 523, 105 P. 981, 986, it is said:

"The rule seems to be that in cases where it is sufficient for the plaintiff, suing in regard to property, to allege merely that he is the owner thereof, a denial of this allegation is sufficient to authorize the admission of evidence that the title under which plaintiff claims was absolutely void and not voidable merely, or any evidence to show that plaintiff had no title, and that in such cases a finding upon the fact of title or ownership is good without a finding of the particular facts upon which such title or want of title depends."

See, also, Cooper v. Miller, 113 Cal. 238, 45 P. 325; Montecito Valley Co. v. Santa Barbara, 144 Cal. 578, 594, 77 P. 1113; Estate of Hill, 167 Cal. 59, 138 P. 690.

[11] Appellants finally urge that the contemporaneous agreement construed with the terms of the deed of trust would, in effect, make the transaction a mortgage, and cite several authorities in support of the doctrine that a deed, though absolute on its face, may be held to be only security for the payment of a debt. But a deed of trust in itself is nothing more than that, coupled with certain powers in the trustee not capable of being provided for, or at least not usually stipulated in, an ordinary mortgage. The agreement between the parties, which was entered into contemporaneously with the execution of the deed of trust, neither added to nor subtracted from the conditions specified in that instrument. So far as affects the trust deed, it simply provides for a method of insuring the payment to the defendant of the interest to become due on the obligation of which the trust deed is security, also the insurance premiums on the policy of insurance covering the buildings on the premises, and, lastly, the balance of any income to be applied to the payment of the principal debt.

We find no prejudicial error in the record.

It is accordingly ordered that the judgment be and the same is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

W. B. SCARBOROUGH CO. v. COLVER et al.

(Civ. 4798.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 29, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 28, 1925.)

1. Principal and agent ⟸40—Written notice, terminating rights of defendants to collect rent for plaintiff, properly admitted to show termination of that authority.

Where property owners executed trust deed to secure loan for erection of apartment building, and executed contemporaneous agreement whereby they were to collect rents from apartments, but where trust deed was subsequently foreclosed and former owners continued by an oral agreement to collect rents, a written notice terminating arrangement could properly be introduced in action for money had and received by collection of rents, after arrangement was claimed to be terminated.

2. Trial ⟸404(2)—Findings of fact, substantially following allegations of complaint, held sufficient.

In action for money had and received, charging that defendants became, and are now, indebted to plaintiff for money had and received and no part of indebtedness has been paid, findings of fact following allegations of complaint held sufficient as such, and not mere conclusions of law.

3. Principal and agent ⟸78(1)—Owner of apartments entitled to action for money had and received against former agent who had not accounted for rents collected.

Owner of apartment buildings held entitled to action for money had and received by a former agent after his authority had been terminated, and for which he had not accounted.

HOUSER, J. So far as is deemed material to this appeal, the facts herein appear to be as follows:

On April 24, 1913, defendants executed a trust deed conveying certain real property (on which was erected an apartment house) to a trustee for the purpose of securing a loan made by the plaintiff to defendants, which trust deed contained the usual provision that in case of default in the payment of either the interest or the principal, upon giving notice as provided in said trust deed, the trustee was empowered to sell the property. Contemporaneously with the execution of the trust deed, the plaintiff and defendants entered into a written agreement which, among other things, contained a provision that defendants were "to turn over the entire income from the apartment house on the property to the plaintiff, and out of the income the plaintiff to pay the interest on a prior trust deed and insurance premiums, and the balance of the income to be applied on the principal of the second deed of trust executed therewith."

Defendants failed to pay the indebtedness secured by the deed of trust as therein provided, and on November 24, 1917, the trustee sold the said property. At such sale the plaintiff became the purchaser of the property, and the trustee thereupon executed a deed therefor to the plaintiff. During all the time after the execution of the trust deed, and up to the time of the sale of the property by the trustee, defendants were in possession of said property and were operating the same as an apartment house.

The evidence admits of the conclusion that after the date of the sale of the property the plaintiff employed defendants to remain thereon and to operate the same, with the understanding that defendants were to account to the plaintiff for the rents received. On March 20, 1923, the plaintiff served on defendants a written notice which, among other things, in effect terminated the arrangements theretofore existing between the plaintiff and defendants and canceled the authority of defendants to thereafter collect rents from tenants for the use and occupation of any of the apartments or rooms in said apartment house. Notwithstanding such notice, and during the months of April, May, June, and July, 1923, defendants actually collected and received rents from the tenants in the rooms or apartments of said apartment house aggregating the sum of $2,715. No part of the sum so collected having been paid to the plaintiff, the action at bar was brought for money had and received, the complaint alleging:

"That within one year last past the defendants Kate Colver and Fred Colver and each of them became and are now indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of two thousand dollars ($2,000) for money had and received by the said defendants and each of them for the benefit of the plaintiff, and no part of which sum has been paid."

Defendants' answer is a denial that they are indebted to the plaintiff in any amount whatsoever.

Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,000, and defendants appeal therefrom.

[1] Appellants' first specification of error is that, over defendants' objection, the court erred in admitting evidence of the "notice" given by the plaintiff to defendants terminating the right of defendants to collect rents from the tenants of the apartment house. The "notice" was as follows:

"Los Angeles, California, March 20, 1923.

"Kate Colver and Fred Colver:

"You are hereby notified that the employment and arrangement heretofore existing between you and this company for the management and operation of that certain property known as the Colver Apartments and the house adjoining thereto, both being situated on lots 1 and 2, tract No. 2059, in the city of Los Angeles, for the collection of the rents from the tenants in said property, is hereby terminated and ended, and that you have no further authority to rent any of said apartments nor to collect any of the rents due from the tenants therein, and you are hereby notified not to collect any such rents, nor to lease or rent any of said apartments, nor to have anything further to do in the management of said property.

"You are further notified that your use and occupancy of an apartment in said property is hereby terminated and ended, and the undersigned demands that you vacate said premises and remove therefrom on or before April 1, 1923; and if you occupy said apartment on and after April 1, 1923, you will be charged a rent of $75 per month, payable monthly in advance on the 1st day of each and every month beginning April 1, 1923; and if said rent be not paid at the time it is due, proceedings will be taken to recover said premises from you."

Appellants urge that the "notice" could not have been considered as a rescission of the agreement which was entered into between the interested parties contemporaneously with the execution of the trust deed, and which agreement provided, among other things, for the method to be employed in the payment of interest, insurance premiums on the buildings on the property, and the balance on the principal of the obligation secured by the deed of trust. But at the time when the action was tried in the lower court it was not claimed by the plaintiff, nor is it here suggested by the respondent, that the "notice" constituted a rescission of the agreement. According to the record, the plaintiff's purpose in introducing the "notice" in evidence was to show the termination of the arrangement or relation, if any, that had theretofore existed between the parties. So considered, it is clear that no error was committed by the trial court in admitting the "notice" in evidence.

[2] The next alleged prejudicial error of which complaint is made is that the trial court erred in failing to make proper findings of fact—"the complaint being upon a common count and the answer being a general denial." So far as affects the point which is thus raised by appellants, the findings are:

"That within one year last past * * * the defendants * * * became and are now indebted to the plaintiff herein in the sum of $2,000 for money had and received by the said defendants and each of them for the benefit of the plaintiff; that no part of said indebtedness has been paid."

It will thus be noticed that the findings substantially follow the allegations of the complaint.

In the case of McCarthy v. Brown, 113 Cal. 15, 45 P. 14, where the authorities are reviewed, it is held that findings which follow the pleadings in the statement of ultimate facts are sufficient. The same conclusion is reached by the court in the case of Dam v. Zink, 112 Cal. 91, 44 P. 331, where it is said that "if facts are stated in the findings in the same way in which they are stated in the pleadings, they are sufficient."

In the case of Carter v. Canty, 181 Cal. 749, 186 P. 346, plaintiff brought an action in the form of a common count against the defendant on account of legal services performed and costs advanced. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the findings followed the allegations of the complaint. An appeal was taken from the judgment, and in the course of the opinion, after stating that the common counts may be used to state such a cause of action as was there involved, notwithstanding the requirement of the Code of Civil Procedure (section 426) that the complaint must contain a plain and concise statement of the facts constituting the cause of action (citing cases), the court said:

"The findings of the trial court in regard to indebtedness are substantially in accord with the allegations of the complaint except as to amount, and were findings of fact, and not mere conclusions of law, as claimed by appellant."

The further criticisms by appellants that the findings are not sufficient to support the conclusions of law, in that the findings are but conclusions of law, and that the judgment is not supported by sufficient or any findings of fact, are fully answered to the contrary of their contentions by the decisions of the courts of this state contained in the cases just cited.

[3] The point is advanced by appellants that the judgment is contrary to law in that whatever indebtedness, if any, was owing by defendants to the plaintiff was the result of an express contract existing between the parties, and that an action for money had and received cannot be maintained on that account. The evidence, however, at least justified the conclusion on the part of the trial court that the facts were otherwise than as claimed by appellants. The precise question, therefore, submitted by appellants becomes unnecessary of decision. It may be true that in its inception, as shown by the written agreement between the parties with reference to the occupancy of the premises by defendants and the payment by them to the plaintiff of the income arising from the operation of the apartment house, a relationship arising from the operation of an express contract existed between the parties thereto. But on the sale of the property under the provisions of the trust deed, the contractual relations which theretofore may have obtained between the parties came to an end, and in place thereof, as testified to by one of the witnesses in the case, a new "arrangement" was orally entered into, whereby, under certain conditions, possession of the property was to remain in defendants as agents of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff was to have the income derived from the rentals received from the tenants of the apartment house. The evidence also is sufficient to warrant the inference that by reason of the "notice" to which reference heretofore has been had, the said oral "arrangement" was abrogated. Thereafter, in the absence of any subsequent agreement between the parties, whatever was done by defendants in the way of collecting rents from the tenants in the apartment house was at least not by virtue of the existence of any express contract relating thereto. Assuming the fact as admitted by appellants, that they did collect such rents and for which no accounting was made to the plaintiff, it is incontrovertible as a matter of law, and for which principle no authority is needed, that an action by the plaintiff against defendants would lie for money had and received.

The judgment should be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

73 Cal. App. 441

COLVER et al. v. W. B. SCARBOROUGH CO. et al. (Civ. 4799.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 29, 1925.)

1. Execution ⟹253(1)—Ordinarily, motion to vacate is proper procedure to set aside sale under execution.

Motion to vacate is proper procedure for setting aside a sale under execution, except where some special facts are alleged which may create jurisdiction in equity.

2. Execution ⟹256(2)—Finding of valid attachment sustained under evidence.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding that levy of attachment by sheriff on furniture in apartment house was a valid compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 3, requiring sheriff to take property into custody, notwithstanding most apartments containing furniture were locked, and furniture was never actually in view of sheriff.

3. Execution ⟹256(2)—Finding that attached property constituted furnishings and fixtures of houses sustained under evidence.

In suit to set aside execution sale of furniture in an apartment building, evidence held to support finding that property attached constituted furnishings and fixtures of houses in which it was located, where it appeared that "fixtures" was used solely as description of furniture and furnishings.

4. Execution ⊂=245—Judgment debtor held to have waived objection that property sold on execution was not in view at sale.

Where, shortly before execution sale of furniture in apartment house, judgment debtor removed some of attached property and ordered all tenants of house to keep their doors locked, and also made several bids on property when sale took place, held, that he waived right to object that property was not within view of those attending sale as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 694, especially where his attorney stated to officer making sale that there was no way of getting to property, and that it might be sold just as it was.

5. Execution ⊂=224—That furniture in apartment house was sold en masse on execution not objectionable in absence of showing of prejudice.

That furniture in apartment building was sold en masse held not objectionable, in absence of showing that price received was not full value, or that a better price could have been obtained by selling it in separate parcels, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 694.

6. Attachment ⊂=319—Deputy sheriff having no personal knowledge of facts competent to make return.

Deputy sheriff who signed return of writ of attachment in sheriff's name held competent to make return, notwithstanding he was shown to have been personally unacquainted with facts, in view of Pol. Code, § 4171, duty of returning writ being an official, not personal, duty.

7. Trial ⊂=387(1)—Opinions declared by judge during trial not binding.

Opinions declared by judge during course of trial or thereafter are not binding, but the findings and judgment are conclusive.

8. Trial ⊂=396(7)—Answer admitting allegation of complaint held to raise no issue requiring finding by court.

Allegations in an answer, which in effect were but admissions of allegation of complaint, held to raise no issue requiring a finding by the court.

9. Appeal and error ⊂=1071(6)—Failure to make findings which could not change result held not prejudicial.

Where findings as made upon material issues of pleading were ample to support the judgment, omission of findings which might have been made on other issues, but which would not affect conclusions of law or invalidate the judgment, held not to require reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Kate Colver and another against the W. B. Scarborough Company and others to set aside a sheriff's sale. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 238 P. 1096, 1102, 1110.

Wm. M. Morse, Jr., Arthur Lasher, and J. W. Hocker, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Scarborough & Bowen, Edward T. Bishop, County Counsel, and J. A. Tucker, Deputy County Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Plaintiffs brought a suit against the several defendants, W. B. Scarborough Company, I. H. Fiske, and William I. Traeger, as sheriff of Los Angeles County, to set aside a sheriff's sale.

The material facts leading up to the sale by the sheriff of which complaint is made are substantially as follows: Some time before the sale in question took place, the defendant W. B. Scarborough Company had commenced an action against the plaintiffs herein, and in connection therewith had caused a writ of attachment to issue and to be served, under and by virtue of which defendant Traeger, as sheriff, acting through his deputies, levied upon certain household furniture and furnishings belonging to the defendants in that action.

Some days thereafter defendant Fiske, who theretofore had recovered a judgment against the plaintiffs herein, assigned said judgment to defendant W. B. Scarborough Company, which company caused defendant Traeger, as said sheriff, to levy what is termed a "paper" execution, as distinguished from an actual levy, upon the same household furniture which previously had been attached in the action brought against plaintiffs herein by the defendant W. B. Scarborough Company. It was under said "paper" levy that the sale was made by defendant Traeger as said sheriff, and which sale is here the subject of appellants' attack.

[1] At the outset it may be stated as a general rule supported by many authorities that a proceeding to set aside a sale under execution, excepting where some special facts are alleged which may create jurisdiction in a court of equity, the proper procedure is by motion to vacate the sale in the action under which it is claimed any irregularities occurred. 23 Corpus Juris, 682 et seq.; Boles v. Johnston, 23 Cal. 226, 83 Am. Dec. 111; Ketchum v. Crippen, 37 Cal. 223; Browne v. Ferrea, 51 Cal. 552; Craig v. Stansbury, 37 Cal. App. 668, 174 P. 404, where the authorities are reviewed; Morris v. Winans, 30 Cal. App. 575, 159 P. 213.

However, without considering whether plaintiffs' remedy, if any, was necessarily by way of motion rather than by a suit in equity, appellants' points for reversal will be here considered as though there was no question of the correctness of the procedure adopted by them.

As several of appellants' specifications of error deal particularly with the court's findings of fact, so much thereof as is pertinent to such specifications is hereafter set forth:

"That on July 10, 1923, a writ of attachment was duly issued out of this court in the action mentioned in paragraph 5 of the plaintiffs' complaint (W. B. Scarborough Co. v. Colver), and placed in the hands of the defendant sheriff for levy, and the sheriff did levy said writ upon the property particularly described in paragraph 6 of the complaint (the furniture, etc., which was the subject of the sheriff's sale), and the sheriff thereafter returned said writ of attachment with his written return indorsed thereon, certifying that he had levied said writ upon said property, and that he had taken said property into his possession and custody by leaving his keeper in charge thereof; and said writ of attachment and return thereon has never been changed, modified or set aside, and the court finds that under and by virtue of said writ the sheriff did take said property into his possession and control and placed a keeper in charge who has ever since remained in control thereof.

"That on the 19th day of July, 1923, an execution issued out of this court in the action mentioned in paragraph 8 of the complaint (Fiske v. Colver), was placed in the hands of the defendant sheriff, and was levied upon the same property which the defendant sheriff had previously attached under said writ of attachment, and of which the sheriff then had possession and control by his keeper as above mentioned; and on the 24th day of July, 1923, the sheriff sold the said personal property to the defendant W. B. Scarborough Company, who was then and there the highest and best bidder at said sale, and immediately thereafter, to wit, on July 24, 1923, the defendant sheriff executed to the defendant W. B. Scarborough Company a certificate of sale for said property.

"The court further finds that said sale by said sheriff was had and conducted on the premises where said personal property was located, and at and near the houses in which said property was then situated; that said property constituted the furnishings and fixtures of the houses in which it is located, and could not then be removed without serious injury thereto, and could not be taken out and removed by reason of the attachment which had theretofore been levied; that some of the property was in the immediate presence of the parties, and some of the doors of the houses were open, but some of the doors to the apartments where the property is situated were closed, but the court finds that the plaintiffs were on the premises at the time of the sale and that the plaintiff Fred Colver was present at the sale and made bids for the property when offered for sale by the sheriff, and the plaintiffs at that time made no objection to the doors being locked nor as to the property not being in view of the officer, and as to the property being sold in one parcel, and that plaintiffs made no request that the property be otherwise sold; and the court finds that by their conduct the plaintiffs waived any objection that they might have had to any of said matters.

"That there was no evidence introduced in the action concerning the title to the real property where said personal property was located nor as to the title to the personal property itself, nor was there any evidence introduced to support the allegations in paragraphs 13 and 14, of the complaint, and for that reason the court makes no finding upon the same.

"That after the said sale the plaintiffs did offer to pay the amount specified in paragraph 15 of the complaint to the defendant sheriff, but the court finds that there was no tender made to the purchaser of said property, to wit, W. B. Scarborough Company, and the court finds that the plaintiffs did pay to the clerk of the court the sum specified in that paragraph."

[2] Appellants contend that the court erred in its findings to the effect that the sheriff levied said attachment and by virtue thereof "did take said property into his possession and control and placed a keeper in charge, who has ever since remained in control thereof," for the reason that there is no testimony in support of such finding, and that such finding "is a mere conclusion of law." Also, that because the second levy was necessarily dependent upon the validity of the first levy, there is nothing on which to base the finding to which objection is made. To be more specific with reference to appellants' charges, they are, in substance, that in making the levy of the attachment in the case of W. B. Scarborough Company v. Colver, the sheriff did not "view" the property, nor did he ever have same under his custody and control; that in making the sale under the "paper" levy in the case brought by Fiske against Colver, the sheriff failed to offer the property in separate parcels, but sold it en masse, and that it was not in "view" at the time the sale was made.

The evidence, though conflicting, admits of the conclusion that at the time the levy on the attachment was made the officer entered the main hallway of the apartment house and the rooms therein occupied by the Colvers; that thereupon he gave to defendant Kate Colver a copy of the summons and complaint, and told her that he had a writ of attachment on the "contents of the property," and that he "was going to leave a keeper there in charge of the property." The officer also gave to defendant Fred Colver a copy of the writ of attachment, and stated to him that he was making a service on him "in an attachment suit." Although, with the exception of the hallways and the apartment occupied by the Colvers, the rooms and the various apartments in the apartment house were all closed or locked, and the officer did not enter any of them, a keeper for the sheriff was left in charge, who remained continuously on duty as such keeper from the date when the levy was made to and including the day of sale. Defendant Fred Colver testified that "he (the keeper) stayed on the porch during the daytime, and in a vacant apartment on the third floor during the evening." In this connection, it is appellants' contention that, under the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the sheriff was required to take the attached property "into custody," and that by the authority of adjudicated cases, such as Taffts v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 49, 73 Am. Dec. 610, and Crawford v. Newell, 23 Iowa, 453, at the time the property was attached it was necessary that it "be within the view of the officer; i. e., that he must see it, and know what he is attaching, and take the property into his actual custody."

Subdivision 3, of section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides that "personal property, capable of manual delivery, must be attached by taking it into custody."

The case of Taffts v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 49, 73 Am.Dec. 610, is generally relied upon by text-writers and by some judges in their opinions for the construction placed upon statutes requiring that the attaching officer shall take the attached property "into custody"—that at the time the levy is made such attached property "must be within the view of such officer." In the case referred to, the officer was attempting to levy upon a stock of goods in a store, the doors of which, upon his arrival thereat, being locked, thereupon he placed a keeper at the rear door of the store while the officer remained at the front door thereof. No claim was made by the officer that up to that time a levy had been made. Later he obtained a key which enabled him to enter the store; whereupon he levied upon the contents of the store, made an inventory thereof, and left a keeper in charge. Referring to the acts of the officer prior to his entry of the store, the court, in rendering its opinion, said:

"However this may be, we can conceive of no principle of law, and have been referred to no case, which holds that the acts relied on by appellant constitute a levy. Waiving everything else, the essential element of an intention to levy prior to the entry seems to be wholly wanting from anything we can see in the agreed statement. That the sheriff came to the house in order to make the levy is very certain; but that he intended to make, or considered that he had made, a levy on goods in the house, by standing at one door and putting his companion at the other, does not appear. He made then no note or memorandum of the levy—did not, perhaps, even know what goods were in the store, their description or value; and besides this, demanded the key afterward and entered, and then seized the goods, took the inventory, and indorsed the levy. There is neither proof nor probability that, before this time, he considered he had seized the goods, or if he did, we think he was clearly mistaken. * * *

"But it cannot be necessary to pursue this inquiry. It is too plain for argument, that there can be no levy when the officer does not even know the subject of the levy. As well might a sheriff stand in the street and levy upon the contents of a banking house as to stand in a store door at midnight and claim that merely by standing there and preventing any person from coming into the store he had levied on the contents, whatever they were, of the store; and this without having any knowledge of the general nature of the stock, much less of the particular description or value. But, as we have said before, nothing appears to show that the mere watching and guarding of the storehouse was meant to be a levy upon the property inside; but these were acts merely in prosecution of the design to enter the house and levy on the property there, which purpose was afterwards accomplished."

It would appear clear that the case is an authority covering the particular facts thereof only, and cannot be taken as a pronouncement that in all cases the attached property must be in the actual view of the attaching officer. While the authorities on the subject are not harmonious, the general statement may be frequently found that, to constitute a valid levy upon personalty, the attaching officer must not only have such property in view, but as well must assume such dominion over it as would render him liable to an action for trespass were it not for the protection afforded him by the court's process. Vol. 6, Corpus Juris, p. 223, and cases cited. A limitation upon such rule is also announced, which is likewise supported by many authorities, that the taking by the attaching officer may be either actual or constructive, dependent upon the nature and the situation and the location of the property attached. See Rogers v. Gilmore, 51 Cal. 309; Sinsheimer v. Whitely, 111 Cal. 378, 43 P. 1109, 52 Am.St. Rep. 192. Manifestly, the requirement that the property proposed to be attached must be within the "view" of the attaching officer should serve some useful purpose. Assuming its object to be that of future identification, if need be, of the property, in most cases, especially where the levy is made upon many different articles such as might be found in different pieces of furniture and furnishings (as in the case at bar) in a large apartment house, the "view" by the officer would fail of its purpose, for the reason that no man, however observant and retentive of memory, on a casual inspection or examination of attached property (such as is ordinarily had by an attaching officer) would be capable of either noting in his mind even the essential differences, if any, existing between the attached property and other properties of the same style and manufacture, or of remembering any considerable number of such several dissimilarities after any great lapse of time. Even in those authorities which follow the assumed holding in the case of Taffts v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 49, 73 Am.Dec. 610, to the effect that the attaching officer must "view" the property proposed to be levied upon, it will be found that their rulings do not apply to a state of facts such as is here presented. In nearly all of those cases the property upon which the levy was sought to be made was not within even the constructive control of the attaching officer, much less of the actual dominion by him over it. The purpose of the statute in requiring that in executing the writ as to personal property it "must be attached by taking into custody" is obviously that of being certain to hold the identical property for the uses intended by the process of the court. The impracticability of compliance with a hard and fast rule, requiring that the officer levying the attachment must actually see that upon which the levy is made, may be illustrated by an extreme situation: In levying upon a large number of articles, presumably all of the same general description, such, for instance, as canned fish, contained in closed wooden cases or boxes, or grain of any kind, enclosed in bags or sacks, it would appear ridiculous to demand that a valid levy, in order to come within the terms of the statute and thereunder that the attaching officer must actually "view" the property, would require that, as to the canned fish in the wooden cases, he must not only break open each case, but each can as well; or as to the grain in the bags, that he must cut open each bag, so that he might attest the fact of personal vision by him of that which his return showed had been the subject of the levy. No such idle and useless and destructive acts are contemplated by the statutory requirement that the attached property must be taken "into custody." As is said in the case of Crawford v. Newell, 23 Iowa, 453, which case is cited by appellants but which appears to not sustain their contention:

"To constitute a valid, operative attachment levy under the provisions of the statute, the officer should do that which would amount to a change of possession, or something that would be equivalent to a claim of dominion, coupled with a power to exercise it."

And see Freeman on Executions, § 262; Hemmenway v. Wheeler, 14 Pick. (Mass.) 408, 25 Am. Dec. 411; Russell v. Major, 29 Mo. App. 167; Poling v. Flanagan, 41 W. Va. 191, 23 S. E. 685; Laughlin v. Reed, 89 Me. 226, 36 A. 131.

In the case at bar the acts of the attaching officer, coupled with those of the keeper left in charge of the attached property, indicated not only a change of possession of the property from the defendants in the action to the sheriff, and that the sheriff thereafter not only claimed dominion over it, but as well that with the exception of that part of the furniture which was removed by defendant Fred Colver, the sheriff actually exercised dominion over the property to the exclusion of every other individual or agency whatsoever.

The case of Moore v. Brown, etc., Furniture Co., 107 Ga. 139, 32 S. E. 835, in its facts was strikingly like the facts of the case at bar, in that the levy which was there attached was upon furniture in a hotel. Prior to making the levy the attaching officer did not "view" the furniture other than possibly so much thereof as was visible in the dining room and the office of the hotel. The other acts, however, by the officer making the levy were perhaps somewhat stronger than those in the instant case. Those matters, however, were unquestioned. The point was solely as to the necessity of a "view" of the attached property by the officer making the levy. The court reviewed and distinguished the authorities, including the case of Taffts v. Manlove, 14 Cal. 49, 73 Am. Dec. 610, which it was contended indicated that in order to constitute a valid levy the attached property must be within the "view" of the attaching officer, and ruled that the essential acts of such officer need not necessarily include a "view" of the attached property. In referring to a statement found in Freeman on Executions, vol. 2, § 260, and some adjudicated cases to the effect that "he (the officer) must have it (the property) within view," the court said:

"These are the authorities cited by the author to establish the doctrine that, to constitute a levy of personal property, the officer must have it within his view. The adjudications referred to do not sustain the literal meaning of the text. But, from all those cited, it is sufficient if the property be in the control and custody of the officer."

This court is therefore convinced that the criticized finding is supported by the evidence, and that the requirements of section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure applicable thereto were substantially met by the attaching officer.

[3] For the alleged reason that the findings by the court were not supported by the evidence, appellants make further complaint that the court found as a fact "that said property constituted the furnishings and fixtures of the houses in which it is located," etc.—the criticism of appellants being particularly directed to the word "fixtures"—on the ground that fixtures are not personal property. But an inspection of the remainder of the record herein shows conclusively that the term "fixtures" was not used in the sense suggested by appellants, but was intended solely as a description of the furniture and furnishings included in the attached property as disclosed by the sheriff's return on the levy and the sale. So construed, the evidence in the case is ample to support the findings of which complaint is made.

[4] Further objection on the part of appellants to the findings by the court is that the court erred in its findings that, at the time of the sale, "some of the property was in the immediate presence of the parties, and some of the doors of the houses were open," for the reason "that there was no testimony to support such finding; that it was contrary to the evidence and contrary to the stipulations of the parties entered into in open court." In connection with such objection, it is urged that at the time the attached property was sold by the sheriff none of the articles of furniture or furnishings was in view of any of the bidders at the sale, as is required by the provisions of section 694 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The sale took place on the premises where the attached property was located. The testimony given by the officer who made the sale was, that at the time the sale was made, he entered one of the apartments, "not very far in—just to see that it was an apartment and a lot of furniture"; that "the keeper went over to two apartments, * * * and both doors were locked"; that he (the officer) inquired of an attorney who was present and who represented the Colvers if there was some way to see the furniture, and was informed by him that "the houses were all locked up—no way of getting in"; that the officer then asked the attorney, "What do you want to do, do you want to sell it just the way it is here?" and the attorney replied, "Yes."

The evidence further shows that just before the sale took place defendant Fred Colver had removed some of the attached property from the apartment house, and that he had ordered "all tenants to keep their doors locked"; also that when the sale took place he made several bids on the property.

In the case of Marsh v. Lapp, 180 Cal. 231, 180 P. 533, in which was involved the question of the right of the judgment debtor on execution sale of furniture in an apartment house to have the property "within view of those who attend the sale," as provided by section 694 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it appeared that after the defendant had been served with the notice of the sale he removed about one-half of the furniture from the apartment house and stored it in a warehouse. With reference to the contention of the appellant in that case that the sale was void because the property was not within the view of those persons who attended the sale, the court said:

"Under the circumstances of this case there is no merit in this point. The statutory rule is intended for the protection of the judgment debtor, and he may waive his right thereunder if he sees fit to do so. Lexington Bank v. Wirges, 52 Neb. 649, 72 N. W. 1049. The removal of the property by defendant after notice of the sale amounted to such a waiver, and he cannot now be heard to complain of a result produced by his own voluntary act. Foster v. Goree, 5 Ala. 424, 429."

In the instant case the attached property was sold en masse because the attorney representing the defendants had stated that "the houses are all locked up—no way of getting in," and when asked by the officer making the sale, "What do you want to do, do you want to sell it just the way it is here?" he replied, "Yes." Besides which the acquiescence of the judgment debtor in the sale was manifested by the fact that defendant Fred Colver made several bids on the property while it was being auctioned by the officer.

[5] Section 694 of the Code of Civil Procedure, on which appellants rely, provides, not that a sale of personal property must be made in parcels, but that it must "be sold in such parcels as are likely to bring the highest price." There is no showing by appellant that the price received for the property was not its full value, or that if it had been sold in separate parcels the price received would have exceeded the price for which the property was sold.

The appeal in the case of Smith v. Randall, 6 Cal. 47, 65 Am. Dec. 475, involved, among other things, the question of vacating a sale on the ground that certain real property had been sold as one parcel rather than in separate parcels. It appeared that the failure on the part of the sheriff to sell the property in separate parcels was occasioned by the incorrect description of the premises given to the sheriff by the defendant, and by his request that the property be sold "in gross." The court said:

"To set aside the sale on this ground, under the circumstances, would be to allow a party to take advantage of his own deceit or negligence."

To the same effect, see Hopkins v. Wiard, 72 Cal. 259, 262, 13 P. 687, 688, where it appears that the defendant's attorney indorsed "as satisfactory" an order by the trial court that the property be sold "in gross." In Hudepohl v. Liberty Hill W., etc., Co., 94 Cal. 588, 592, 29 P. 1025, 1026 (28 Am. St. Rep. 149), the court said: "The judgment debtor may by parol waive a sale of the land in parcels, and give authority to sell in mass"—citing Smith v. Randall, 6 Cal. 52, 65 Am. Dec. 475; San Francisco v. Pixley, 21 Cal. 59; Smith v. Meldren, 107 Pa. 348. See, also, Frink v. Roe, 70 Cal. 296, 301, 11 P. 820. It must therefore be concluded that the evidence supported the finding of which complaint is made, and that the irregularities, if any there were, on the part of the officer at the time he made the sale were waived by the defendants in the action.

[6] It is further contended by appellants that the trial court erred in its findings that "the sheriff thereafter returned said writ of attachment with his written return indorsed thereon, certifying that he had levied said writ upon said property, and that he had taken said property into his possession and custody," for the reason, as assigned by appellants, that "the said written return shows upon its face as executed by 'Wm. I. Traeger, Sheriff, by M. Q. Adams, Deputy Sheriff,' and the testimony shows that one Tucker attempted to serve said writ of attachment, and that M. Q. Adams, personally, knew nothing about what was done in the premises." In support of such contention, no authority is cited by appellants, nor is this court favored with any argument other than the statement that, although the rule is that a deputy performing the act must make the return thereof in the name of his principal, such rule does not extend to another deputy who has no personal knowledge of the facts.

In the case of Carter v. O'Bryan, 105 Ala. 305, 315, 16 So. 894, 897, it was held that:

"The objection that the sheriff, who made the levy and who had failed to make the proper returns, could alone make them, and that his successor, in compliance with an order of the court to do so, could not make them, was without merit. The duty to be performed attached to the officer, and was an official, not personal duty." See Pol. Code, § 4171.

If a successor in office, who was personally unacquainted with the facts, was qualified to make a return, it would appear plain that a deputy of the sheriff in office, although having no personal knowledge of the facts, would be equally competent.

[7] Appellants complain that the trial court made findings contrary to "decisions of the court expressed at the trial." But it is well settled that opinions declared by the judge during the course of the trial or thereafter are not binding, but, to the contrary, that the findings and judgment are conclusive. Churchill v. Flournoy, 127 Cal. 355, 360, 59 P. 791; Belger v. Sanchez, 137 Cal. 614, 618, 70 P. 738; Northern Cal. Power Co. v. Waller, 174 Cal. 377, 381, 163 P. 214.

[8, 9] The point is advanced by appellants that because the trial court failed to find on certain issues presented by the pleadings, the judgment should be reversed. With reference to the first of such so-called issues, the allegations in the answer of the defendant in effect were but an admission of an allegation contained in plaintiff's complaint, and therefore required no finding by the court. As to the other omissions by the trial court to make the findings regarding which complaint is made, upon examination of the record it is apparent that the findings as made upon the material issues of the pleadings are ample to support the judgment, and that any omitted findings which might be made on other issues, however favorable to plaintiffs' contentions, would not affect the conclusion of law made by the trial court from the findings as a whole. In the case of Sharp v. Pitman, 166 Cal. 501, 505, 137 P. 234, 236, it is said:

"If the findings which are made are of such a character as to dispose of issues which are sufficient to uphold the judgment, it is not a mistrial or against law to fail or omit to make findings upon other issues, which if made, would not invalidate the judgment."

See, also, Lincoln v. Hoggard (Cal. App.) 225 P. 770.

The judgment is affirmed.

COLVER et al. v. W. B. SCARBOROUGH CO. et al. (Civ. 4799.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 29, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 28, 1925.)

Execution ⟸55—Money voluntarily paid to clerk of court held not in custody of law.

Where, in action to set aside execution sale, plaintiffs voluntarily tendered to clerk of court amount required to satisfy judgment on which execution had been issued, money held not in custody of the law, so as to be exempt from levy by another judgment creditor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Action by Kate Colver and another against the W. B. Scarborough Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. On motion to restore moneys deposited. Denied.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Houser, Justice pro tem., not participating.

Wm. M. Morse, Jr., Arthur Lasher, and J. W. Hocker, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Scarborough & Bowen, Edward T. Bishop, County Counsel, and J. A. Tucker, Deputy County Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. The matter here involved comes to this court on an independent motion made by appellants that the respondents "immediately return to the treasury of the county of Los Angeles the deposit of $713.09, deposited with the county clerk and by the county clerk deposited in the treasury of the county of Los Angeles. * * * as a tender made by the plaintiffs herein to the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles, one of the defendants herein, on the ground and for the reason that the said sum of money so deposited was in the custody of the law and not subject to attachment, and for the further reason that said sum of money when so deposited as a tender until the tender was refused by the party to whom it was made was then and there the property of the party to whom the tender was made, and not subject to attachment against the defendants herein, or either of them."

The essential facts, so far as the present inquiry is affected, are as follows:

The plaintiffs brought a suit to set aside a sheriff's sale; and in connection therewith, according to the allegations of their complaint and the findings by the court, they paid into the hands of the clerk of the court the sum of $713.09 for the alleged purpose of paying the amount of the judgment, costs, and interest in the case in which the levy, which resulted in the sale of which complaint was made, had issued.

In the suit instituted by the plaintiffs to set aside the sheriff's sale, judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants. Theretofore one of the defendants in the suit to set aside the sheriff's sale had, in another action, recovered a money judgment against plaintiffs herein, upon which judgment execution was levied on the moneys paid by said plaintiffs to the clerk of the court in the suit brought by them to set aside the sheriff's sale, and which levy resulted in such money being paid by the sheriff to the party (one of the defendants herein) who caused such execution to issue.

The principal point relied upon by the moving party in this proceeding is that the money deposited with the clerk of the court was "in the custody of the law and therefore not subject to levy."

One of the allegations contained in plaintiffs' complaint is "that plaintiffs have tendered and offered to pay the full amount of said judgment, * * * and are now still willing to renew said tender, although said I. H. Fiske and said W. B. Scarborough Company, a corporation (defendants) and said defendant sheriff, and each of them, have refused to accept said tender and offer of payment, and these plaintiffs do at the filing of this complaint pay into the hands of the clerk of this court the sum of $713.09, being sufficient to pay the amount of said judgment, costs and interest."

At the conclusion of the trial the court's findings of fact were in accordance with the said allegations of plaintiffs' complaint in that regard. Primarily, then, the question to be determined is whether or not the acts of the plaintiffs in paying the money "into the hands of the clerk of this court" had the effect of placing such funds in the custody of the law.

No claim is made by the moving party that the money was paid to the clerk under or in pursuance of any order of court, and it thus appears that the payment to the clerk was a purely voluntary act on the part of the plaintiffs.

The general rule is that before funds may be said to be in the custody of the law, an order of the court is required to make a deposit of money with the clerk or other representative of the court. The principle is thus stated in Corpus Juris, volume 18, page 770:

"In order to complete a deposit and render it legally effective, the money must be delivered pursuant to an order of the court; and if the deposit is made without such order or a subsequent ratification the clerk may refund it" [citing cases].

In the case of Kimball v. Richardson-Kimball Co., 111 Cal. 386, 43 P. 1111, it appeared that a bank paid money into court in a suit in interpleader without first having obtained an order of court so to do. The money was attached, and the court held (syllabus):

"When property is lawfully taken by virtue of legal process, it is in the custody of the law and not otherwise; and money voluntarily paid into court without an order of court therefor, by a garnishee who has filed a complaint in interpleader against attaching creditors with a view to being discharged from liability to conflicting claimants, is not in the custody of the law, and is the subject of attachment."

In the body of the opinion (page 394 [43 P. 1113]), among other things, the court said:

"We may suppose the court possesses the power to make the order permitting a party in a proper case to do so, but in the present case no such order was made or asked for, and until it was obtained the bank could not, on its own volition, relieve itself from responsibility, by voluntarily placing the property and money in the hands of the clerk, and when so placed it was in no proper sense in the custody of the law.

"When property is lawfully taken, by virtue of legal process, it is in the custody of the law, and not otherwise. Gilman v. Williams, 7 Wis. 334, 76 Am. Dec. 219.

"* * * It is sufficient to say that the property in question was not in the custody of the law, and whether in the hands of the bank or of Ward it was subject to attachment."

See, also, Coffee v. Haynes, 124 Cal. 566, 57 P. 482, 71 Am.St.Rep. 99.

No authorities to the contrary are cited by the plaintiffs other than such as in their respective facts show a constructive custody of the funds by the court, such as money collected by a sheriff on execution (Clymer v. Willis, 3 Cal. 364, 58 Am.Dec. 414), or money deposited with a sheriff for the release of an order of court so to do. The money was 581); but such cases, as is said in Kimball v. Richardson-Kimball Co., 111 Cal. 386, 394, 43 P. 1111, 1113, are distinguishable from cases where the facts are such as are presented in the instant case, "because it [the money] is a symbol of and stands in place of the attached property."

It would therefore appear that plaintiffs' contention that the moneys deposited by them with the clerk were in the custody of the law cannot be sustained.

Plaintiffs also present the point "that prior to the levy of the garnishment, no order of court having jurisdiction had ordered the release of said moneys to the plaintiffs." But if the rule heretofore announced, that the money was not in the custody of the court, is correct, no order of the court releasing the money in the hands of the clerk would be required.

Several other suggestions, including the question of the authority of this court to grant the order asked by appellants, are made by the respondents as a cause for denying plaintiffs' motion; but, in view of the conclusion reached that the money was not in the custody of the court, a consideration of such reasons becomes unnecessary.

The motion is denied.

JANSS INV. CO. v. WALDEN et al.
(L. A. 8050.)

Vendor and purchaser ⟸39—Provision in sale contract restricting use of property to Caucasian race held valid.

A provision in installment contract for sale of a lot, that property should not be used or occupied by any person who was not of the white or Caucasian race held valid, it being a restraint on use of property, and not on alienation.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Suit by the Janss Investment Company against James J. Henry Walden and others. From a decree for plaintiff, the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Wills O. Tyler, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher and E. H. Conley, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a decree in a suit to quiet title. The facts are not in dispute. It appears that the plaintiff, Janss Investment Company, is a subdivider of land into town lots; that from one of its subdivisions it sold a lot to defendant Walden under an installment contract, which contained as one of its conditions a paragraph of which the following is a copy:

"No part of said real property shall ever be leased, rented, sold or conveyed to any person who is not of the white or Caucasian race, nor be used or occupied by any person who is not of the white or the Caucasian race, whether grantee hereunder or any other person."

The contract also provided:

"This contract is not transferrable without the written consent of the party of the first part, and then only upon payment of the usual fee of $1. * * *"

The contract was entered into on May 3, 1922. On the following day Walden, who was a white man, attempted by a quitclaim deed to convey all his right, title, and interest in the property to defendants Walling, who are negroes. On September 2, 1922, defendant Walden, after having decided that the mode of conveyance used by him was insufficient for his purpose, made an assignment in writing of all his interest to defendant Betty Walling, which attempted assignment, it is conceded by the appellant, failed for the reason that the plaintiff refused to give, and did not give, its consent in writing thereto; nor was the sum of $1 paid to the plaintiff for making such assignment. However, without reference to the state of the title to the property as between defendant Walden and the defendants Walling, or either of them, no question is raised as to the fact that the Wallings were let into the possession of the lot in question, and that at the time the suit was commenced they were in the use and occupation thereof.

At the conclusion of the trial in the lower court judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and defendant Walden has appealed therefrom.

The sole question presented for determination by this court is as to the validity of that part of the condition of the contract between the parties thereto that:

"No part of said real property shall ever * * * be used or occupied by any person who is not of the white or the Caucasian race. * * *"

If the question were a new one to this court it would demand careful investigation of the legal principles and the authorities presented by appellant in support of his contention touching the constitutionality of the condition set forth in the contract, to which reference has been had. In view, however, of the fact that the identical question has been raised recently in a preceding case and passed upon by this tribunal adversely to appellant's contention in the case at bar, it becomes unnecessary and inadvisable to devote much time or thought to a consideration of the legal points suggested by appellant. We refer to the case of Los Angeles Investment Co. v. Gary, 181 Cal. 680, 186 P. 596, 9 A. L. R. 115. The facts therein, as stated in the opinion of the court, were that the plaintiff was the owner of a tract of land, which had been subdivided into town lots; that it sold one of such lots to a man named Renaker, who in turn sold it to defendant Gary, who was a negro, and who, with his wife, who was a colored woman, thereafter went into the use and occupation of the property. The deed by which the property was conveyed by the plaintiff therein to Renaker contained a condition "* * * that the said property shall not be sold, leased or rented to any persons other than of the Caucasian race, nor shall any person or persons other than of Caucasian race be permitted to occupy said lot or lots." The deed there, as the contract here, also contained the usual forfeiture and reversionary clauses for breach of any of its conditions. It will thus be seen that the facts in the two cases are practically identical one with the other.

The matter seems to have been thoroughly considered both by the court sitting in department and later, on petition for rehearing, by the court sitting in bank. The conclusion reached, as fairly stated in the syllabus, was that:

"The provision in a deed that no person or persons other than of the Caucasian race shall be permitted to occupy the property is not a restraint upon alienation, but upon the use of the property, and is valid."

This court feels itself bound by the ruling reached in that case. The date of the decision was December 11, 1919, since which time it has been considered as settled law in this state, and accordingly followed by subdividers of property and by purchasers of town lots and the owners of real property in general. It cannot now be disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

O'DELL v. HALL et al. (L. A. 7701.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 27, 1925.)

Appeal and error ⇐766—When record is not presented as prescribed by law, Supreme Court will not consider merits of appeal.

Where appeal under the alternative method was taken from judgment after demurrer was sustained, the Supreme Court will not consider the merits of the appeal, when no argument was made or authorities cited as to sufficiency of complaint, and brief contained no portion of record appellant would call to attention of court, nor was extension of time asked to print a supplemental brief under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, as amended by Laws 1923, p. 748.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by W. H. O'Dell against W. H. Hall and another, Andrew A. Crosbie, individually and as City Marshal of the City of Taft, and the American Surety Company of New York. From a judgment for the last-named defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George M. Cook, of Taft, for appellant.

Irwin & Laird, of Bakersfield, and Charles Del Bondio, of Taft (Rowen Irwin, Rollin Laird, and T. F. Allen, all of Bakersfield, of counsel), for respondents.

WASTE, J. In an action for false imprisonment, brought by the plaintiff against three peace officers of the city of Taft and the American Surety Company, surety on the official bond of the defendant city marshal, the defendants demurred jointly to the second amended complaint. The court overruled the demurrer as to the three defendant peace officers, but sustained it as to the defendant surety without leave to amend. From the judgment thereupon entered in favor of the surety company, the plaintiff has appealed.

The appeal is taken under the alternative method. The only point or argument made in support of the appeal is found in appellant's two-page opening brief (the only one filed), wherein he says:

"There is nothing in the record by which this court may even infer as to or upon what grounds the judge of the superior court sustained the demurrer of the American Surety Company."

No argument is made, and no authorities are cited in support of the sufficiency of the complaint as against the demurrer, which was sustained. Appellant has not printed in his brief, or in a supplement thereto, any portion of the record he would call to the attention of this court, nor has he at any time asked for an extension of time in which to print and file a supplemental brief, as he might have done under section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 748). There is, therefore, no record here presented in the manner prescribed by law upon which this court can consider the merits of the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

MARSHALL v. MARSHALL. (S. F. 10950.)

1. Divorce ⟸289 — Adoption of children by mother, before decree of divorce, does not defeat jurisdiction of court as to alimony.

Where a decree of divorce provided alimony for support of minor children of wife by former marriage, they having been adopted by husband at time of marriage and readopted by wife before divorce, an order modifying decree by striking provisions for alimony as being void, on ground that court had no jurisdiction after the adoption of children by mother, held erroneous.

2. Divorce ⟸308—Recital in decree, that alimony is for support of children, surplusage.

Where husband adopted the children of his wife by former marriage, and before final decree of divorce of these parties the wife readopted children, a provision in the decree for the application of alimony for support of children held to be surplusage or error, since trial court had jurisdiction to award alimony to wife under Civ. Code, §§ 139, 141, 142, 146, 147.

3. Divorce ⟸245(1)—Trial court retains jurisdiction to vacate or modify decree.

A trial court, having awarded alimony in a divorce proceeding, retains jurisdiction to vacate or modify decree in its exercise of sound discretion under Civ. Code, §§ 138, 139.

4. Adoption ⟸4—"Adoption" by husband of wife's children by former marriage does not legally sever parental relationship of mother, so that she could subsequently adopt them.

Where husband adopted children of wife by former marriage under Civ. Code, § 221 et seq., the petition and order in the adoption proceeding, setting out that relationship of parent should be held jointly with his wife, held that such adoption did not legally sever mother's parental relationship, so that she could subsequently adopt the children, notwithstanding section 229, since a joint adoption makes a child in law a child of both spouses, and since "adoption" is the act by which relations of paternity and affiliation are created between persons not so related by nature or by law.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Suit by Emily G. Marshall against John C. Marshall. From an order modifying interlocutory and final decrees of divorce, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Charles L. James, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MYERS, C. J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order made long after judgment purporting to modify both the interlocutory decree and the final decree of divorce by striking out therefrom the provisions therein for the payment of monthly alimony by the defendant to the plaintiff for the support of the latter's two minor children. The plaintiff was a widow with two minor children by her first husband and married the defendant, who thereafter legally adopted these children by proceedings pursuant to the provisions of the Civil Code, sections 221 et seq. Thereafter differences arose between the parties, and on December 15, 1920, they entered into an agreement reciting that they had resolved to live separate and apart and had "mutually agreed to divide the community property as follows": Then followed provisions for the equal division of the community property, and then the following provisions:

"Said party of the second part [defendant] further hereby agrees to pay the sum of $100 a month for the support and education of Vincent A. Marshall and Monica T. Marshall, that is, $50 a month for each, until they reach the age of majority.

"Said party of the second part also agrees that he will surrender the adoption of said children, and it is understood that Mrs. Emily G. Marshall shall readopt said children."

Thereupon, on December 27, 1920, plaintiff filed a petition for the adoption of these two children, together with the written consent thereto of the defendant, and a decree was thereupon entered purporting to accomplish the adoption of her own children by the plaintiff. Four days thereafter an interlocutory decree of divorce was rendered in favor of the plaintiff by default, which awarded the custody of the two children to the plaintiff, but did not refer to them as minor children or as the children of the parties, and contained no finding or recital of fact that they were the children of the parties. It made the same provision for the payment of alimony and substantially the same provisions for the division of the property as were contained in the contract between the parties. Thereafter and on January 13, 1921, plaintiff and defendant entered into another agreement reciting the entry of the interlocutory decree of divorce and providing:

"Whereas, said parties hereto have agreed to settle their property rights in accordance with this agreement as amendatory of said interlocutory decree, and it is hereby agreed between them as follows":

Then follow provisions for a somewhat different division of the community property, but no mention of the subject of alimony. The defendant paid the alimony as provided in the first contract and in the decree for 26 months thereafter, a final decree having in the meantime been entered containing the same provisions respecting the payment of alimony and division of property as were contained in the interlocutory decree. On December 1, 1922, the defendant moved for an order modifying the interlocutory and final decrees by striking therefrom the provisions for the payment of alimony on the grounds "that said order was obtained by misrepresentations made to the court; that the court had no jurisdiction to make said order; and that said order is oppressive and unreasonable." After the hearing, the court granted the motion and made the order upon the ground "that at the time of the issuance and entry of the interlocutory decree of divorce and at the time of the issuance of the final decree of divorce herein there were no children of the marriage of the parties hereto. * * *" This order was evidently predicated upon the conclusion that the adoption of the two children by their own mother changed their status so that they were no longer the children of the parties to the divorce action and that, therefore, the court in the divorce proceeding had no jurisdiction to award alimony for their support. This conclusion was rested upon the authority of Younger v. Younger, 106 Cal. 377, 39 P. 779, wherein by a final decree of divorce the custody of the minor child was awarded to the mother. Thereafter with her consent the child was regularly adopted by its grandfather, pursuant to the provisions of the Civil Code. Subsequent thereto the father applied to the court in the divorce proceedings for a modification of the order awarding the custody of the child to the mother, and this court held that the adoption proceedings had changed the status of the child so that it was no longer the child of either of the parties and the court in the divorce proceedings was deprived thereby of jurisdiction to make any further order affecting the status or custody of such child.

[1-3] The order appealed from herein, purporting to modify the interlocutory decree and final decree, was made long after the expiration of six months. To the extent that such order was made solely upon the ground that the provision for alimony as originally included in the decrees was void as in excess of the jurisdiction of the court, we think it was erroneous. The trial court in the divorce proceeding (which was upon the ground of extreme cruelty) had jurisdiction and power to divide the community property between the spouses or to award all of it to the wife, or to award her alimony in lieu of a division of the property, or in addition thereto, regardless of the question of the existence of children of the marriage of said parties. Civ. Code, §§ 139, 141, 142, 146, 147. It seems therefore that the provision for the application of the alimony thus awarded, to wit, for the support of the two children, may be regarded either as surplusage or as error. If the former, it could be disregarded; if the latter, it became final by the failure to appeal therefrom. Of course, under sections 138 and 139 of the Civil Code the court, having awarded alimony in a divorce proceeding, retains jurisdiction to vacate or modify the same in the exercise of a sound discretion. But it appears with reasonable certainty from the record herein that the modification here appealed from was not made in the exercise of such discretion, but was made solely upon the ground that the original provision was void.

[4] There is another question involved herein which has not been touched upon in the briefs of counsel, namely, the question of the validity and effect of the proceeding whereby the mother purported to adopt her own children. Our Civil Code provisions respecting adoption contain no definition of the term, but all of the definitions seem to be in substantial agreement to the effect that it is the act by which relations of paternity and affiliation are created and recognized as legally existing between persons not so related by nature or by law. In other words, it is a proceeding by which the adopting parent assumes a parental relationship toward the child of another. See 1 Corpus Juris, 1370; 1 R. C. L. 592. It seems unthinkable that one who is both the natural mother and the legal mother of a child can legally adopt such child. The natural mother of a child could legally adopt such child only in a case wherein her parental relationship had theretofore been severed as a matter of law, and this brings us to the question whether or not the adoption of plaintiff's two children by the defendant, her husband, had the effect of legally severing her parental relationship toward the children. We do not think that it had this effect, under the circumstances of this case, notwithstanding the provisions of Civil Code, section 229, that:

"The parents of an adopted child are, from the time of the adoption, relieved of all parental duties towards, and all responsibility for, the child so adopted, and have no right over it."

If, after the adoption of plaintiff's two children by her husband and no further proceedings had, the plaintiff had died, would we hold that her two children were not legally her children and were not her heirs? It seems unlikely It is plain from the record of the adoption proceedings herein that the parties thereto did not intend thereby to sever the parental relationship between the mother and the children. The husband's petition for adoption recited (italics added) that:

"Your petitioner herein is a fit and proper person to be allowed the joint custody and control of said minor children * * * with that of the right of their mother to have such custody and control. * * * Wherefore your petitioner prays that this honorable court make an order that the above-named minors [be] adopted and that they be declared to be adopted by your petitioner, in that he shall jointly together with his wife, Emily Gabriel Marshall, be adjudged on such adoption as having the status of the natural father of said minors. * * *"

The written consent to the adoption filed therein by the mother was to the effect:

"That the said John Charles Marshall adopt the said Vincent Anthony Marshall and Monica Thelma Marshall, minors, my children, as his own natural children, and that in conjunction and jointly with me act, maintain, and have the legal status of a father and * * * shall jointly with me maintain the relationship of a parent to said minors herein mentioned."

The order for adoption ended as follows:

"And that all other persons shall be henceforth relieved of any parental duty towards, and all responsibility for, the said children and have no right or control whatever over them save that of the mother of said minors, namely, Emily Gabriel Marshall, wife of petitioner herein."

It seems plain, therefore, that after the completion of this adoption proceeding the mother of the children still retained her parental relationship toward them, legally as well as by blood. If this be so, it would follow that the proceeding thereafter, whereby she purported to adopt these children, was an utter nullity. If it was not, it would follow as matter of logic, for example, that a wife could, with her husband's consent, legally adopt their minor child and thus sever, as a matter of law, the parental relationship between such child and its father.

In Re Williams, 102 Cal. 70–79, 36 P. 407, 41 Am. St. Rep. 163, it was held that although no express authority therefor is to be found in the Code, nevertheless a husband and wife may jointly adopt a child pursuant to the procedure therein prescribed, the result of which is to make the child, in law, the child of both spouses. Such was the obvious purpose and intent of both of the parties and of the court in the proceeding whereby the defendant herein purported to adopt the minor children of the plaintiff, his wife. We are not prepared to hold that section 229 of the Civil Code was intended to apply to a situation such as this, and to effect a result so plainly opposite to that which was intended.

We conclude, therefore, that the trial court had jurisdiction to include in its decrees the order for the monthly payments by the defendant which was included in both the interlocutory and final decrees, and that the order vacating the same, which was made not in the exercise of discretion under section 138 or section 139 of the Civil Code, but as the setting aside of a void order, should be reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to the trial court to consider the pending motion upon the merits thereof, and to determine the same in accordance with its sound discretion.

It is so ordered.

1. Municipal corporations ⇐918(1)—Bonds authorized at election held within 30 days after passage of ordinance calling election held valid.

In Municipal Utility District Act, § 15, subd. 4, provision that in all particulars not recited in ordinance calling for election for issuance of bonds in pursuance of section 10, election shall be held as provided in Municipal Bond Act, § 3, does not relate only to manner of holding election, but applies generally, and bonds authorized by election held 21 days after ordinance calling it were valid, in view of publication sufficient to notify electors, and provision in statute that irregularity should not affect proceedings, regardless of St. 1921, p. 250, § 10, providing that ordinance passed by board of directors shall not take effect within less than 30 days after its passage.

2. Constitutional law ⟸55—Legislature prescribing procedure to be pursued may provide that irregularity, consisting of failure to carry out directions as to such procedure, will not render void object sought to be attained.

Legislative power, which prescribes procedure to be pursued in any given proceeding, may also provide that irregularity, judicial or otherwise, not involving due process, consisting of failure to carry out directions in legislative act as to such procedure, will not render void object sought to be attained.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸917(2)—Evidence held to sustain finding bonds authorized at election were valid.

In proceeding to validate municipal bond issue under Municipal Utility District Act, evidence held to sustain finding of trial court that there was no error, irregularity, or omission in proceeding affecting any substantial rights of parties objecting to issuance of bonds, that they had full notice of election at which question of issuance of bonds would be submitted to electors, and that vote at such election was full and fair expression of qualified electors.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸918(5)—Court's duty to validate bond election.

As rule, wherever possible to validate municipal bond election, court has duty to do so.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸918(4)—"Majority" construed to mean majority of electors voting.

Requirement of Municipal Utility District Act of approval of bonds by "majority of electors" of district before acquiring or contracting for public utility, means a majority of those voting on such proposition.

Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Majority.]

6. Municipal corporations ⟸271—Municipal Utility Act held not to prevent acquisition of source of water supply.

In view of Municipal Utility District Act, § 15, subd. 1, and section 20, provision in statute that only revenue producing utility should be acquired, owned or operated means that only such utilities as are in their nature revenue producing should be acquired, which would not prevent acquisition or construction of water system because of possibility that it might not be self-sustaining, regardless of fact that district at present has no distribution system.

7. Municipal corporations ⟸911—Failure to provide distribution system for water supply of utility district held not to invalidate bonds.

In proceeding to validate municipal bonds issued under Municipal Utility District Act, where purpose of bonds was to obtain water supply and facilities to be used by district and to dispose of any surplus water, and intention was to take water to boundaries of district and impound it in reservoir already connecting with distribution system supplying inhabitants of part of district, fact that no system of distribution was provided by project, or as part of it, did not make bond issue invalid because project was not within public purpose of district.

8. Municipal corporations ⟸325—Determination of board of directors of utility district that public interest required acquisition of source of water supply held conclusive.

In proceeding under Municipal Utility District Act to validate bonds of municipal utility district for purchasing water supply system and equipment, in absence of fraud and of any attack, finding by trial court that board of directors of district at regular meeting adopted resolution determining that public interest and necessity demanded acquisition of source of water supply and other property to be used for supplying water is conclusive that district will be benefited by proposed improvement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Proceeding by the East Bay Municipal Utility District to validate district water bonds of 1925, opposed by D. Hadsell and others. From a judgment declaring the bonds valid, D. Hadsell and others appeal. Affirmed.

Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant Hadsell.

Jared How and G. S. Arnold, both of San Francisco, for appellants Read and Hays.

William J. Locke, Edward F. Treadwell, T. P. Wittschen, and Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HOUSER, Justice pro tem. The proceeding which is involved herein had for its purpose the obtaining of a judgment declaring valid certain bonds authorized to be issued at an election held pursuant to the provisions of a statute known as the Municipal Utility District Act (Stats. 1921, p. 245). Judgment was rendered in favor of the validity of the bonds, and the defendants have appealed therefrom.

[1] No question is raised regarding the regularity of the proceedings up to the time of the adoption of the ordinance calling the election for the authorization of the issuance of the bonds, but appellants urge that, because by the general terms of the statute, the ordinance calling the election could not go into effect within less than 30 days after its passage, and because of the fact that the election was actually held 21 days after the passage of said ordinance, the election was invalid, and consequently that no authority existed for the issuance of the bonds.

It appears that on October 14, 1924, in purported accordance with the requirements of the statute, the directors of the plaintiff organization enacted "an ordinance ordering, calling and providing for, and giving notice of, an election to be held in the East Bay municipal utility district, state of California, on Tuesday, November 4, 1924, for the purpose of submitting to the qualified electors of said district the proposition of incurring a bonded debt by said district for the construction, completion, and acquisition by said district of a source of water supply from the Mokelumne river and other properties, to be used by said district for acquiring and impounding water for said district and conveying the same thereto, * * * and this ordinance and such publication thereof shall constitute notice of said election. * * *"

As is said by appellants Read and Hays in their opening brief, the procedure set forth in the ordinance "is the complete plan prescribed by the Legislature whereby the district is to be protected against hasty and ill-considered action. It is the only provision made for adequate notice;" and it is apparent from the ordinance that its only purpose was to give notice of the election.

The general language of the statute, found in one of its sections, which, it is claimed by appellants, affects the validity of the ordinance and ultimately the election, is:

"Sec. 10. The board of directors shall act only by ordinance or resolution. * * *

"No ordinance passed by the board shall take effect within less than thirty days after its passage. * * *"

The particular section of the statute, however, which provides for the entire procedure relating to the plan of acquiring a public utility, and, as incidental thereto, the preparation of an ordinance by the board of directors of the district providing for the submission to the electors thereof of the question of the issuance of bonds for the ultimate purpose of financing the proposition, contains, among other things, the following provision (section 15, subd. 4):

"The ordinance calling such election shall recite the objects and purposes for which the indebtedness is proposed to be incurred, the estimated cost of the proposed public improvements, the amount of the principal of the indebtedness to be incurred therefor, and the rate of interest to be paid on said indebtedness, and shall fix the date on which such election will be held, the manner of holding such election and the voting for or against incurring such indebtedness, and in all particulars not recited in such ordinance, such election shall be held as provided in the act entitled 'An act authorizing the incurring of indebtedness by cities, towns, and municipal corporations for municipal improvements, and regulating the acquisition, construction, or completion thereof,' Statutes 1901, page twenty-seven."

It is the contention of the respondent that, by virtue of the language of the statute to which reference has just been had, the notice of the election to be given to the electors of the district is governed by the provisions of said statute of 1901 (page 27), as follows (section 3):

"Such ordinance shall be published once a day for at least seven days in some newspaper published at least six days a week in such municipality, or once a week for two weeks in some newspaper published less than six days a week in such municipality, and one insertion each week for two succeeding weeks shall be a sufficient publication in such newspaper published less than six days per week. In municipalities where no such newspaper is published, such ordinance shall be posted in three public places therein for two succeeding weeks. No other notice of such election need be given."

If the respondent is correct in its contention, there can be no question, so far as this particular point is concerned, as to the validity of the election. It thus becomes of importance to determine which of the two provisions of the statute applies to this case.

The statute of 1901 (page 27) is frequently referred to as the Municipal Bond Act. Its predecessor was the Municipal Bond Act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 399). With reference to the latter act it has been said by this court:

"The whole proceeding from beginning to end is a single special proceeding for the accomplishment of a single special purpose, though consisting of a series of acts." Derby v. Modesto, 104 Cal. 515, 521, 38 P. 900, 902.

That language is applicable to the provisions of the act here under consideration. Those provisions (together with its reference to the statute of 1901, p. 27), present in a single section of the act a complete plan for the "acquisition, construction, or completion" of a public utility. In effect, it therefore becomes a special act in itself, as distinguished from the general provisions of the entire statute. It follows that if the special provisions of the section of the act having to do with the calling of the election, together with the reference therein contained to the act of 1901, page 27, are broad enough to cover the matter of giving notice of the election, the general provisions of the act in question relating to the time within which ordinary ordinances passed by the board of directors of the respondent corporation shall take effect must give way, and permit the special provision for giving notice of the election to take effect and be controlling in the premises.

In the case entitled In re Rouse, Hazard & Co., 91 F. 96, 100, 33 C. C. A. 356, 360, it was said:

"It is an elementary principle of construction that where there are in one act or in several acts contemporaneously passed specific provisions relating to a particular subject, they will govern in respect to that subject as against general provisions contained in the same act."

The same principle is announced in State v. Washburn Waterworks Co., 182 Wis. 287, 292, 196 N. W. 537, 539, as follows:

"That rule is that a specific provision in a statute relating to a particular subject must govern in respect to that subject as against general provisions in other parts of the statute which might otherwise be broad enough to include it."

And in Sanford v. King, 19 S. D. 334, 339, 103 N. W. 28, 30, the language used by the court is:

"It is an old and familiar rule that where there is in the same statute a particular enactment and also a general one, which in its most comprehensive sense would include what is embraced in the former, the particular enactment must be operative, and the general enactment must be taken to affect only such cases within its general language as are not within the provisions of the particular enactment."

To the same effect, see Estate of Hellier, 169 Cal. 77, 82, 145 P. 1008; King v. Armstrong, 9 Cal. App. 368, 371, 99 P. 527; Miller v. Engle, 3 Cal. App. 325, 330, 85 P. 159; Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 31 Cal. App. 100, 159 P. 992; D'Esterre v. City of New York, 104 F. 605, 610, 44 C. C. A. 75; State v. Hobe, 106 Wis. 411, 82 N. W. 336, 340; Dahnke v. People, 168 Ill. 102, 48 N. E. 137, 140, 39 L. R. A. 197; Kepner v. United States, 195 U. S. 100, 125, 24 S. Ct. 797, 49 L. Ed. 114, 1 Ann. Cas. 655.

In addition to the reference in the act under consideration to the act of 1901, page 27, which reference has been quoted herein, the act in question contains the following provision (section 15, subd. 4):

"All matters and things pertaining to the issuance of bonds by such district including the form, limit of denomination, interest, redemption and sale of said bonds, not otherwise provided herein, shall be in accordance with the provisions of said last named act as near as the same may be made applicable."

Considering such language, together with that part of the section of the act here under consideration heretofore set forth herein, and, furthermore, taking into consideration therewith the fact that all that part of said first quoted language to, but not including, the reference to the Statutes of 1901, page 27, is an exact copy of the language of that act which immediately precedes the part thereof which provides for the notice of the election to be given, it is apparent that it was the intention of the Legislature, in passing the act in question, that the entire procedure with reference to the calling of an election for the authorization of the issuance of bonds in a municipal utility district should be identical with the procedure outlined in the Municipal Bond Act, as provided in the Statutes of 1901, page 27. As heretofore stated, that statute is the successor of the Municipal Bond Act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 399), as amended in 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 94), the importance of which fact, so far as the question now before the court is concerned, being shown by the decision of this court in the case of Derby v. City of Modesto, 104 Cal. 515, 38 P. 900. In that case the validity of certain bonds issued by the city of Modesto was the matter before the court. That city was a city of the sixth class, to which, at least generally speaking, in the matter of the adoption of said ordinances, the provisions of section 861 of the Municipal Government Act (Stats. 1883, pp. 93, 269) applied. That section, so far as is here applicable, provides that:

"No ordinance, and no resolution granting any franchise for any purpose, shall be passed by the board of trustees on the day of its introduction, nor within five days thereafter, nor at any other than a regular meeting."

The provisions of the municipal Bond Act (Stats. 1889, p. 399, as amended by Stats. 1891, p. 94), relating to the adoption of an ordinance with reference to the "acquisition, construction, or completion" of any municipal improvement and the calling of an election for the purpose of determining whether or not the city should incur an indebtedness on account of such improvement, were as follows:

"Section 2. Whenever the legislative branch of any city, town, or municipal corporation shall, by ordinance passed by a vote of two-thirds of all its members, and approved by the executive of said city, town, or municipal corporation, determine that the public interest or necessity demands the acquisition, construction, or completion of any municipal buildings, bridges, waterworks, water rights, sewers, or other municipal improvements, the cost of which will be too great to be paid out of the ordinary annual income and revenue of the municipality, they may, after the publication of such ordinance for at least two weeks in some newspaper published in such municipality, and at their next regular meeting after such publication, or at an adjourned meeting, by ordinance passed by a vote of two-thirds of all its members, and also approved by the said executive, call a special election and submit to the qualified voters of said city, town, or municipal corporation, the proposition for the purpose set forth in the ordinance, and no question other than the incurring of indebtedness for said purpose shall be submitted."

It will thus be seen that the requirement of the general law to the effect that no ordinance should be passed on the day of its introduction, nor within five days thereafter, conflicted with the provision, contained in the act there in question, that the ordinance might be passed at the next regular meeting, or at an adjourned meeting, of the board of trustees of the city. Each of the necessary ordinances relating to and preceding the election was passed by the board of trustees on the day on which it was introduced, and it was contended in this court by counsel appearing against the validity of the bonds that such fact rendered each of such several ordinances void, and, consequently, that neither of such ordinances constituted a valid step in the proceedings leading up to the issuance of the bonds. In affirming the validity of the bonds, and, incidentally, the legality of the ordinances, the court said (page 520 [38 P. 902]):

"Ordinance No. 111 providing for the issue, sale, and redemption of the bonds, ordinance No. 113 amending No. 111, and No. 115 approving and confirming the execution of the bonds and the sale thereof to the respondent, the Oakland Bank of Savings, were all proper steps taken by the board in carrying out the expressed will of the voters and authorized under the act of 1891, and were not affected by the supposed restriction in section 861 of the act of 1883. The purpose of said section 861, so far as it requires ordinances to be introduced at least five days before their passage, is to give time for consideration, with a view to prevent hasty and ill-considered legislation; but the act of 1891 goes far beyond this requirement by providing that the first ordinance, which has no effect whatever unless followed by the other steps required by the statute, must be published for two weeks. The whole machinery of the act is framed with a special view to the intelligent action of the voters of the municipality in whose hands rests the power to authorize or refuse to authorize the incurring of the proposed indebtedness. The whole proceeding from beginning to end is a single special proceeding for the accomplishment of a single special purpose, though consisting of a series of acts; while section 861 of the Municipal Government Act relates to the ordinary and general legislation passed by the government of the municipality, if it be true, as appellant contends, that it applies to ordinances other than those granting franchises."

The analogy between that case and the case at bar is evident. In each of them the question of whether the general law or the provisions of the special act should prevail is paramount. Unless the language employed by the section of the act here in question, in the reference to the provisions of the statute of 1901, page 27, is limited in its intent and meaning to something considerably less than is apparent on its face, the decision in the case of Derby v. Modesto should control the ruling by this court.

The statute of 1921, page 245, which is here being considered, contains requirements identical with the statute of 1901, page 27, with reference to the matters to be stated in the ordinances providing for the calling of the election—following which (still identical with the provisions of the act of 1901, page 27) it provides that "in all particulars not recited in such ordinance, such election shall be held as provided in the act * * * of 1901, page twenty-seven."

Counsel for appellants point to the word "held," as contained in the phrase "such election shall be held as provided in the act" (Stats. 1901, p. 27), and seek to have it construed as meaning that the procedure outlined in said statute for the conduct of an election be limited to the very day on which the election took place. If there were nothing else, the additional language of the act occurring in the second sentence, that "all matters and things pertaining to the issuance of bonds by such district * * * shall be in accordance with the provisions of said last named act" (Stats. 1901, p. 27), would seem sufficient to indicate that a proper construction of the word, to which attention has been directed by appellants, would not confine its reference simply to the day of the election, but would include as well the several necessary steps leading thereto.

But even assuming that which seems unjustified, to wit, that the Legislature intended the reference to the Statutes of 1901, page 27, to be applied merely to the procedure on the day on which the election was to be held, in view of the admission by appellants in their brief that the sole purpose of the provision found in the detached section of the act in question, to the effect that no ordinance passed by the board of directors of the plaintiff organization should take effect within less than 30 days after its passage, was to supply "a definite period for the consideration and deliberation of the electorate," the fact that a very large percentage of the registered voters voted at the election, and that the proposition carried by a vote of 81,919 in favor thereof, as compared with 31,998 opposed thereto—and also taking into consideration the further provision of the statute in question, that "the court hearing any proceeding or action inquiring into the regularity, legality or correctness of the proceedings leading up to the issuance of bonds or the validity of such bonds must disregard any error, irregularity, or omission which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties to said action or proceeding"—it would seem that appellants' contention cannot be sustained, at least so far as the point that the election was void because of the fact that 30 days had not elapsed between the time the ordinance was passed and the date of the election.

[2] It is a settled rule of law, as announced in principle in the cases of Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 358, 80 P. 81, and Watkinson v. Vaughn, 182 Cal. 55, 186 P. 753, and cases therein cited, that the legislative power which prescribes the procedure to be pursued in any given proceeding may also legally provide that an irregularity ("jurisdictional" or otherwise, where it does not involve "due process"), consisting of a failure to carry out the directions in the legislative act as to such procedure, will not render void the object sought to be attained. See, also, Los Angeles County Flood Control District v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 131, 169 P. 1028; Miller & Lux v. Board of Supervisors, 189 Cal. 254, 275, 208 P. 304; Miller & Lux v. Secara, 193 Cal. 755, 770, 227 P. 171; City Street Imp. Co. v. Watson, 50 Cal. App. 687, 691, 195 P. 967; Chapman v. Rudolph, 58 Cal. App. 233, 236, 208 P. 370.

The provision of the act, in substance, that, in determining the legality of the proceedings leading up to the issuance of the bonds, the court must disregard any error, irregularity, or omission which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties to the proceeding, would seem broad enough, considering the evidence covering the matter (hereinafter set forth in part), to cover any defect in the procedure adopted which might affect the "definite period for the consideration and deliberation of the electorate" on the question submitted to it.

It is beyond question that the general provision of the statute, that "no ordinance passed by the board shall take effect within thirty days after its passage," if at all applicable to the ordinance calling the election, was for the purpose of allowing a sufficient time to elapse in order that the qualified voters might have knowledge or notice of the election.

The section of the act which appellants claim has application to the notice of the election provides for the 30-day notice by publication. There were, however, but 21 days intervening between the date of the passage of the ordinance calling the election and the date of the election. Of those 21 days no complaint is made. It is to the remaining 9 days which, in addition to the 21 days, it is claimed, should have preceded the election, that attention is directed, and which, it is contended, resulted in an insufficient notice being given to the electors of the district.

[3] The requirement of the statute is that the court "must disregard any error, irregularity, or omission which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties to said action or proceeding." The trial court found on the evidence that:

"No error or irregularity or omission in the proceedings for the authorization of or leading up to the issuance of said bonds of the said district of the par value of $39,000,000 affects or has affected any substantial right or rights of the parties defendant, or any of them. Each of the defendants had full notice that the said proposition for the issuance of said bonds was submitted to the electors of the district at the election to be held on said 4th day of November, 1924, and voted upon the said proposition at said election. The said vote at the said election in favor of the said proposition for the incurring of the said indebtedness of $39,000,000 by the said district was a full and fair expression of the will of the electors of said district, qualified to vote at said election upon said proposition."

Such finding was, in part, based upon evidence that the county clerk in each of the counties of Contra Costa and Alameda (being the counties in which the district is situate) mailed to each registered elector in the district a sample ballot, together with a card showing the precinct of the voter, a copy of the official ballot for the general election, and a pamphlet containing proposed constitutional amendments. Upon the ballot were stated the bond proposition and the date of the election.

Evidence was also submitted on the trial that, between September 24, 1924, and the date of the election on November 4, 1924, general publicity of the election was given in all parts of the district through the medium of the newspapers circulating within the district, and through public meetings and discussions held therein; also that 90,000 copies of the summary of the engineers' report on the project and its approval by the board of directors of the district were distributed at residences within the district, and approximately 10,000 copies of such report were circulated at public meetings held therein. It also appeared that between said dates some 40 or 50 public meetings were held in the district for the purpose of discussing the advisability of the project and the issuance of bonds for the acquisition thereof; that a canvass of the opinions of prominent men of the community relative to the desirability of incurring the bonded indebtedness for the acquisition of the project was made, and the results thereof published in the newspapers circulated in the district; and that the newspapers at all times after the filing of the report of the engineers, on September 22, 1924, up to the time of the election, contained numerous articles and editorials relating to the election. Moreover, the election returns showed that a much heavier vote was cast on the bond proposition than was cast at the same time within the said district for any state official or on any other proposition of any sort; also that the vote on the bonds was approximately three times as great as was the total vote cast at a preceding election in the district for the formation thereof and the election of the first board of directors.

It is a well-known fact that the ordinary newspaper notice of a forthcoming election does not, in fact, have the desired effect of notifying the electors thereof. The ordinary qualified voter is so busy attending to his private affairs, and is so apathetic regarding matters touching the public welfare, that a printed newspaper notice of an election to be held, whether in the near or the distant future, even if seen by such voter, excites in him no particular interest. But in the matter now under consideration, the direct notice of the election received by each registered voter of the district, and the public meetings and discussions, "privately and by the newspapers," regarding the proposition of the issuance of bonds would lead to the conclusion, as indicated by the court's findings, that each person in the district entitled to vote at the election not only had constructive notice but actual notice as well that the election was to be held. Such being the case, it is indisputable that the result of the election was not prejudicially affected by the failure to give the extra 9 days' notice of the election as provided, in effect, by the statute, nor did the "error, irregularity, or omission * * * affect the substantial rights of the parties to said action or proceeding."

In the case of People v. Hoge, 55 Cal. 612, it was ruled that even though the election had been improperly called, if it actually had been held (syllabus in part), "the voice of the people is not to be rejected for a defect, or even a want of notice, if they have in truth been called upon and have spoken." Touching the matter at issue the court said (pages 618, 619):

"It is argued in the first place, that the power to call the election resided in the board of supervisors, and the point is also taken, that action on the part of the Legislature was essential to enforce and give effect to the provision of the Constitution. The first point has already been disposed of, and the second is not, in our opinion, well taken. Legislative action was not necessary to enable the inhabitants of the city and county of San Francisco to act, under section 8, art. xi, of the Constitution, in the matter of framing a charter. * * *

"In this connection, the language of the Supreme Court of Iowa appears applicable: 'Upon considerations like this, the courts have held that the voice of the people is not to be rejected for a defect, or even a want of notice, if they have in truth been called upon and have spoken. In the present case, whether there was notice or not, there was an election, and the people of the county voted, and it is not alleged that any portion of them failed in knowledge of the pendency of the question, or to exercise their franchise.' Dishon v. Smith, County Judge, 10 Iowa, 218.

"We have arrived at the conclusion that the election of March 30, 1880, should be declared valid, the more willingly for the reason that no possible injury can result from such a determination. The people of the city and county of San Francisco have, after a fair and full election, regularly and honestly conducted, expressed their wish that a charter should be prepared for their ratification, and the charter so prepared by the respondent and his associates must, before it can become a law, receive such ratification, and, after that, the approval of the Legislature."

In Rideout v. Los Angeles, 185 Cal. 426, 197 P. 74, it appeared that in a bond election the provisions of the statute had been violated as to the size of type of the ballots, the space for printed instructions to the voters, and the printing of the words "municipal ticket" on the ballots. It was held that the election was legal.

In People v. Prewett, 124 Cal. 7, 56 P. 619, which involved an election to fill vacancies on the board of trustees of a school district, it appeared that the notice of the election failed to state the exact purpose, but merely stated that it was to elect trustees. The court ruled that, in view of the fact that a fair election had been held, the defective notice thereof would not vitiate it. It was said:

"There is no claim that any one was prevented from voting either because of the notice or because the polls were kept open a little less than four hours."

In Preston v. Culbertson, 58 Cal. 198, an election was declared legal where it appeared that in one precinct the election was not held at the place specified in the notice. The court said:

"The important question in such cases is, Have the qualified electors been deprived of a fair opportunity of expressing their preference? Mere irregularities which do not affect the final result should be disregarded."

In McCrary on Elections, on page 134, it is said:

"While it is true that notice is essential to the validity of an election, it is not always essential that the particular form or manner of giving notice which may be prescribed shall be followed. It is essential that the electors should have notice of the time, place and objects of the election—that is, they should have knowledge of them; but an omission to follow the particular mode provided by statute for publishing such notice may not render the election void, and will not, if the electors have actual notice, and do, in fact, take part in the election."

The point is covered in 20 Corpus Juris, page 96, as follows:

"The test for determining whether an election is invalidated for want of a notice prescribed by statute is whether, on the one hand, the voters generally have had knowledge of the election and full opportunity to express their will, or whether, on the other hand, the omission has resulted in depriving a sufficient number of electors of the opportunity to exercise their franchise to change the result of the election."

In Lewis and Putney's Handbook on Election Laws, the rule is stated as being:

"* * * Even in the case of special elections, or elections to fill vacancies, while a notice is invariably required to be issued, still, if there is no notice or proclamation made, but if the size of the vote shows that the voters had general knowledge of the election, the election will be upheld. Where the statute required a certain number of days' notice to be given of the election or designated what facts shall be set out in the notice, these provisions should be complied with, but a substantial compliance with the statute is sufficient."

In the case of Weisgerber v. Nez Perce County, 33 Idaho, 670, 197 P. 562, it appears that an action was commenced to enjoin the issuance of bonds on the ground, among other things, that notice of the election had not been given for the time provided by the statute. After citing some authorities said to hold that a strict compliance with the statutory requirement was an essential prerequisite to the validity of the election, the court said:

"However, we are of the opinion that the correct rule, and the one supported by the great weight of authority, may be stated as follows: Statutory directions as to the time and manner of giving notice of elections are mandatory upon the officers charged with the duty of calling the election, and will be upheld strictly in a direct action instituted before an election; but after an election has been held, such statutory requirements are directory, unless it appears that the failure to give notice for the full time specified by the statute has prevented electors from giving a full and free expression of their will at the election, or unless the statute contains a further provision, the necessary effect of which is that failure to give notice for the statutory time will render the election void. [Citing 30 authorities.]

"The court found that the electors of the county were fully informed as to the time, place, and purpose of holding the election, and as to the polling place in each precinct where the votes would be received. The court also found that none of the defects above referred to affected the result of the election. It is not averred in the complaint, nor shown by the record, that any elector was deprived of his vote by reason of the fact that notices were not posted the statutory length of time in the five precincts. The court further found affirmatively that none of the electors failed to vote by reason of any of the irregularities mentioned in the complaint.

"We are of the opinion that the election was not illegal or void on account of the defects in the posting of notices in the five precincts of the county."

Each of the cases of Dishon v. Smith, 10 Iowa, 212, and that of State v. Doherty, 16 Wash. 382, 47 P. 958, 58 Am. St. Rep. 39, involved the question of the effect of a defective notice of election. In the former case, among other things, it was said:

"Upon considerations like these the courts have held that the voice of the people is not to be rejected for a defect, or even a want of notice, if they have, in truth, been called upon and have spoken. In the present case, whether there were notices or not, there was an election and the people of the county voted, and it is not alleged that any portion of them failed in knowledge of the pendency of the question, or to exercise their franchise."

In the latter case, as appears in the opinion of the court:

"The clerk complied with section 4 of the ordinance in all particulars, except that he did not post certified copies of the proposed amendments in the different polling places within the city. But the court found that newspaper clippings containing copies of the proposed amendments 'were duly posted in all of the voting booths of the city of Tacoma by the election officers at said voting places.' The court also found that notice of the election signed by the city clerk was published in the Tacoma Daily Ledger, the Tacoma Morning Union, and the Evening News—all daily newspapers published in said city—from the 28th of March to the 7th day of April, inclusive, and that no other or further notice of such election, nor the election on said proposed amendment, was given. The court found that these newspapers circulated throughout the political divisions of the city of Tacoma, and 120,000 copies were distributed in each and every one of the political divisions and precincts; also, 'that the said amendments were discussed by the people generally in their homes, from the platform and from the pulpit in the various churches of the city to such an extent that the pendency of said election for the adoption or rejection of said proposed amendments was a matter of public notoriety throughout said city.'"

"Having ascertained 'that the amendments were discussed by the people generally in their homes * * * to such an extent that the pendency of said election for the adoption or rejection of said proposed amendments was a matter of public notoriety throughout said city,' and having further ascertained by the vote actually polled that the great body of the electors expressed their will upon these amendments, which it was their province to adopt or reject, the conclusion is inevitable that the result of the election was not affected by the fact that a literal compliance with the formalities prescribed by law for giving notice was not observed. The very purpose for which the statute directed the posting of notices was accomplished when actual knowledge of the election was brought home to the voter, it matters not by what means the knowledge was imparted to him. To hold otherwise would be to disregard the expressed will of the people in a matter which the law has confided to them."

Other cases which are of like effect are City of Ardmore v. State, 24 Okl. 862, 104 P. 913; Town of Grove v. Haskell, 24 Okl. 707, 104 P. 56; Ellis v. Karl, 7 Neb. 381; Wheat v. Smith, 50 Ark. 266, 7 S. W. 161; Demaree v. Johnson, 150 Ind. 419, 50 N. E. 376; City of Albuquerque v. Water Supply Co., 24 N. M. 368, 174 P. 217, 5 A. L. R. 519; Bauer v. Board, 157 Mich. 395, 122 N. W. 121; 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 213, p. 431; Hill v. Smithville, etc. (Tex. Civ. App.) 239 S. W. 987; Hearn v. Court of Comm'rs, 182 Ala. 392, 62 So. 535. And for further authorities, see Gollar v. City of Louisville, 187 Ky. 448, 219 S. W. 421, where a bond election was sustained although notice of election was not published the full ten days as prescribed by the statute; Smith v. State, 84 Okl. 283, 203 P. 1046, and Ratliff v. State, 79 Okl. 152, 191 P. 1038, in each of which cases it appeared that there was a failure to give the prescribed notice; Fike v. State, 25 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 554, where there was a failure to publish proclamation of election for the statutory time.

It is thus apparent that the election itself is the controlling feature and the ultimate objective of the statute. If the election has been honestly and fairly conducted, and no one has been injured by the manner in which the preliminary steps leading thereto have been taken, no reason exists for declaring it invalid. In the instant case there was no evidence offered on the part of the defendants tending to show that they had been prejudicially affected by the procedure which had been adopted and followed leading up to the election. As heretofore set forth, the findings by the court were to the effect that no error or irregularity or omission in the proceedings affected any of the substantial rights of the defendants; that they had full notice that the proposition for the issuance of the bonds would be submitted to the electors of the district at an election to be held on the said 4th day of November, 1924; and that the vote at such election was a full and fair expression of the will of the electors of the district who were qualified to vote at said election upon said proposition. Those findings, while in some respects possibly subject to appellants' criticism that they are but conclusions of law, nevertheless speak the truth as an ultimate expression by the court of the conditions surrounding the situation.

[4] The books are filled to overflowing with statements of the rule, in substance, that, wherever possible from a standpoint of legal justice to validate an election, it is the duty of the court to do so. In Rideout v. City of Los Angeles, 185 Cal. 426, 430, 197 P. 74, 75, it is said:

"It is a primary principle of law as applied to election contests that it is the duty of the court to validate the election if possible."

In Law v. San Francisco, 144 Cal. 384, 394, 77 P. 1014, 1019, occurs the following:

"Universally, courts have been reluctant to defeat the fair expression of the popular will in elections, unless the plain mandate of the law permitted of no alternative."

And in People v. Prewett, 124 Cal. 7, 10, 56 P. 619, 620, the court says:

"Elections should never be held void unless clearly illegal. It is the duty of the court to give effect to them, if possible."

To the same effect, see 20 Corpus Juris, page 230; Cooley's Constitutional Limitations (7th Ed.) p. 928.

It would follow, as a conclusion from what has been said, that, as applied to the facts of this case, notwithstanding some authorities to the contrary, as cited in appellants' brief, the failure to give the full 30 days' notice of the election in nowise affected the substantial rights of the defendants in the premises.

[5] It is urged by appellants that because the statute which provides for the calling of the election contains the provision "that no public utility shall ever be acquired or contracted for unless the acquisition of said utility has first been approved by a majority of the electors of said district," an election at which less than a majority of the "registered electors of the district" cast their votes in favor of the issuance of the bonds, does not constitute a compliance with the requirements of the statute so as to authorize the bonds to be issued.

Much might be said in support of appellants' contention. Excerpts from different portions of the statute under consideration would seem to indicate that in the use by the Legislature of the words, "a majority of the electors of said district," that body was fully aware of the legal significance to be attached thereto, and consequently used such language with discrimination, and adopted it advisedly. It is, however, unquestionable that a literal compliance with such direction would be wholly impracticable, if not impossible. The registry of qualified voters, as provided by law, would not cover the situation. It is plain that electors of a district do not necessarily consist only of all voters who have registered. Many persons who are entitled to vote fail to register. A great public catastrophe, such as, for example, a flood, or a fire, might possibly occur which might destroy the whole, or the greater part, of the district. Many registered voters might lose their lives, and many of the living who remained might be forced to remove from the district in order that they might be properly housed or earn a livelihood; and, in the happening of such an untoward event, the registration list, while showing perhaps thousands of electors entitled to vote, would be utterly unreliable.

The result of a strict interpretation of the provision of the statute would be that, in this particular district containing 196,899 registered electors, without weeks or months of inquiry and special investigation as to who, on the day of the election, were electors of the district, as distinguished from registered electors thereof, the outcome of the election could not be ascertained. It was undoubtedly within the province of the Legislature to lay down any reasonable conditions for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a public utility should be acquired; but it would seem unlikely, at least, that any obstacles were intentionally placed in the act for the express purpose of rendering it useless. The difficulties which would attend such situation, while possibly not insurmountable, would be so great that, from a practical standpoint, with full advance knowledge by the electors of the district of the literal requirements of the statute, no election would ever be held, and the act of the Legislature would, therefore, become a nullity. Such an absurdity—that the Legislature "with malice aforethought" perpetrated such an outrage on the utility district—is unthinkable. The intention of the Legislature was undoubtedly that its laudable endeavor should bear fruit, and not that its labors should be in vain.

In 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) § 383, it is stated:

"* * * That when by statute a vote of 'a majority of the voters' or of 'a majority of the legal voters' or of 'a majority of the qualified voters' of a municipality is required for election to office or for any other municipal purpose, those who do not vote, acquiesce in the result, and a majority of those actually voting is, unless otherwise specially provided, sufficient, though in point of fact it may not be a majority of all who are entitled to vote. * * *"

And in section 891, volume 2, the same author states:

"In other cases where the requirement is that the issue be approved by a prescribed majority of the qualified voters of the municipality, or other language of similar import, the decisions usually hold that a vote of the majority of all the qualified voters of the municipality is not required, but only the requisite majority of the qualified voters voting at the election."

In 2 McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, § 418, p. 925, it is said:

"Unless the law provides otherwise, either in express terms or by necessary implication, the preponderance of judicial decisions hold that, if the officer or proposition receives the required number of legal votes cast at the particular election (whether a majority, two-thirds, three-fourths or any other named proportion), the officer will be declared legally elected or the proposition duly carried, notwithstanding such votes do not constitute the required number when all the qualified voters of the electorate are counted."

In Simonton on Municipal Bonds, page 94, the rule is thus stated:

"The Constitution or statute usually requires that the matter submitted for popular approval shall receive a majority or some other proportion of the legal or qualified voters. The courts in almost every instance have construed this to mean, without reference to any constitutional provision on the subject, a majority or other required proportion of the legal voters, voting at the election when the question is submitted, unless otherwise provided."

The authorities sustaining the principle thus announced by the text-writers are very numerous. Amoung them may be cited the following: County of Cass v. Johnston, 95 U. S. 360, 24 L. Ed. 416; St. Joseph Township v. Rogers, 83 U. S. (16 Wall.) 644, 21 L. Ed. 328; Douglass v. Pike County, 101 U. S. 677, 25 L. Ed. 968; Carroll County v. Smith, 111 U. S. 556, 4 S. Ct. 539, 28 L. Ed. 517.

In Taylor v. Taylor. 10 Minn. 107 (Gil. 81), a provision was required to be adopted by "a majority of such electors." The court said, in part (page 88):

"The plaintiff claims that this section requires an absolute majority of those qualified to vote in the county at the time of the election. This construction is perhaps in accordance with the letter of the Constitution, but it leads to such practical inconvenience, hardship, and absurdity, we cannot believe it to be in accordance with the spirit and meaning of that instrument. * * * In every case it would be necessary, if this construction is correct, to show by legal evidence the actual number of persons legally qualified to vote in the county at the time of such election, and we are unable to see how this could be determined except by a suit or proceeding in a court qualified to decide authoritatively and finally such questions. The difficulty of making such proof in many cases would be so great as to make it impracticable. * * * When a particular construction of an instrument leads to hardship, inconvenience, or absurdity, the respect due from courts to a coordinate branch of the government or to a constitutional convention, will not permit them readily to presume that such construction was intended, and they will under such circumstances a little deviate from the received sense of the words, not because they have a right to disregard the will of the framers of the instrument, but for the purpose of truly arriving at and carrying out their will."

The same construction was placed on similar provisions in the following cases: Bayard v. Klinge, 16 Minn. 249 (Gil. 221), where the provision was "majority of such electors"; Everett v. Smith, 22 Minn. 53 ("majority of such electors"); Shearer v. Board of Supervisors, 128 Mich. 552, 87 N. W. 789 ("by a majority vote of the electors of said county"); Attorney General v. Common Council, 164 Mich. 143, 129 N. W. 44 ("in case the electors shall by majority vote"); Pickett v. Russell, 42 Fla. 634, 28 So. 764 ("a majority of the qualified electors"); Green v. State Board of Canvassers, 5 Idaho, 130, 47 P. 259, 95 Am. St. Rep. 169 ("a majority of the electors"); Foy v. Gardiner Water District, 98 Me. 82, 56 A. 201 ("a majority vote of the legal voters"); Citizens and Taxpayers v. Williams, 49 La. Ann. 422, 21 So. 647, 37 L. R. A. 761 ("by a vote of a majority of the property taxpayers"); Taylor v. McFadden, 84 Iowa, 262, 50 N. W. 1070 ("a majority of the voters"); Town of Southington v. Southington Water Co., 80 Conn. 646, 69 A. 1023, 13 Ann. Cas. 411 ("a majority of the legal voters"); People v. Warfield, 20 Ill. 160 ("a majority of the voters"); Fabro v. Town of Gallup, 15 N. M. 108, 103 P. 271 ("two-thirds of the qualified voters"); Walker v. Oswald, 68 Md. 146, 11 A. 711 ("majority of voters"); Smith v. Proctor, 130 N. Y. 319, 29 N. E. 312, 14 L. R. A. 403 ("majority of all the inhabitants * * * entitled to vote"); Cronly v. City of Tucson, 6 Ariz. 235, 56 P. 876 ("two-thirds of qualified voters"); City of Rome v. Whitestown, etc., Co., 113 App. Div. 547, 100 N. Y. S. 357 ("majority of the voters"); Bradshaw v. Marmion (Tex. Civ. App.) 188 S. W. 973 ("majority of the qualified voters"); Vance v. Austell, 45 Ark. 400 ("a majority of the qualified voters"); Louisville, etc., R. R. v. County Court, 1 Sneed. (Tenn.) 637, 62 Am. Dec. 424 ("majority of voters"); Morse v. Granite County, 44 Mont. 78, 119 P. 286 ("majority of electors"); Harby v. Jennings, 112 S. C. 479, 101 S. E. 649 ("majority of the electors"); Mobile Savings Bank

v. Oktibbeha (D. C.) 22 F. 580; Id. (D. C.) 24 F. 110 ("two-thirds of qualified voters"); Madison County v. Priestly (C. C.) 42 F. 817 ("two-thirds of qualified voters"); Pacific Imp. Co. v. City of Clarksdale, 74 F. 528, 20 C. C. A. 635 ("two-thirds qualified voters").

There can be no denial of the fact that in several well-considered cases it has been held that, notwithstanding the obvious and extreme difficulties which the situation presents, where the Legislature has spoken, and thereby expressly directed that an election to be valid must be carried by a majority of the electors of any given locality, such mandate must be given full observance. The great weight of authority, however, is to the effect that, because of the utter impracticability of carrying out the legislative fiat as strictly construed, the common sense meaning of the words "majority of the electors" should be applied, and consequently construed, as "majority of the electors voting on the proposition."

[6] The third point suggested by appellants as a reason why the judgment of the trial court should be reversed is that, according to the provisions of the act "only revenue producing utilities shall be acquired, owned or operated by a district;" whereas the utility sought to be acquired by the plaintiff organization is not revenue producing.

It is urged by appellants that, when the contemplated utility in question has been fully constructed and in operation, water will be brought only to the boundary of the district, and, as the district is not the owner of a distribution system, and as the statute further provides that "each public utility owned and operated by the district shall be self-sustaining," the statutory requirement will not have been complied with, and, consequently, that the utility district is without power to carry out the project or, as incidental thereto, to issue and sell bonds for the purpose of thereby financing the proposition.

The first subdivision of the section of the act here under consideration (section 15) provides that "whenever the board of directors by resolution shall determine that the public interest or necessity of the district demands the * * * construction * * * of any public utility," etc., certain steps outlined in the act may be taken to accomplish the desired end; and there are many references contained within the statute showing that the intention of the Legislature included the construction of a public utility, rather than limiting the district to the purchase of a completed plant.

In the construction of a new public project, while it may be most earnestly hoped or believed, from a careful survey of the situation, that the operation of the completed plant will result in a net revenue producing utility, no man with certainty can foresee the result from a standpoint of financial gain. It may be a profit producing enterprise, or, on the other hand, there is a possibility of loss arising from its operation. If profitable, the utility will be "self-sustaining"; but, if unprofitable, to the extent that the losses exceed the gains, manifestly it will not meet the literal requirements of the statute. It would be unreasonable to demand that, before the proposition to vote bonds for the purpose of eventually financing the project may be submitted, the promoters thereof—that is to say, the citizens of the district—should guarantee that it will be "revenue producing" in the sense that no loss will accrue to the district. The language of the act should receive a construction to the effect that only such utilities as in their nature are revenue producing should be acquired by the district, which would, perhaps, exclude such improvements as public parks, libraries, etc. So construed, the project to be constructed would be "self-sustaining," dependent largely upon its management and the support which it received from the owners thereof, to wit, the inhabitants and taxpayers of the district. But, as tending to show that the Legislature realized that there was no absolute certainty that the project would be "self-sustaining," the act further provides (section 20):

"If from any cause the revenues of the district shall be inadequate to pay the principal or interest on any bonded debt as it becomes due, the board of directors must, or if funds are needed to carry out the objects and purposes of the district, which cannot be provided for out of the revenues of the district, then the board of directors may, levy a tax for such purposes as herein provided. * * *"

The objection that the district has no distribution system, and consequently, would be unable to sell its product, is met by the reply that, because of the vastness of the proposition, necessarily much time would elapse before the project would be completed, and before that time will arrive, the district, acting within its powers, may either construct a distribution system within its boundaries, or may acquire one already there constructed, either by lease or by purchase. If an outright purchase or the construction of a new distribution plant should be deemed advisable, it is not beyond the realms of possibility that, instead of relying upon a bond issue for the necessary funds with which to make payment therefor, the district might, through the medium of at present unrevealed sources, make compensation in cash, or possibly finance the proposition by means of assessments levied against the taxpayers of the district. Tested by the rule that every presumption favors the validity of the bond issue, we are constrained to hold that appellants' objection regarding the revenue producing ability of the utility, together with its asserted nonself-sustaining qualities, cannot be sustained.

[7] Appellants' final assault upon the judgment rendered by the trial court is that, because "no distribution system is provided with this project, or as part of it, its construction cannot benefit the district or the district's inhabitants, and therefore the project is not within or for any of the public purposes of the district."

For the reason that the utility intended to be constructed has no present method of becoming revenue producing from business to be transacted by it within the district, but that necessarily "it will serve only the needs of persons or industries outside the boundaries" thereof, it is urged that the taxpayers within the district cannot be called upon, either by taxes or by assessments upon their property, to meet the obligation incurred for the payment of the project.

The plan proposed to be followed is set forth in a condensed form in the proposition submitted to the electors of the district, to be voted upon at the election to which reference herein has so frequently been had, as follows:

"Shall the East Bay municipal utility district incur a bonded debt in the amount of thirty-nine million dollars ($39,000,000) for the construction, completion, and acquisition of a source of water supply from the Mokelumne river and other properties and facilities to be used by said district for acquiring and impounding water for said district and conveying the same thereto and for disposing of any surplus waters thereof?"

It thus appears that the purpose was at least to obtain a water supply and facilities to be used by the district, "and for disposing of any surplus waters." The evidence shows that the intention was to take the water to the boundaries of the district and there impound it in a reservoir, which is already connected with a distribution system which now supplies the inhabitants of part of the district. As before stated, under certain sections of the act the plaintiff organization is empowered either to acquire that system by purchase or by lease, or it may construct a new distribution system. The consummation of the entire plan of furnishing an adequate supply of water to the district may take a number of years for its accomplishment. Before the system contemplated by the present plan to bring the water to the boundaries of the district may be constructed, the district, by one of the means heretofore suggested, may have acquired a distribution system to connect with the plant already authorized to be constructed. The record herein discloses the fact that proceedings already have been commenced by the district for that very purpose.

[8] The trial court found that, at the inception of the proceedings looking to the construction of the project herein mentioned, the board of directors of the plaintiff organization, at a regular meeting thereof, adopted a resolution by which it was "determined that public interest and necessity demanded the acquisition of a source or sources of water supply for said district and other properties to be used by said district for acquiring and impounding water for said district and for conveying the same thereto."

In the absence of fraud and of any attack upon said finding, it thus appears conclusively and beyond question by the appellants that the district will be benefited by the proposed improvement. Platt v. City and County of San Francisco, 158 Cal. 74, 93, 110 P. 304; Pool v. Simmons, 134 Cal. 621, 625, 66 P. 872; Santa Ana v. Harlin, 99 Cal. 538, 540, 34 P. 224. Such being the legal status of the question suggested by appellants, it follows that their point is not well taken.

The judgment is affirmed.

BAUER et al. v. BAUER et al.

(L. A. 8482.)

Executors and administrators ⇐214 — Claim for reinterment of remains of deceased not proper "funeral expense."

Where an elder son of deceased, without authority from executors of the estate, ordered the remains of deceased to be transferred, a claim of such reinterment held not to be proper funeral expense, as defined in Code Civ. Proc. § 1646, funeral expenses having reference to those necessary and in fact compulsory expenditures necessary immediately after the death of decedent, and embracing coffining, embalming, arraying, and sepulture or cremating of the body, together with the accustomed forms and ceremonies attending the disposition of the remains.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Proceeding for the allowance of a claim by the Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association and another against the estate of Emile Bauer, deceased. From a judgment in favor of Lloyd C. Bauer and another, executors, denying the claim, claimants appeal. Affirmed.

C. Franklin Baxter, of Los Angeles, for appellant Cypress Lawn Cemetery, etc.

Hamilton A. Bauer, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

J. W. Morin and Morin, Newell & Brown, all of Pasadena, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from an order of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, sitting in probate, denying the application of the appellants herein for an order directing the allowance and payment of a claim which had theretofore been presented by the appellant Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association, embracing certain charges and expenditures made by it in removal of ashes of the decedent several months after the death and funeral and cremation of the remains of said decedent from their primary place of deposit to another and, it is claimed, more fitting and suitable niche in the said appellant's new columbarium, solely upon the request and direction of its coappellant Hamilton A. Bauer, an elder son of said decedent. The additional facts preceding and attending the application for the allowance of said claim and the denial thereof by said court are in substance the following: Emile Bauer, the decedent referred to in appellants' said application, died in the city of Pasadena on June 15, 1923, where for many years he had resided. He had been twice married. He left surviving him his widow by his second marriage and a younger son, the offspring of said marriage. He also left surviving him an elder son by his first marriage, viz., Hamilton A. Bauer, one of the appellants herein. The deceased left an estate of the approximate value of $100,000. Some years prior to his death he had selected a receptacle for the ashes of his deceased children by his former marriage and for his own remains, which in his will he directed should be cremated. The selected custodian of the ashes of his deceased children and himself was the Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association, one of the appellants herein, and prior to his death the ashes of his said deceased children had by his direction been deposited in a niche in an older columbarium of such association. Upon his decease and after his funeral and the cremation of his remains, his surviving widow, who with his said younger son had been named as the executrix and executor, respectively, of his estate, directed the local undertaker to transmit the ashes of her deceased husband to the Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association for deposit in said niche. Her direction in that respect was complied with and the deposit accordingly made. Several months went by, when Hamilton A. Bauer, the elder son of the decedent, and one of the appellants herein, deeming the place of deposit of the ashes of his deceased father unsuited to a man of his wealth or station, went upon his own initiative to the said cemetery association, selected another niche in its new columbarium, directed an inscription to be prepared and placed upon the urn containing his father's ashes, and upon their transference to the new place of deposit at considerable expense ordered the bill sent to the executrix and executor of his father's estate, whom he had not consulted nor sought the concurrence or acquiescence of in making the foregoing arrangements, and in incurring the expense incident thereto. It was the bill of expense thus incurred which, upon presentation, the executrix and executor of said estate refused to pay. Upon the hearing on the application of the appellants for an order compelling the allowance and payment by the estate of said claim, Hamilton A. Bauer was the only witness examined, and it was upon his testimony to substantially the foregoing facts that the order denying said application was predicated.

The claim for the payment of which the appellants made their aforesaid application to the probate court formed no proper part of the "funeral expenses" of the decedent within the meaning of that term as employed in the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1646. The term "funeral expenses" has reference to those necessary and, in fact, compulsory expenditures, the necessity for which arises immediately upon and after the death of the decedent, and which embrace the coffining, embalmment, arraying, and sepulture or cremation of his body, together with those accustomed forms and ceremonies which attend upon the present disposition of his remains. 2 Woerner, Administration (3d Ed.) § 358. The term has been held to include the expense of a monument or tombstone over the grave of the deceased (Fairman's Appeal, 30 Conn. 205; Pease v. Christman, 158 Ind. 642, 64 N. E. 90), but not to include the cost of subsequently inclosing the burial lot (In re Meyer's Estate, 18 Phila. [Pa.] 42), nor to include the making of a portrait of the deceased (Appeal of McGlinsey [Pa.] 14 Serg. & R. 64), nor to embrace the cost of reinterment unless the first place of interment was found to be improper (Watkins v. Romine, 106 Ind. 378, 7 N. E. 193). In the instant case we must assume in support of the order of the probate court that it made the implied finding that the original place of deposit of the ashes of the deceased was not improper, especially in view of the admitted fact that it was the place selected by the decedent in his lifetime for the deposit of the ashes of his deceased children and of his own ashes upon his decease. The expenditure upon which the appellants' claim is predicated not being properly classed as "funeral expenses," under the particular circumstances of this case, it follows that it was not such an expenditure as might have been ordered by the friends or relatives of the deceased prior to the appointment of an executor or administrator of his estate, and which, if reasonable, considering the amount of the estate of the deceased and the circumstances surrounding his death and burial, would be a proper charge against his estate. Estate of Hincheon, 159 Cal. 755, 763, 116 P. 47, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 303; 2 Woerner, Administration (2d Ed.) § 357; France's Estate, 75 Pa. 220. Not being such, it is clear that the appellant Cypress Lawn Cemetery Association would have no right to charge against the estate of said decedent the expenses of removing the ashes of the decedent to another place than that of their primary deposit if such removal had been undertaken upon its own initative, and it would seem to be equally clear that it could not do so when it had taken such action upon the initiative or direction of a son of the deceased, who bore no official relation to those in immediate charge of the affairs and properties of the estate, and who had no other authority than that of his own initiative to direct the removal of his father's ashes, long after their primary interment, to another place of repose. The question as to who is entitled to the remains or ashes of a deceased person is one to which much learning has been applied, particularly in the more ancient precedents, as may be seen from the notes to Wynkoop v. Wynkoop, 82 Am. Dec. 506; but this is not so much the question here as is the inquiry as to who may be entitled to create a charge against the estate of a decedent by incurring or directing an expenditure for the transfer of the latter's remains or ashes, long after his decease, from one place of sepulture to another. It is our view that there were two courses open to the appellant Hamilton A. Bauer in the premises as presented by him upon the hearing upon the application to the probate court. One of these was to secure the prior order or subsequent acquiescence of the executrix and executor of the estate in the removal of the ashes of the deceased to another place of deposit as directed by him; or, as the other alternative, to pay the expense of such removal himself.

The order is affirmed.

NOBLE v. NOBLE et al. (Civ. 5099.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. July 6, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 31, 1925.)

1. Executors and administrators ⟸221(4) — Finding of trial court that claim had not been paid sustained by evidence.

In an action against an executor on a rejected claim, a finding by the trial court that rents and interest on property were not paid by decedent held sustained by claimant's testimony.

2. Executors and administrators ⟸443(5) — Complaint held not to set out cause of action for recovery of specific interest on property.

A complaint alleging that property had been turned over to deceased who agreed to give proceeds to the plaintiff, with no allegation of agreement to pay a specific rate of interest, does not state a cause of action either for a hiring of property at 7 per cent. for its use or on an oral promise to pay interest.

3. Trusts ⟸371(3)—The complaint for breach of trust must plead a breach.

A complaint, to set out a cause of action for breach of trust, must plead a breach.

4. Trusts ⟸371(2)—Complaint held not to state cause of action on continuing trust to pay interest on property.

A complaint alleging that property was turned over to deceased, who agreed to pay proceeds to plaintiff, but which fails to allege a promise to pay any rate of interest, held not to state a cause of action on a continuing trust to pay 7 per cent. interest on such property.

5. Trial ⟸396(3)—Findings of agreement to pay interest on a sum certain held not supported by pleadings.

A complaint alleging an agreement to pay plaintiff proceeds of property does not support a finding that deceased agreed to pay plaintiff 7 per cent. on a sum certain.

6. Appeal and error ⟸293 — Objection that finding not supported by pleading proper on appeal, though there was no motion for new trial under amendment to Code.

An objection that finding is not supported by pleading may be made on appeal, though no motion for a new trial was made, in view of amendments of 1915 (St. 1915, pp. 205, 328) to Code Civ. Proc. §§ 939, 956.

7. Executors and administrators ⟸221(4)—Finding of agreement to pay "good interest" on property held not supported by the evidence.

A finding that deceased obligated himself to pay "good interest" on property turned over to him held not supported by the evidence.

8. Limitation of actions ⟸102(4)—Statute of limitations no bar to action on unrepudiated continuing trust.

In an action against an executor on a rejected claim based on a continuing trust which was not repudiated, the statute of limitations is not a bar.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Floride Noble against Edward B. Noble and another, executors of the last will and testament of Patrick Noble, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Mervyn R. Dowd and John E. Bennett, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. Plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants as executors of the last will and testament of Patrick

Noble, deceased, to recover a judgment based on a rejected claim, or rather a claim not allowed by the defendants. The defendants answered, a trial was had in the trial court, the court sitting without a jury, and judgment went for the plaintiff. The defendants have appealed, and have brought up the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

In her complaint the plaintiff alleged that the defendants are executors; that on the 21st day of July, 1908, the plaintiff deeded two houses and a lot at Santa Monica to her brother, Patrick Noble; that the property was then of the value of $7,500; that the plaintiff was the only surviving sister of Patrick, and that she deeded the property to him on the agreement that he would manage the same and would invest and reinvest the proceeds of the property for her benefit and would deliver to her the proceeds of the property at such time as might be agreeable to Patrick or to herself; that the agreement was oral, and was made by reason of the trust and confidence reposed by the plaintiff in her brother, and by reason of the brotherly interest and affection of the said Patrick to the plaintiff; that Patrick continued to hold the trusteeship of the said property up to the time of his death in October, 1920, without making to plaintiff any accounting or paying to plaintiff any interest upon the amount of the value of the property or any of the rents, issues or profits thereof; that on the 29th day of June, 1921, plaintiff presented a claim for $6.225.25, the amount of interest at 7 per cent. from the 21st day of July, 1908, to the date of filing the claim upon the principal sum of $7,500; that the claim was not allowed, and that there is now due $6,225.25.

[1] The trial court made a finding to the effect that Patrick did not pay to the plaintiff any of the rents or proceeds of the property, or any interest upon the value of the property. The appellants attack the finding as not being supported by the evidence. We think that the attack cannot be sustained. The record discloses that Patrick made many payments to his sister during the period mentioned, but the real controversy between the parties is as to what those payments were made in liquidation of. The contention of the appellants as made in the trial court and as made in this court is that the said payments were made by Patrick to discharge the indentical claim which the plaintiff presents in this action. On the other hand, the plaintiff claims that the payments were made by reason of other obligations. She so testified in the trial court. Assuming that the trial court accepted her testimony as true, then and in that event there was evidence to support the finding against which the attack is made.

[2] The appellants also contend that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In reply to that attack it will be noted at once that the complaint is susceptible of several different interpretations. It might be urged that the complaint purports to plead that the plaintiff hired to her brother Patrick her property, and that he undertook to pay for the use thereof 7 per cent. interest on its value. Again, it may be claimed for the pleading that it purports to be a cause of action based on an oral promise to pay interest. After being served with process the defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient, and also on the ground that it was uncertain because it could not be ascertained what were the terms or conditions on which Patrick entered into the obligation. It is earnestly contended by the defendants that the pleading did not allege that Patrick agreed to pay 7 per cent. or any other rate of interest on the value of the property as of the date of plaintiff's deed. An examination of the complaint discloses that the allegation is not present. It is patent, therefore, that the pleading may not be sustained on either of the theories just above mentioned.

[3, 4] There are allegations in the complaint which might be considered as showing that the pleader was attempting to plead a breach of trust. However, that theory cannot be applied, because there is no attempt whatever to plead a breach. Such an allegation is necessary under such a theory. Burke v. Maguire, 154 Cal. 456, 468, 98 P. 21. The respondent contends that she has pleaded a continuing trust. In other words, as we understand her claim, it is that Patrick received her property of the value of $7,500 which he agreed to hold as her trustee, and that he made the flat promise or guarantee that the property in his hands would earn 7 per cent. per annum, which he would accumulate and hold for the plaintiff as her trustee; that he did so, and so held the same at the date of his death, and that the principal sum and the proceeds thereof passed into the hands of the defendants as Patrick's executors, and that she duly filed a claim therefor against Patrick's estate. True it is that the pleading contains allegations not consistent with the theory just stated. But in support of the judgment we will assume for the sake of argument that such was the theory of the pleader. Turning now to the allegations of the pleading and specially examining the same under the theory last stated, the plaintiff did not allege directly or inferentially, nor by recital, that her brother promised to guarantee that the rents, issues and profits would amount to 7 per cent. per annum or any other exact sum, stating it. Nor did he make the flat promise that the rents, issues, and profits should take the form of interest, and that he should be charged with interest, and that he would accumulate and hold said interest moneys for the plaintiff. When the plaintiff presented her claim against the estate it was worded on the interest theory, but the body of the complaint was not so worded. Weighing the allegations of the pleading under and pursuant to the respondent's theory, it was insufficient, because it did not aver that Patrick promised to pay interest nor any certain rate of interest. Nor does the pleading contain the clear allegation that Patrick was to accumulate and hold the interest, and that he did so accumulate and hold the same down to the date of his death. The complaint therefore does not state a cause of action, and the trial court should have sustained the demurrer. The prejudicial nature of the error will more fully appear as we proceed.

[5, 6] The next point made by the appellants is that the findings and judgment are not supported by the pleadings. In this connection the appellants point out that the complaint alleged an agreement on the part of Patrick that he would pay to the plaintiff the proceeds of her property. The appellants then point out that the trial court made findings and entered a judgment on the theory that Patrick had agreed to pay the plaintiff 7 per cent. interest on a certain sum of money—the value of plaintiff's lot and houses at Santa Monica as of the date of plaintiff's deed. The record does not disclose any answer to the point. The respondent's reply is that the point may not be considered in this court because the appellants did not make a motion for a new trial, and respondent cites several cases that were decided prior to the amendments of 1915 (St. 1915, pp. 205, 328) to sections 939 and 956 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Since those amendments were enacted the decisions cited do not control. Smith v. Lightston, 182 Cal. 41, 186 P. 769.

[7] The trial court made a finding:

"That said Patrick in taking the property in his own name under the agreement that he would make it pay her, plaintiff, good interest, and that he would relieve her of all care concerning it, and his handling the property throughout as his own, and taking to himself the proceeds of the property, which were the fruits of his own handling, the value of the property as he received it being $7,500, obligated himself to pay plaintiff good interest for the same."

The appellants contend that the said finding is not supported by the evidence. It is not. The plaintiff did not allege that Patrick guaranteed interest as proceeds, and she did not tender any evidence to that effect. In testifying as to the fact, true it is that the plaintiff used the word "interest" in telling the story as she remembered it, but the statement of the deceased wherein he used the word "interest" fell far short of creating a guaranty to the amount of 7 per cent. per annum. The plaintiff testified that her brother said:

" 'Under the will I am obligated to support you, and you do not need the income from your property, and if you will let me have it in my own name, I will handle it to an advantage for you and give you good interest.' * * * At these conversations he said he could handle it to so much better advantage if he had it in his own name, that he was a good business man, and that he would make more out of it than I was doing."

That language shows that Patrick assured the plaintiff that in his hands her property would bring in a profit and not a loss, but the language fell far short of stating a flat guaranty of 7 per cent. over an indefinite period of time extending over 13 years, more or less. The plaintiff in this connection adverts to many things which would constitute a breach of trust and therefore justify an award of interest, but, as has been shown above, the plaintiff's case does not rest on a breach of trust.

[8] The appellants also contend that the action is barred by the statute of limitations and by the laches of the plaintiff. If, as stated by us, the theory of the plaintiff's complaint is that of specifically enforcing a continuing trust, then and in that event, as there was no repudiation, the statute of limitations is not a bar. Under the same theory of the plaintiff's pleading the application of the doctrine of laches is far more serious. The principle that was before the court in Kleinclaus v. Dutard, 147 Cal. 245, 81 P. 516, seems to be in all respects parallel to the principle that is involved in the plaintiff's case. In this case the plaintiff asserts that the declaration of trust was made by the alleged trustee 13 years before she commenced her action. In the case cited the declaration was made 35 years before the action was commenced. In both cases the action was not commenced until the alleged trustee, the only person who could refute the testimony given by the alleged beneficiaries, was dead. As this case must go back for a new trial, and as the application of the doctrine of laches is one addressed to the chancellor in the first instance, we think that it is advisable that we should withhold an expression of opinion on that feature until the trial court shall have ruled upon it.

The judgment is reversed.

NEWTON v. COX (two cases). (Civ. 4391.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 22, 1925.)

1. Trial ⇐165—Court determines if evidence supports complaint on motion for nonsuit.

On motion for nonsuit, only office of court was to determine if evidence was sufficient to support allegations of complaint.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐706(5)—Finding of negligence and lack of contributory negligence in automobile accident supported by evidence.

In action for damages resulting from automobile collision at street intersection, where view was obstructed by another car, evidence held sufficient to show defendant guilty of negligence under Motor Vehicle Act, § 22, and plaintiff not guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Separate actions by Noel Newton and by Blanche E. Newton against A. N. Cox. From judgments for the plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Scarborough, Forgy & Reinhaus, of Santa Ana, and W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Woodruff & Shoemaker, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. These two actions were brought to recover damages arising from a collision of automobiles. The respective plaintiffs were husband and wife. They were driving together in a Hupmobile which was struck by a Cadillac car driven by defendant. The two actions were consolidated for hearing in the trial court, and they are presented together on this appeal. In the disposition of the appeal they may be considered as if there were but one action instead of two. The plaintiffs each had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

The only contentions upon which a reversal is asked are these: It is claimed that a motion for nonsuit which was made and denied should have been granted. It is insisted that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, for the trial was had before a jury. It is contended, under both these heads, that the evidence showed that appellant was not negligent and that respondents were guilty of contributory negligence; or, if those claims are not justified, that the evidence shows negligence on both sides, and that therefore respondents should not have recovered, as the doctrine of comparative negligence does not obtain in this state.

The accident which gave rise to the litigation occurred at the intersection of thoroughfares known as Grand avenue and Seventeenth street. The former ran north and south, and the latter ran east and west. Respondents were driving north on Grand, and appellant was proceeding east on Seventeenth. The collision occurred in the northeasterly quarter of the intersection, where the Cadillac, appellant's car, struck the Hupmobile, respondents' car, near its rear and upon the left rear fender. Respondents' vehicle was overturned by the impact. There were trees on the property at the southwest corner of the intersection, but they were so placed that they did not interfere with an unobstructed view by appellant of the part of Grand from which respondents came, or by respondents of the part of Seventeenth from which appellant came; that is, there was, so far as the trees were concerned, an unobstructed view for all parties at such a distance back from the intersection that both cars, if they had been driven at a proper rate of speed, and the drivers had seen each other, could have been stopped before the intersection was reached. A Franklin automobile was approaching the intersection along Seventeenth immediately preceding the accident, and it was coming from the same direction from which came appellant's car. Respondent Blanche Newton testified:

"My husband was driving about his usual rate of speed on the highway; he usually travels between 25 and 30 miles. * * * Away back there I imagine he was going 25 or 30 miles an hour; at the intersection he wasn't going over half that fast; he probably was going 12½ or 15 miles an hour."

Respondent Noel Newton testified:

"As * * * I came * * * somewhere in the neighborhood of 100 feet from the center of Seventeenth street and Grand avenue, I began to slow down for the intersection. I slowed down until I had my car in perfect control, which is about in the neighborhood of 15 miles an hour, at the intersection—that is, where the highways come together—and as I passed on up, I should judge, half that distance, I noticed a Franklin car coming from the west going east, and he slowed down and I looked to the east and saw everything was clear, and I went on into the intersection, and just as I passed the center of the intersection going north all of a sudden a Cadillac loomed up not over 15 to 20 feet away in my vision, coming at a terrific rate of speed, and just as I saw him, or just after I saw him, he swerved right into me and hit me at the north side of Seventeenth street at about the north line. * * * When I was struck by the Cadillac I was going somewhere in the neighborhood between 12 and 15 miles an hour; not to exceed 15 miles. * * *

"Q. And right there you know you were going under 15 miles an hour and didn't look at your speedometer—that is true, isn't it? A. Yes, sir."

On cross-examination the same witness said:

"When I was 50 feet away from the intersection I can't say exactly how fast I was traveling, I should judge not to exceed 20 miles. When I got to the intersection I was going about 15 miles an hour, not to exceed 15 miles an hour. When I passed this street corner I should judge I wasn't going more than 15 miles an hour there. When I passed this line going from one corner to the other, I was going not to exceed 15 miles an hour; I drive all the time—just my impression. * * * I should judge the speed of the Cadillac automobile as it approached me, when I first observed it, was not less than 35 miles an hour."

A witness for respondents who witnessed the accident testified:

"Mr. Cox was going east on Seventeenth. He was driving a Cadillac; he went very fast. I think he was going again as fast as I saw Mr. Newton's car. The Franklin wasn't going very fast, and he went by terribly fast. * * * I watched both machines as they continued on; they were going on an angle. Mr. Newton wasn't going very fast. I have driven an automobile for ten years. I think Mr. Newton was going between 15 and 20 miles * * * say about 17 miles an hour. I didn't see him change his speed; it happened so quick. * * * I said I thought Mr. Cox was going about again as fast. He was more apt to be going 35. He continued his speed. I know he was going awfully fast. * * *"

Another observer of the accident testified:

"When Mr. Cox passed me I was about 75 feet from the intersection. * * * I think Cox was going about between 30 and 35 miles. * * *

"Q. When he got to the intersection how fast do you think Mr. Newton was going? A. I don't think he was going more than 15 miles an hour. * * *

"Q. Well, who got into the intersection first? A. Mr. Newton was across the intersection when Cox struck him—just past.

"Q. You mean past the center of the street? A. The center of the street."

[1] We learn this much concerning the facts from a perusal of appellant's brief, without reference to the record and without an examination of the brief filed by respondents. The showing of facts made by appellant plainly confutes the argument advanced by him. Why he himself does not perceive this result can be shown by a brief consideration of the argument he makes. Several times he refers to "disputed" testimony. He insists that the evidence "preponderated" in his favor. He asks us to consider the fact that at an earlier trial of the actions respondents gave testimony different from that given by them at the trial which resulted in the judgment from which the present appeal is taken. Under authorities really "too numerous to mention" these things are beyond our ken. Upon the motion for nonsuit the only office of the trial court was to determine whether there was substantial evidence to support the material allegations of respondents' complaints, no matter how strenuously it was disputed. On the appeal our powers are the same. Upon the question whether the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict, we must bow to the finding of the jury, if there was a conflict in the evidence—and there was a most substantial one—no matter how sharp the conflict was; no matter if we might conclude from the record that the testimony preponderated in favor of appellant. Appellant argues the case from an utterly false premise.

In order to "make assurance doubly sure," we now state a little of the testimony to which respondents call our attention. Respondent Noel Newton testified that the Cadillac "hit me with such force that he knocked me right through a guy wire as big as my little finger and turned my car over twice and into a walnut tree so hard they had to pry it loose"; that when "I saw the Cadillac I was just passing the center of the intersection, just past the center"; that "I was on the right-hand side of Grand avenue—the east side"; that appellant "made a total wreck of the body of the machine—three new wheels and three new fenders, and a new running board, a new top and windshield, and had to be lined up all over and practically a new body and new doors;" that "I couldn't get out of his way; I couldn't step on it and get up any speed and get out of the way, and I was clear on the right-hand side of the pavement, and couldn't get over any further without getting in the mud;" and that, referring to a telephone pole at the northeast corner of the intersection, the Cadillac "splintered the post and broke the tire rack on the automobile and shoved up a big bunch of mud here, I should judge, anywhere from ten inches to a foot of mud and grass where he slid through the mud and grass there." This witness had a conversation with appellant immediately after the collision.

He testified concerning it:

"I spoke to him and asked him what in the world he was trying to do. He told me he was coming up the boulevard and the machine in front of him was slowing down, and he thought he was going to stop, and he looked around and saw the intersection was clear, and pulled out to the side and stepped on it, and went on around. I asked him, 'What are you going to do about it?' And he said, 'I am insured, and the insurance company will take care of it.' I said, 'Who are you insured with?' And he said, 'The Orange County Automobile Club.'"

[2] It is useless to quote further from the evidence. Considering the denial of the motion for nonsuit, it is evident that respondents had made a prima facie case when the motion was presented. Considering the contention that the evidence fails to support the verdict, it is plain that the members of the jury were amply justified in concluding that the following was the story of the accident: The view of each of the colliding cars by the occupants of the other was obscured by the Franklin car, which was directly between the other two as they approached the intersection of the highways. Respondents entered the intersection, and continued through it until their car was struck, at a reasonable rate of speed, in a careful and prudent manner, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, and not so as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property, all as required by section 22 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 220), which is relied on by appellant, as it was in effect at the time the collision occurred. Appellant approached the intersection, and continued through it until the cars collided, at a reckless and excessive rate of speed, in a careless and imprudent manner, in such a way as to endanger the life and limb of persons on the highway and the safety of property thereon, and in direct violation of the provisions of the act. The jury was therefore justified in concluding that appellant was guilty of negligence, and that respondents were not guilty of contributory negligence.

Judgment affirmed.

RICE et ux. v. McCARTHY. (Civ. 4264.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 17, 1925.)

1. Contracts ⟸138(4) — Validity cannot be given to void contract by estoppel.

Validity cannot be given to contract by estoppel if it is prohibited by law or is against public policy.

2. Estoppel ⟸54, 56—To constitute "estoppel in pais," party estopped must have knowledge of the facts, and should leave party asserting estoppel to do what he otherwise would not.

To constitute "estoppel in pais," party estopped should have knowledge of the facts, and should so act as to lead party asserting estoppel to do what he otherwise would not have done.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Estoppel in Pais.]

3. Husband and wife ⟸267(8)—Statute authorizing conveyance by husband holding record title construed; "presumed."

The word "presumed," as used in Civ. Code, § 172a, as added by St. 1917, p. 829, that conveyance by husband holding record title to community real property to purchaser in good faith without knowledge of marriage relation shall be presumed to be valid, is used in the sense that such shall be conclusively presumed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Presume.]

4. Husband and wife ⟸267(1)—Conveyance by husband not void as prohibited by law.

Conveyance of community real estate by husband without the joining of wife is not void as prohibited by law, but may be avoided by wife's bringing action within time prescribed by Civ. Code, § 172a, as added by St. 1917, p. 829, except where property is homestead, in which case conveyance is nullity under Civ. Code, § 1242.

5. Husband and wife ⟸267(1)—Wife's right to avoid transfer by husband is privilege of no interest to state.

A wife's right to avoid an instrument transferring community real property, executed by her husband alone, is a privilege in which the state has no interest apart from that of the wife herself.

6. Husband and wife ⟸267(1) — Wife may waive right to avoid conveyance by husband.

Provision in Civ. Code, § 172a, as added by St. 1917, p. 829, recognizing wife's right to avoid a conveyance by husband, was intended solely for the wife's benefit, and she is under no obligation to exercise the right but may waive it.

7. Husband and wife ⟸267(9)—Public policy does not prevent purchaser from husband setting up estoppel against wife.

Public policy does not forbid a purchaser of community real estate, in transfer of which wife did not join, from setting up conduct of wife as an estoppel against her right to avoid it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by John K. Rice and wife against Justin McCarthy. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Randall, Bartlett & White and Walter J. Little, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Allen, Allen & Eagan, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to quiet title to a lot in the city of Los Angeles. Judgment passed for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals.

Plaintiffs are husband and wife. The interest which they obtained in the property, or, more accurately speaking, the interest which the husband obtained therein, is such as was acquired under a written contract executed on September 1, 1919, by the owner, the California Security Loan Corporation, as the vendor, and the plaintiff John K. Rice as the vendee, whereby the former agreed to sell and the latter agreed to buy the lot for a valuable consideration. This contract was never recorded. The interest thus acquired under the husband's contract with the owner is conceded to be community property. On November 3, 1919, the husband, as the vendor, and defendant, as the vendee, executed a contract in writing, whereby the former agreed to convey the property to the latter for the sum of $2,500, payable in monthly installments of $25 each. Immediately upon the execution of this contract, defendant entered into possession of the premises. He has continued in possession ever since, and has made all of the payments due under his contract. The plaintiff Sallie G. Rice did not join with her husband in the execution of the instrument by which he agreed to convey the property to defendant. Plaintiffs brought the action upon the theory that the husband's contract to convey the property to defendant is void under section 172a of the Civil Code. The action was commenced within one year after the execution of the instrument by the husband.

Defendant, invoking the doctrine of estoppel to defeat plaintiffs' claim that the husband's contract with him is void, alleged in his answer that when he entered into his contract with Rice he did not know or have any information that his vendor and Sallie G. Rice were husband and wife; that he did not have any information of their matrimonial relation until January 3, 1920; that he has duly performed all the conditions of his contract; that when he purchased the property Sallie G. Rice knew that the lot was sold to defendant, and that it was the subject of the contract between him and her husband; that subsequently to the execution of the husband's contract to convey the property to defendant, the wife received payments made by defendant on the contract, well knowing that the same were made by defendant under his contract with her husband; that the wife used the moneys thus received by her and enjoyed the benefit thereof; that at no time prior to the commencement of the action did the wife object to her husband's sale of the property to defendant; and that by accepting such payments she is now estopped from asserting that defendant's claim to the property is without right. By a supplemental answer defendant further alleged that subsequently to the commencement of the action, and within the time provided by his contract, he paid the monthly installment due under the terms of his contract for each of the four months commencing on the 3d days of August, September, October, and November of the year 1920; that each of these payments was made to and accepted by the husband; and that by reason thereof the husband is estopped to claim that the contract entered into by him with defendant is of no force or effect.

Respondents do not claim that the facts so alleged in defendant's answers are not sufficient to work an estoppel against plaintiffs if the doctrine of estoppel in pais is invocable to support a transfer of community real property in which the wife did not join. What they do claim is that no matter what the wife's conduct may have been, if she did not join with the husband in executing the transfer, the doctrine of equitable estoppel cannot be invoked to defeat an action brought to avoid the transfer.

There was evidence, either introduced by defendant or offered by him, which tended to establish the allegations of fact upon which he relies to make good his claim of estoppel. To the introduction of some of this evidence the court sustained objections upon the grounds of irrelevancy and immateriality. These rulings are assigned as error. These assignments present a question which, like the one next to be mentioned, depends for its answer upon whether or not the doctrine of estoppel is invocable in cases of this character.

Instead of making findings upon the facts specifically pleaded by defendant to support his claim of estoppel, the trial court simply found that "it is not true that John K. Rice or Sallie G. Rice were at any time estopped from claiming that plaintiffs are entitled to the possession of said property." This is but the mere statement of a conclusion of law, which leaves us in utter ignorance as to what facts, if any, the trial court considered as constituting an estoppel. "The rule is that the facts constituting the estoppel must be pleaded. * * * By the same rule the facts constituting the estoppel must be found." Fritz v. Mills, 12 Cal. App. 118, 106 P. 727. It follows, therefore, that defendant was entitled to findings upon the facts pleaded by him, and which he claimed raised an estoppel, unless, as contended by respondents, the doctrine of estoppel never can be invoked by the husband's transferee in an action of this character.

The code section which inspired plaintiffs to bring this action reads:

"The husband has the management and control of the community real property but the wife must join with him in executing any instrument by which such community real property or any interest therein is leased for a longer period than one year, or is sold, conveyed, or encumbered; provided, however, that the sole lease, contract, mortgage or deed of the husband, holding the record title to community real property, to a lessee, purchaser or encumbrancer, in good faith without knowledge of the marriage relation shall be presumed to be valid; but no action to avoid such instrument shall be commenced after the expiration of one year from the filing for record of such instrument in the recorder's office in the county in which the land is situate." Civ. Code, § 172a, adopted July 27, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 829).

Prior to the adoption of this section it was the established doctrine in this state that during the marriage the husband is the sole and exclusive owner of all community property, and that the wife has no claim thereto nor any interest or estate therein other than a mere expectancy as heir if she survive him. Spreckels v. Spreckels, 172 Cal. 775, 158 P. 537, and cases there cited. Whether this doctrine has suffered any modification by reason of the adoption of section 172a is a question which was purposely left open in Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 191 Cal. 601, 218 P. 22, the court there saying that, because the property in that case was acquired before the section was adopted, "it is unnecessary to consider the question * * * whether, with reference to after-acquired property, the section creates an estate in the wife which she had not theretofore possessed." Nor do we find it necessary here to consider that question, for both parties to this appeal have expressly conceded that it is the power of alienation, and not the nature of the estate, which is affected by the statute. Therefore, for the purposes of this appeal, we shall adopt counsel's concession as embodying a correct statement of the law.

If, as counsel concede, the section affects only the power of alienation and not the nature of the estate, then the legislative intent may best be carried out by regarding the transfer as being good as against the husband but voidable at the option of the wife. In Spreckels v. Spreckels, supra, Dargie v. Patterson, 176 Cal. 714, 169 P. 360, and Italian American Bank v. Canepa, 52 Cal. App. 619, 199 P. 55, it was held that under section 172 of the Civil Code, prior to its amendment in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 829), a gift by the husband of community property without the wife's written consent thereto, or a conveyance by him of such property without a valuable consideration and without such consent, is good as against the husband; that the wife is the only person who has the right to complain; and that she possesses no more than an optional right to avoid the gift or conveyance, and if necessary to sue to recover the property, not as her separate estate, but to reinstate it as a part of the community property, with the title vested in her husband and subject to his management and control as before. We think that what was said in those cases as to the nature of the right possessed by the wife under section 172 is substantially a correct statement of the nature of the wife's right under section 172a after a transfer by her husband in which she did not join; for, as we later shall show when analyzing section 172a, the husband's transfer is not void but merely voidable.

[1] The question, then, is this: May the wife by her conduct estop herself from asserting the right which is given her by section 172a, i. e., the right to avoid her husband's conveyance of community real property in which she did not join? As a general rule, estoppel cannot vitalize a transfer which is void because prohibited by law or because it is against public policy. In the eye of the law such a transfer has no existence whatever, and neither action nor inaction can validate it or estop a party against asserting its utter invalidity. The rule is announced in Ruling Case Law as follows:

"It is generally considered that, as between the parties to a contract, validity cannot be given to it by estoppel if it is prohibited by law or is against public policy." 10 R. C. L. p. 801.

[2] Respondents contend that a conveyance of community real property in which the wife does not join is void, both because it is prohibited by law and because it contravenes public policy. Is such a conveyance so far prohibited by section 172a as to be an absolute nullity, wholly ineffective for any purpose whatever? That section, as we have seen, contains a proviso which declares that:

"The sole lease, contract, mortgage or deed of the husband, holding the record title to community real property, to a lessee, purchaser or incumbrancer, in good faith without knowledge of the marriage relation, shall be presumed to be valid."

This proviso cannot be regarded as an application of the doctrine of equitable estoppel to the limited class of transfers specifically referred to therein, because it declares, in effect, that such transfers as fall within the proviso are presumed to be valid—without regard to the wife's conduct or knowledge. To constitute estoppel in pais it is axiomatic that the party estopped should have knowledge of the facts, and should so act as to lead the party asserting the estoppel to do what he otherwise would not have done.

[3] The word "presumed," as used in the declaration of the proviso that every lease, contract, mortgage or deed which is under its protecting ægis "shall be presumed to be valid," is doubtless used in the sense that it is conclusively presumed that every such lease, contract, mortgage, or deed is valid. We have, then, in this part of the section, what is tantamount to an express statutory recognition of the passing of the title to the lessee, grantee, vendee, or mortgagee whenever those conditions exist which are defined in the proviso.

The proviso is sandwiched between the first and concluding portions of the section. The concluding clause declares that:

"No action to avoid such instrument shall be commenced after the expiration of one year from the filing for record of such instrument in the recorder's office in the county in which the land is situate."

Obviously, the words "such instrument" where they last occur—i. e., in the provision to the effect that suit shall not be commenced after one year from the filing of "such instrument" for record—do not refer to the instrument by which the husband acquired the record title. It evidently was the intention of the Legislature that the year within which the action could be brought should not commence to run until the wife could be charged with at least constructive notice tha her husband had alienated or incumbered the title. But the recording of the instrument whereby the husband acquired the record title would not afford notice to the wife that he had alienated or incumbered the title so acquired by him. Equally obvious is it that the words "such instrument," where they first occur in the last clause of the section—i. e., in the provision to the effect that no action to avoid "such instrument" shall be commenced after the expiration of one year—refer back to the words "any instrument" in the first part of the section, the part which immediately precedes the proviso, and are not restricted to the " sole lease, contract, mortgage or deed" mentioned in the proviso. One reason for so concluding is that the word "instrument" nowhere occurs in the proviso. Another and more cogent reason is that it would lead to an absurdity to hold that the words "such instrument" in the last clause of the section refer to the "sole lease, contract, mortgage or deed" mentioned in the proviso. In the proviso it is declared that the "sole lease, contract, mortgage or deed" there referred to "shall be presumed to be valid." But a lease, contract, mortgage, or deed which the law presumes to be valid cannot be the subject of a successful action to avoid it. The statute does not contemplate so vain a thing as an action to avoid an instrument which the law itself declares shall be presumed to be valid.

These considerations lead irresistibly to the conclusion that, so far as the meaning of the words "such instrument" is concerned, the first and last parts of the section should be read as though the proviso which separates them had been omitted. So read, the section would provide that:

"* * * The wife must join with him [the husband] in executing any instrument by which such community real property or any interest therein is leased for a longer period than one year, or is sold, conveyed or encumbered; but no action to avoid such instrument shall be commenced after the expiration of one year from the filing for record of such instrument in the recorder's office in the county in which the land is situate."

[4] From the foregoing analysis of the section, it will be seen that it fixes a limitation of one year from the recording of an instrument executed by the husband alone, and which is not within the saving grace of the proviso, within which to bring an action to avoid the husband's instrument. But a statutory provision which prescribes a time limitation within which a wife may bring an action to avoid her husband's instrument of conveyance enwombs the necessary implication that the title passes by the instrument even though the wife did not join with her husband in executing it—that the title passes, but that the instrument which passes it may be invalidated or avoided if the proper action be brought within the prescribed time. In other words, even those instruments which are not under the shield of the proviso are only voidable and are not void. And that is precisely what was said of such instruments in Goodrich v. Turney, 44 Cal. App. 516, 519, 186 P. 806, 807, the court there remarking that if it be assumed that a contract to exchange properties is within the purview of section 172a, "that does not make the writing absolutely void, but voidable only at the instance of the wife." The Supreme Court in that case denied a petition for a hearing by it after judgment of the District Court of Appeal. We conclude, therefore that the instrument here sought to be avoided is not void because prohibited by law.

[5] Nor is there any reason why it should be held that "public policy," a term of vague and uncertain meaning, forbids the wife from waiving her right to avoid a transfer of community real property executed solely by her husband. A wife's right to avoid an instrument transferring community real property, or an interest therein, executed by her husband alone, is a privilege in which the state has no interest apart from that of the wife herself. There is no duty, perfect or imperfect, on the part of a wife to contest the validity of her husband's transfer of community real property. It is true that the claim of a surviving wife to her share of the community property upon the death of her husband is one which, from the nature of the marriage relation, appeals to the courts and to society; but it has repeatedly been held that the wife may by contract relinquish her expectancy as heir in such property. Estate of Sloan, 179 Cal. 393, 177 P. 150; Estate of Brix, 181 Cal. 667, 186 P. 135. In Spreckels v. Spreckels, supra (decided prior to 1917), the court, speaking of the provision in section 172 to the effect that the husband cannot make a gift of community property or convey the same without a valuable consideration unless the wife, in writing, consents thereto, said: "The provision was manifestly intended solely for the benefit of the wife." 172 Cal. 784, 158 P. 540.

[6] We think it equally manifest that the provision in section 172a which recognizes the wife's right to avoid an instrument which is within the purview of that section was intended solely for the wife's benefit, and that she is under no obligation to the state to exercise the right. It is generally held that statutory provisions designed solely for the benefit of individuals may be waived by the persons for whose benefit they are designed. 6 Cal. Jur. p. 120. See In re Garcelon, 104 Cal. 570, 38 P. 414, 32 L. R. A. 595, 43 Am. St. Rep. 134, where an agreement between nephews and the testatrix not to contest the latter's will was sustained against the plea that the contract was opposed to public policy. In section 172a the Legislature itself, by allowing the wife the short period of one year from the recording of her husband's instrument of conveyance within which to bring an action to avoid it, evinces an unmistakable intention to regard her right as one to which no special sanctity attaches.

In the state of Washington, which has a statutory provision similar to that contained in section 172a of our Civil Code, it frequently has been held that the doctrine of estoppel may be invoked against the wife. Thus, in Magee v. Risley, 82 Wash. 178, 143 P. 1088, the court, having under consideration a case involving the application of the statute, said:

"Assuming, without deciding, that Wright's wife would have been actually entitled to a community interest in the property as against a purchaser with notice of the marriage, still, the facts found in this case would, under the doctrine announced in Sadler v. Niesz, 5 Wash. 182, 31 P. 630, 1030, forever estop her from claiming any interest as against the respondent here, who was a purchaser in good faith and without notice."

[7] Our conclusion from the foregoing is that there is no "public policy" which forbids the transferee in cases such as this from setting up the wife's conduct as an estoppel against her right to avoid her husband's transfer of community real property.

The cases relied upon by respondent, of which Hart v. Church, 126 Cal. 471, 58 P. 910, 59 P. 296, 77 Am. St. Rep. 195, and Freiermuth v. Steigleman, 130 Cal. 392, 62 P. 615, 80 Am. St. Rep. 138, are the most conspicuous examples, are not in point. They are cases where one of the spouses alone executed a deed to or a mortgage upon the homestead. Under the homestead law of this state an absolute interdiction is placed upon the alienation or incumbrance of the homestead by one of the spouses only, the statute containing a positive declaration that the homestead of a married person "cannot" be conveyed or incumbered unless both spouses execute and acknowledge the instrument of conveyance or incumbrance. Civ. Code, § 1242. Such being our law relative to homesteads, it is apparent at once that any attempted conveyance or incumbrance of the homestead in which both spouses do not join is not merely voidable but is absolutely void. It is "the merest nullity"—to quote the language of Hart v. Church, supra, 126 Cal. 477 (58 P. 912). And because it is a nullity it cannot be validated by estoppel. "Neither" [spouse], says the court in Hart v. Church, "could separately ratify it so as to give it validity, nor be estopped by conduct from asserting its invalidity, because, under no circumstances, could the act or conduct of either separately be held to validate such a void instrument without doing violence to the claim letter of the law." In the Freiermuth Case the court employed this language: "There is no estoppel here; the mortgage was absolutely void." 130 Cal. 395 (62 P. 616). This language is not applicable to cases arising under section 172a for the reason that, as we have shown, an instrument executed by the husband only, whereby community real property which has not been selected as a homestead is alienated, is not void but voidable. The title passes, but the wife has the right to restore it by avoiding her husband's instrument of transfer. Without doubt this is a right which the wife may waive or lose by estoppel.

Holding, as we do, that estoppel is a defense which may be pleaded by the husband's vendee or grantee in an action such as this, it follows that the trial court erred in sustaining objections to evidence offered by appellant in support of the facts pleaded by him by way of estoppel, and that it also erred in failing to make specific findings upon the facts so pleaded.

The judgment is reversed.

JOHNSTON v. BENTON et al. (Civ. 4926.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 13, 1925.)

1. Venue ⊂⊃68—Evidence held to sustain order changing venue to residence of defendant.

In an action to recover real estate commissions, where issue was whether defendant had changed his residence while living away from home during military service, evidence held to show no change of residence, and to sustain order changing venue to residence of defendant.

2. Domicile ⊂⊃4(2)—Domicile not lost by entrance into military service in absence of intent.

Domicile is not lost or affected by entrance into military service, where there is no intention of adopting place of service as a residence.

3. Domicile ⊂⊃9—Change of domicile depending on intent may be proved by direct testimony of person effecting change.

Question of change of domicile depends largely on intent of party changing residence, which may be proved by direct testimony of such person whether he be a party to the action or not.

4. Domicile ⊂⊃4(2)—Living in another city when on military duty does not establish legal residence there.

Where defendant, on entering military service, was stationed at San Francisco and other military points, but he intended to return to his home eventually, the fact that he "lived" in San Francisco did not establish his legal residence there.

5. Domicile ⊂⊃10—Evidence held not sufficient to show intention to change residence.

Evidence that defendant gave his residence as San Francisco in application to join a lodge and in a power of attorney held, under evidence, not to establish intent to change domicile to that place.

6. Venue ⟸68 — Affidavits of others, made without knowledge of defendant's intent, of little weight.

Affidavits of others, on motion for change of venue, as to defendant's residence, held of little weight, since necessarily but conclusions made without knowledge of defendant's intent as to domicile.

7. Domicile ⟸10—Failure to register to vote not important.

That defendant never registered or voted in county claimed as domicile held not important, where he never registered to vote anywhere.

8. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Where evidence is in conflict, finding of trial court not disturbed.

Where there is a conflict in the evidence as to residence of a party, the finding of trial court will not be disturbed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Robert Johnston against Kate L. Benton and others. From an order granting a motion for change of venue in an action to recover real estate commissions, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wallace & Ames, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. An appeal by plaintiff, Robert Johnston, from an order granting defendants' motion for a change of place of trial from the city and county of San Francisco to Shasta county, upon the ground of the residence of the defendants. The action is based upon an alleged agreement to pay real estate commissions to plaintiff's assignor. The single question involved relates to the residence of the defendant John W. Benton, appellant having made no point on this appeal as to the residence of the other defendants Kate L. and Harry L. Benton, who are, respectively, the mother and the brother of defendant John W. Benton. The evidence offered in support of the motion consisted of an affidavit made by defendant John W. Benton to the effect that for more than 20 years immediately preceding, and at the time of the commencement of this action, he was a resident of Shasta county, which affidavit was supplemented by his oral testimony given at the time of the hearing of the motion, and by the affidavit of Benton's mother, Kate L. Benton, in which she stated, in substance, that, although her son had been absent in the military service, he had "never changed his residence" from Shasta county, and had "at all times resided therein." It appears from the testimony given by the defendant John W. Benton that at the time of the hearing of this motion he was 27 years of age and an officer in the United States Army, with rank of lieutenant; that he was born and reared in the county of Shasta; that in 1917 he entered the military service of the United States, was discharged in February, 1919, returned to Shasta county, and, after spending some time in Shasta and Siskiyou counties, went to San Francisco; that in July, 1920, he visited Reno, Nev., remained there until the early part of the following September, then returned to San Francisco, where, on September 5, 1920, he re-entered the army, being attached to the aviation branch of the service. After spending a few days in San Francisco, he again went to Reno for two weeks, then returned to San Francisco and obtained a leave of absence for 30 days, which time he spent visiting in Reno and San Francisco. In October, 1920, he was assigned to duty at Riverside, Cal., was afterwards tranferred to Marsh Field, and from there to San Antonio, Tex., and then to Hampton, Va. In September, 1921, he was transferred back to San Francisco. Later, the exact date not appearing, but apparently in July, 1923, he was sent to the Panama Canal Zone, where he remained until December, 1923. He was then ordered back to the Presidio, San Francisco, on account of an impaired condition of one eye, and was assigned to domestic duty for one year.

This action was commenced on November 22, 1923, one month prior to his arrival from Panama. At the time, Benton testified in support of this motion he had been living for about two months with his wife and two children at the Presidio, occupying a house maintained by the government on the military reservation. He testified that during his entire service in the army he had always lived in homes maintained by the government; that he had not intended to and did not in fact establish a residence in San Francisco, or any other place except Shasta county; that he had never given up his residence there, had always regarded that county as his residence, and that he intended to return there to enter business in the event that he was invalidated from further military service; that he had never at any time registered as a voter. It further appears from the record before us that the estate of defendant's father, at the time said motion was heard, was pending settlement in Shasta county, and that it was the owner of certain valuable timber lands, including a millsite, in that county, in which these defendants were interested. In reference to the value and extent of those timber holdings, plaintiff alleges in his complaint that a purchaser agreed to pay the sum of $30,000 for certain timber and water rights thereof. Benton further testified that he had been "brought up" in the timber, and timber business, and knew something of forestation, and that if he were compelled to retire from the army he intended, as above stated, to return immediately to Shasta county to follow that business. Benton's mother and brother were also, at the time of the commencement of this action, residents of Shasta county, and had been so for many years.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion that the evidence above set forth abundantly sustains the order appealed from. It is well settled that the domicile of a person is in no way affected by his enlistment in the civil, military, or naval service of his country; and he does not thereby abandon or lose his domicile which he had when he entered the service, nor does he acquire one at the place where he serves. 9 R. C. L. 551; Stewart v. Kyser, 105 Cal. 459, 39 P. 19; People ex rel. Budd v. Holden, 28 Cal. 124; Estate of Gordon, 142 Cal. 125, 75 P. 672; Percy v. Percy, 188 Cal. 768, 207 P. 369. True, the fact of his being on military duty does not preclude him, if he so desires, from establishing residence where he is stationed (Percy v. Percy, supra); but the uncontradicted evidence here is that such was not Benton's desire—that he never had any intention of doing so.

[3] The question of whether a person has changed his residence from one place to another must depend largely upon his intention, and that intention is often manifested by the purpose that impelled him in taking up a new place of abode. Whenever the question of the intention of a person is at issue, it may be proved by the direct testimony of such person whether he is a party to the action or not. Gilmour v. North Pasadena Land Co., 178 Cal. 6, 171 P. 1066; Horton v. Winbigler, 175 Cal. 149, 165 P. 423; Runo v. Williams, 162 Cal. 444, 122 P. 1082; Byrne v. Reed, 75 Cal. 277, 17 P. 201.

[4] The testimony given by Benton, to the effect that he never intended to abandon Shasta county as his place of residence, is undisputed, and it is likewise uncontradicted that he did not, of his own volition, select any particular military station as a place of abode, but that he was required to live in those different places temporarily, under military orders which were subject to change at any time, and which were, in fact, changed several times so as to transfer him from one military station to another. Benton knew better than any other person whether he had established a residence at any other place than Shasta county, for he knew or must be assumed to have known what his intentions were with respect to becoming or not becoming a resident in a legal sense of the place to which he moved. The fact that he "lived" in San Francisco did not by any means prove that he was a resident thereof. A person may "live" at a place and still not be a resident thereof in the legal sense of that term. O'Brien v. O'Brien, 16 Cal. App. 103, 116 P. 692; McKune v. McKune, 48 Cal. App. 204, 191 P. 958. And in this connection it may be added that Benton's own affidavit, in which he stated that he was a resident of Shasta county, must be considered in corroboration of his oral testimony because it was the statement of a probative fact to which he was qualified to testify. O'Brien v. O'Brien, supra.

[5] The two points developed by the counter-showing of appellant before the trial court, and upon which he mainly relies as proof to establish the fact that Benton was not a resident of Shasta county, were that four years prior to the commencement of this action Benton joined a fraternal society in San Francisco, and in doing so stated in his application for admission thereto that his residence was in San Francisco; and secondly, that in June, 1923, prior to his departure for Panama, and approximately five months before this action was filed, he signed a power of attorney, prepared by his attorney, containing the recital "I, John W. Benton, of the city and county of San Francisco. * * *" Aside from the question of the remoteness of these transactions from the time this action was commenced, which, we think, must be taken into consideration, the record shows that these two matters were fully and evidently satisfactorily explained to the trial court. In reference to the application for admission to said society, Benton testified that he told his friend who prepared and sponsored his application that he was not a resident of San Francisco, but that his friend advised him that it was "merely a technicality on jurisdiction," and would have nothing to do with his residence; and, regarding the recital in the power of attorney, it was proved that the same was inserted by the attorney who prepared the document, without instructions or suggestion from Benton in that regard; and, moreover, the recital relied on was not a declaration that Benton was a resident of San Francisco, its terms fairly indicating that it was intended merely to designate the city in which Benton was living at the time said document was prepared and signed.

[6, 7] The counter affidavit of appellant, to the effect that Benton was a resident of the city and county of San Francisco and had no place of residence in Shasta county, was of little value, for the reason that the bare statement of a plaintiff or of a third party as to a defendant's residence, no matter how unqualifiedly made, is but a conclusion, the affiant knowing nothing of the defendant's intentions with respect to the establishment of his place of residence. O'Brien v. O'Brien, supra; Bernou v. Bernou, 15 Cal. App. 341, 114 P. 1000. This rule applies with equal force against the affidavit made by Kate L. Benton as to her son's residence. The fact that Benton did not register to vote in Shasta county is not important. It will be noted that he never registered to vote anywhere. The matter of voting was a right which he might, or might not, exercise as he saw fit. Estate of Gordon, 142 Cal. 129, 75 P. 672.

[8] In any event, the matters relied upon by appellant as furnishing reasons for holding that Benton was a resident of San Francisco do no more than raise a conflict in the evidence upon the question at issue, which conflict was one to be resolved by the court in which the action was instituted and to which the motion was addressed, and therefore the finding of the trial court thereon, according to the well-established rule, will not be disturbed. Sourbis v. Rhoads, 50 Cal. App. 98, 194 P. 521; Bradley v. Davis, 156 Cal. 267, 104 P. 302; Bowers v. Modoc Land Co., 117 Cal. 50, 48 P. 979; Lakeshore Cattle Co. v. Modoc Land Co., 108 Cal. 261, 41 P. 472.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Where attorneys dealt with broker as agent of other defendants to sell their lands, and knew he had no personal interest in lands, and joined him in his capacity as agent only in suit for attorney's fees, he could not be charged with personal liability.

2. Principal and agent ⟸188—Party sued as agent not personally liable under Code, not properly joined as defendant.

In action to recover attorney's fees, where one of defendants was sued as agent of other defendants, and did not come under provision of Civ. Code, § 2343, making an agent personally liable in enumerated instances, he was improperly joined as a defendant.

3. Venue ⟸68—Finding of trial court that agent was joined to have trial in his jurisdiction justified by evidence.

Where plaintiff joined a known agent as defendant, who under allegations of complaint was not personally liable and resided in a different county than other defendants, the trial court was justified in finding that agent was joined merely for purpose of having trial in jurisdiction of his residence.

4. Venue ⟸22(3) — That nominal defendant was joined to prevent trial at residence of real defendants may be shown on motion for change of venue.

Real defendants, on motion for change of venue, may show that there is no cause of action against a codefendant, but that he was joined for fraudulent purpose of preventing them from obtaining trial at their place of residence, without necessity of demurrer and hearing thereon in county of codefendant's residence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by E. R. Johnson against Thomas H. Benton, as executor of the estate of T. H. Benton, deceased, and others, and Robert Johnston. From order granting defendants' motion for change of venue in an action for attorney's fees, plaintiff and defendant Robert Johnston appeal. Affirmed.

Wallace & Ames, of San Francisco, for appellant Johnston.

Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. An action to recover the sum of $5,000 alleged to be due upon an assigned claim for attorney's fees. All defendants excepting Robert Johnston joined in a motion for change of place of trial from the city and county of San Francisco to the county of Shasta, upon the ground that they were residents of the latter county, and that the remaining defendant, Robert Johnston, had been improperly joined as a defendant solely for the purpose of having the action tried in the jurisdiction wherein Johnston resided. In this connection it is averred by the moving defendants that no cause of action ever existed in favor of plaintiff's assignors as against their codefendant Johnston, and that no judgment could be rendered against him in said action. The evidence offered in support of said motion consisted of certain affidavits and of the testimony of the defendant John W. Benton, given in the form of a deposition. The motion was granted, and two separate appeals were taken and are being separately presented, one by plaintiff, E. R. Johnson and the other by the defendant Robert Johnston.

It appears that on April 6, 1923, the defendants Kate, Harry L., and John W. Benton entered into a written contract with the firm of Johnston & Criteser, real estate brokers, of which firm the said defendant Robert Johnston was a partner, for the purpose of effecting a sale of certain timber lands in Shasta county in which the Bentons were interested. Suit was afterward brought on said contract in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco by said Robert Johnston as assignee against the parties to that contract to recover real estate commissions. The place of trial of that action was, upon motion of the defendants, changed to said county of Shasta, upon the ground of residence of said defendants. The present action was commenced to recover fees claimed to be due for legal services rendered in connection with negotiations carried on for the sale of said timber lands, under said real estate contract. Plaintiff's complaint is in two counts: One is based upon an express agreement to pay the sum of $5,000, and the other upon a quantum meruit. In both counts defendant Johnston is sued, not as a principal, but as the "agent and employee" of the Bentons, the complaint in this respect alleging, after setting forth that plaintiff's assignors are practicing attorneys at law, and that the Bentons, as heirs at law of T. H. Benton, deceased, are the owners of said tract of land:

"That Robert Johnston is a real estate broker actively engaged in such business in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, and at all the times herein mentioned was the agent and employee of the other defendants above named for the purpose of selling and disposing of the above described real estate." (Italics ours.)

[1, 2] The evidence adduced at the hearing of the motion shows without conflict that plaintiff's assignors knew that Johnston had no personal interest in the title to said property, and was acting merely in the capacity of an agent for the sale thereof; accordingly, plaintiff's assignors dealt with and treated him as an agent and not as a principal, and, as already pointed out, he was sued only as an agent. That being so, he could not, under well-settled law, be charged with a personal liability. Tevis v. Savage, 130 Cal. 411, 62 P. 611; Jewell v. Colonial Theater Co., 12 Cal. App. 681, 108 P. 527; Hall v. Crandall, 29 Cal. 568, 89 Am. Dec. 64. True, an agent may be held personally liable to a third party when he fails to make known his principal, or contracts in his own name, or where he exceeds his authority as such agent; but otherwise it is the contract of his principal, upon which he cannot be held personally liable. Story on Agency, §§ 261, 263, 264, 267; Bogart v. Crosby & Van Haren, 80 Cal. 195, 22 P. 84. Or, to state the rule in the language of the code section:

"One who assumes to act as an agent is responsible to third persons as a principal for his acts in the course of his agency, in any of the following cases, and in no others: 1. When, with his consent, credit is given to him personally in a transaction; 2. When he enters into a written contract in the name of his principal, without believing, in good faith, that he has authority to do so; or, 3. When his acts are wrongful in their nature." Civ. Code, § 2343.

[3] The complaint alleges none of those contingencies upon which the personal liability of an agent can rest, and therefore, as agent, Johnston was improperly joined as a party defendant. According to the testimony of defendant John W. Benton, it was clearly understood between plaintiff's assignors, Johnston and himself, that Johnston had no authority whatsoever to incur any liability against any of the Bentons for the payment of attorney's fees. If, despite such understanding, plaintiff's assignors believed that the Bentons were liable for attorney's fees incurred by their agent, the action should have been confined to the Bentons without joining the agent. Clearly, under such circumstances, the Bentons would have been entitled to have the action tried at the place of their residence. The fact that plaintiff did not pursue that course, but instead joined with them as a party defendant the agent, who was a resident of another jurisdiction, and against whom, under the allegations of the complaint, no personal liability existed, was sufficient to justify the trial court in holding that the agent was joined as a defendant merely for the purpose of having the action tried in the jurisdiction of his residence. The ultimate liability of the defendants Benton, under any theory, for the payment of attorney's fees is, of course, not a question that has been or can be determined in this proceeding. Nor are we at present concerned with the proposition of whether or not Johnston, as principal, is liable for attorney's fees. We are here dealing with him as agent, in which capacity he was sued, and our problem has not included the question of his liability as principal.

[4] The defendant Johnston, in support of his appeal, does not deny the claim advanced by his coappellants that as agent he is not liable, or that he was improperly joined as a party defendant; but he contends that, inasmuch as he can be formally dismissed upon that ground only by an order sustaining demurrer to the complaint, he is entitled to have that question passed upon in the jurisdiction of his residence. In answer thereto it is sufficient to say that the course adopted by respondents Benton in demanding a change of venue has been approved in several cases, which hold that the real defendants may show, by affidavits or otherwise, that plaintiff has actually no cause of action against one of the parties who was made nominally a defendant simply for the fraudulent purpose of depriving the real defendants of their right to have the action tried in the place of their residence. Sourbis v. Rhoads, 50 Cal. App. 98, 194 P. 521; Karst v. Seller, 45 Cal. App. 623, 188 P. 298; Lachman v. Berry Growers' Ass'n, 58 Cal. App. 748, 209 P. 379.

The moving papers of the respondents Benton were legally sufficient for the purposes intended, and we are of the opinion that the evidence, of which the deposition of John W. Benton must be considered a part (Henderson v. Cohen, 10 Cal. App. 580, 102 P. 826), was ample, in view of the allegations of the complaint, to sustain the ruling of the trial court in granting the motion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

SCHROEDER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5347.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 22, 1925. Rehearing Denied Aug. 21, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹71(4)—Order appointing receiver, held final appealable order.

An order appointing a receiver to take possession of partnership property pending accounting and until dissolution, with power to dispose of property under direction of the court and render accounting thereof, after his giving a bond, held to be a final appealable order.

2. Judgment ⟹297—Mere recital of inadvertence in amended judgment does not warrant review by trial court.

Where amended judgment recited that, through inadvertence, there was inserted in the record of the judgment a direction and order that a receiver be appointed, such recital cannot justify review by the court of its own judicial act without showing to justify it.

3. Appeal and error ⟹440—Judgment cannot be corrected after notice of appeal.

Judgment cannot be corrected on grounds specified in Code Civ. Proc. §§ 663, 663a, after appeal, since during pendency of the appeal court loses all jurisdiction except to correct judgment to make it speak truth.

4. Judgment ⟹273(3)—Judicial error cannot be corrected by judgment nunc pro tunc after appeal.

Trial court cannot correct judicial errors by judgment nunc pro tunc, entered after notice of appeal but as of date before, since the object of such judgment is only to supply matters of evidence and correct clerical misprisions.

Application by Dorothy Schroeder and another for writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court of California in and for the County of Alameda and James G. Quinn, the Judge thereof, to prevent the enforcement of a judgment. Writ granted.

Stanley R. Sterne, Richard Liebman, and Frank M. Carr, all of Oakland, for petitioners.

L. D. Manning and W. E. Harvent, both of Oakland, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Petition for writ of prohibition. It appears therefrom that on July 31, 1924, there was filed in the Superior Court in and for the county of Alameda a complaint entitled Harry Brown v. Dorothy Schroeder and Herman Christ, petitioners herein. The action was one for the dissolution of a partnership and an accounting. On August 7th following, both defendants filed their answer thereto. The cause came on regularly for trial before respondent Hon. James G. Quinn, as judge of said superior court, and thereafter on the 25th day of February, 1925, the said court made and filed its findings of fact and judgment therein.

The findings, among other things, recited "that the appointment of a receiver is not necessary." Notwithstanding this finding the judgment recited that an accounting was necessary, and it ordered "that John Meillette be and he is hereby appointed a receiver, to take and hold possession of the partnership property pending the accounting and until the partnership business is wound up on dissolution, with power to liquidate and dispose of said business under the order and direction of the court and to render an accounting thereof, on giving a bond in the sum of $1,000."

Pursuant to these terms of the judgment, Meillette, on the same day the judgment was rendered, gave and filed his bond and oath and was duly appointed receiver. He immediately demanded of the defendants possession of the property, and his demand was refused. He thereupon prayed for an order of the court directing the defendants to deliver the same. The order was granted, and they were directed to turn over the property to the receiver or show cause why they should not be punished for contempt in failing so to do. On February 26, 1925, the day following, both defendants served and filed their notices of appeal from the judgment, and on February 28th following they likewise filed and served their notices of intention to move for a new trial. These motions were denied. Thereafter, and on March 4, 1925, the plaintiff Harry Brown filed a notice of motion to vacate the interlocutory judgment and enter a different judgment, upon the ground that the interlocutory decree made and given was not consistent with or supported by the findings. This motion came on for hearing, and the defendants interposed the objection that the court was without jurisdiction to entertain the same by reason of the appeal. The objection was overruled, and the court heard, and on April 25, 1925, granted, the motion. An appeal was taken from this order. On May 4th following there was filed an order correcting the judgment as entered, which order recited, among other things, that the interlocutory decree theretofore entered was not a correct memorial of the judgment and order rendered in so far as the appointment of the receiver was concerned, and it further recited that "plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the partnership property pending the accounting and until the partnership business is wound up on dissolution, with power to liquidate and dispose of the business, under the order and direction of the court and to render an accounting thereof. * * *" This judgment was ordered entered nunc pro tunc as of February 25, 1925.

Pursuant to this attempted amendment the court, on the 13th day of May following, issued a writ of possession, directing the sheriff to "place the said plaintiff Harry Brown in quiet and peaceable possession of the premises said judgment describes," etc. This writ was delivered to the sheriff for execution, whereupon the present proceeding was instituted.

It is here claimed that in making and filing the orders of May 4, 1925, the said judge of said superior court acted in excess of his jurisdiction, and did not regularly pursue his authority in this: that at the time said orders and purported judgment, as amended, were made, an appeal had been taken and perfected in the Supreme Court, and all matters relating to said judgment had been removed from the jurisdiction of said superior court. That said order and judgment and each of them were further in excess of the court's jurisdiction in that no motion was ever made by the plaintiff upon the ground that such judgment was inadvertently made, nor was such judgment in fact inadvertently made; that upon the hearing of plaintiffs' motion no evidence whatsoever was introduced showing any inadvertence in the entry of the judgment, but on the contrary, it appeared that the original judgment was not inadvertently made, for the reason that after its rendition the court cited defendant Christ to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt in failing to admit the receiver into possession as directed by that portion of the judgment attempted to be set aside. We are of the opinion that petitioners are correct in their contention.

[1] The judgment of February 25, 1925, and from which defendants appealed, was a final appealable order. Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 27, 138 P. 696. By the filing of the notice of appeal the trial court lost jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the judgment appealed from, including all questions going to the validity or correctness of such judgment. Baker v. Slocum, 49 Cal. App. 56, 192 P. 551. It is true courts have power at all times to allow amendments to judgments for the purpose of having the judgment as entered express that which was rendered, and this regardless of the fact that an appeal has been perfected, but it is only where the correction is made so as to have the judgment speak the truth that the jurisdiction to make the correction is retained. Jackson v. Dolan, 58 Cal. App. 372, 208 P. 315.

[2] Here the judgment attempted to be altered was signed by the judge, and is the exact judgment ordered to be entered. While the purported amendment recited that through inadvertence there was inserted in the record of the judgment a direction and order that a receiver be appointed, such recital cannot justify a review by the court of its own judicial act without a showing to justify it. Dolan v. Superior Court, 47 Cal. App. 240, 190 P. 469.

[3] The record here shows conclusively that the judgment sought to be corrected was not made through inadvertence, but was the exact judgment rendered. The receiver was expressly appointed by the court and his bond approved. He entered upon his duties, and the court through contempt proceedings sought to have defendants turn over the property in litigation to him. The motion of the plaintiff to have the judgment corrected upon grounds specified in sections 663 and 663a, Code of Civil Procedure, after the appeal was taken, came too late. Pending the appeal the Superior Court had lost all power to amend or correct its judgment except to make it speak the truth. Vosburg v. Vosburg, 137 Cal. 493, 496, 70 P. 473; Parkside Realty Co. v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 342, 139 P. 805; Takekawa v. Hole, 170 Cal. 323, 149 P. 593. Nor does the fact that the amendment was ordered to be entered nunc pro tunc as of February 25, 1925, alter the situation. The object of entering judgments and decrees as of some previous date is to supply matters of evidence and to rectify clerical misprisions, but not to enable the court to correct judicial errors.

[4] If the court has not rendered a judgment that it might or should have rendered, or if it has rendered an imperfect or improper one, it has no power to remedy such errors by ordering a judgment nunc pro tunc of a proper or desired judgment. Estate of Potter, 141 Cal. 426, 75 P. 850.

The amendment here attempted to be made is one governed by the limitation and prohibition of this principle. It was an entirely different judgment, both in form and effect, to the one originally entered, and it can in no manner be viewed as a correction.

For the reasons given, it is ordered and adjudged that the writ issue prohibiting said superior court and the judge thereof as prayed for in the petition.

We concur: KNIGHT, J.; CASHIN, J.

NELSON v. YONGE et al. (Civ. 4015.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 23, 1925.)

1. Bailment ⟸18(2) — Money advanced for freight charges and tires not lien on automobile.

Party advancing money for freight charges and purchasing tires to be placed upon automobile does not have a lien thereon under Civ. Code, § 3051.

2. Replevin ⟸96—Value of property estimated as of day of trial.

In action for recovery of automobile alleged to have been converted, jury must assess the value of the property as of the day of trial.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1172(3)—Error as to only one issue does not necessitate new trial of entire cause.

Where in action for recovery of personal property the trial court erred in instructing the jury to assess the value as of the date of demand therefor, the trial of the entire cause will not be required, since the error only affected one issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by Clinton Nelson against O. W. Yonge. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Alex P. Nelson, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

John A. Harvey and S. M. Davis, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to recover possession of an automobile, or its value in case a delivery cannot be had, together with damages for its unlawful detention. Defendant claimed to have a lien upon the car, dependent upon his possession, and for that reason he asserted a right to retain it. The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the possession of the property, assessed his damages for the unlawful detention at $500, and found the value of the automobile, in case a delivery thereof to him could not be had, to be $1,000. From a judgment entered upon this verdict the defendant has appealed. The automobile was in defendant's possession at the time of the trial.

Some time prior to the month of August, 1920, plaintiff, who resides in Nebraska, shipped the automobile to Long Beach, in this state, where it was delivered into the possession of one John O'Connor. O'Connor, an old acquaintance, paid the freight for plaintiff as well as certain other charges. The aggregate of the sums so advanced by O'Connor for plaintiff amounted to $196.68. Defendant, a salesman engaged in selling automobiles at Santa Ana, in this state, wrote plaintiff a letter telling the latter that, if agreeable he would endeavor to find for him a purchaser of the car. Plaintiff mailed to defendant a reply in which he assented to the latter's offer to sell the car. To effect this purpose it was necessary that defendant should have the car in his possession. O'Connor refused to deliver it to defendant unless the latter would pay him the amount which he had advanced for plaintiff. Defendant accordingly paid to O'Connor $196.68 about the 10th of December, 1920, and immediately thereafter received possession of the car for the purpose of selling it for plaintiff. About this time defendant, claiming to have authority therefor from plaintiff, purchased at retail certain new tires and caused them to be placed upon the wheels in lieu of the old tires which were upon the vehicle when it came into his possession. He claims to have paid for these tires the sum of $230. It seems that defendant, instead of seriously endeavoring to find a purchaser for plaintiff as he had agreed, used the car in his own business. Wherefore plaintiff, on or about May 31, 1921, through an authorized agent, demanded possession of his property. Defendant, claiming that he was entitled to a lien for his expenditures under section 3051 of the Civil Code, refused to deliver the car to plaintiff unless he were paid the amount for which he claimed to have a lien. Plaintiff's agent, when he made the demand for possession, tendered defendant the sum of $250, which the latter refused, asserting that the amount tendered was insufficient to satisfy his lien. The court instructed the jury that the value of the car, for the purpose of an alternative money judgment in the event that delivery could not be made, is the value which it possessed at the time when plaintiff made his demand, and that they should find the value as of that date. The action was tried in March, 1922.

Appellant claims (1) that, under the provisions of the code section above mentioned, he has a lien on the automobile to the extent of $426.68, the aggregate of the two sums above mentioned, and that therefore the verdict is unsupported by the evidence; (2) that in actions of this class the value of the property, to be paid to the successful party in case delivery cannot be had, should be determined as of the date of the trial; and (3) that if the value be determined as of that date, the evidence is insufficient to support that part of the verdict which finds the value of the automobile to be $1,000. The part of section 3051 upon which appellant relies to sustain his claim to a lien reads:

"Every person who, while lawfully in possession of an article of personal property renders any service to the owner thereof, by labor or skill, employed for the protection, improvement, safekeeping, or carriage thereof, has a special lien thereon, dependent on possession, for the compensation, if any, which is due to him from the owner for such service; a person who makes, alters, or repairs any article of personal property, at the request of the owner, or legal possessor of the property, has a lien on the same for his reasonable charges for the balance due for such work done and material furnished, and may retain possession of the same until the charges are paid."

[1] It will be noticed that so much of this code section as is invoked by appellant deals with two classes of lienholders. The first class includes those who render a service to the owner "by labor or skill, employed for the protection, improvement, safekeeping or carriage" of the personal property lawfully in the possession of the lien claimant. The lien given by this part of the section is limited to a lien for compensation due "for labor or skill." Johnson v. Perry, 53 Cal. 353. It is manifest that neither of the sums for which appellant claims a lien is within the purview of this part of the section. In paying O'Connor the $196.68 to reimburse the latter for his outlays, and likewise in purchasing the new tires for the sum of $230 and in causing them to be adjusted to the wheels of the automobile, appellant did not himself perform any service of "labor or skill." The money paid O'Connor was not even paid by appellant "while lawfully in possession of the car." It was paid before appellant acquired possession. The other class of lienors provided for in the code provisions invoked by appellant are those who come within the second clause, namely, those who make, alter, or repair any article of personal property at the request of the owner or legal possessor of the property. This clause was a part of section 3052 prior to 1907. With the exception that it extends the right to a lien to any person who makes, alters, or repairs an article of personal property at the request of the owner or legal possessor, it "simply declares the common-law rule as to the right of a mechanic or artisan performing labor on an article of personal property to a lien thereon dependent on possession for payment of his services." Quist v. Sandman, 154 Cal. 755, 99 P. 207. (Italics ours.) Continuing, the court in the case last cited says that—

"While the Code has extended the right to a lien in general to all persons performing the prescribed labor concerning an article of personal property at the request of the owner or legal possessor thereof, it is in other respects but declaratory of the common-law rule and the right to a lien must be governed by the same rules which prevailed at common law. It can only be asserted under the same circumstances and conditions as it could be asserted at common law and the right to do so must be interpreted in accordance with common-law principles."

There is no evidence that appellant performed the labor of installing the tires, and we doubt whether it correctly can be said that he acquired a lien for their value as one who has made, altered, or repaired an article of personal property. At common law the lien was given to one who bestows labor upon an article of personal property. The person performing such labor could rightfully retain the article until he should be reimbursed for his labor and for the reasonable value of such material, if any, as may have been supplied by him, and upon which he bestowed labor and skill. Or, as it is expressed in section 3051, he has a lien for the "work done and materials furnished." Appellant would read the section as though it gave a lien for "work done or materials furnished." However, we do not find it necessary to decide whether appellant acquired a lien for the reasonable value of the tires purchased by him. It is quite obvious that, as to the item of $196.68 which he paid to O'Connor, he cannot be regarded as one who has made, altered, or repaired an article of personal property. Therefore, even if we should concede that he acquired a lien for the reasonable value of the tires, nevertheless, since the amount thereof, $230, was less than the sum tendered to him by respondent's agent at the time when the latter made his demand for possession, he was deprived by that tender of all right to a lien. Miller v. Price, 4 Cal. Unrep. 983, 39 P. 781; Civ. Code, § 2905. We conclude, therefore, that appellant had no lien when the action was commenced which entitled him to retain possession of respondent's automobile.

[2] The court erred in giving the instruction to the effect that the value of the automobile should be determined as of the date when respondent made his demand for its return—May 31, 1920. There is a marked diversity of opinion respecting the time when the value of the property sued for in a replevin action should be determined for the purpose of fixing the amount of the alternative money judgment. In some jurisdictions the courts have adopted the view that in such actions the amount is to be measured by the value of the property at the time it was taken if the original taking was wrongful, or at the time of the demand for and the refusal of possession if the property originally came rightfully into the defendant's possession. These decisions hold that, for the purpose of ascertaining such value, the rule which obtains in actions of trover to recover damages for a conversion of the property should be followed. In other jurisdictions, and California is one of them, the courts have adopted what seems to us to be the more logical and reasonable view, namely, that where, in an action for replevin, the plaintiff recovers a judgment for the property, or for its value in case delivery cannot be had, the value should be that which the property had at the date of the trial. These decisions proceed upon the theory that, the money being but a substitute for the property, the amount of the alternative money judgment should be fixed by ascertaining it as of the date nearest to the time when the property would be delivered. This rule was adopted by our Supreme Court in Phillips v. Sutherland, 2 Cal. Unrep. 241, 2 P. 32, the court there saying:

"The money value is a substitute for the property, and the amount can be approximately fixed by ascertaining it as of the date (when the value can be judicially determined) nearest to the time when the property would be delivered."

The rationale of the rule is well stated by the New York Court of Appeals in Allen v. Fox, 51 N. Y. 562, 10 Am. Rep. 641:

"In the action of replevin, under the Code, the jury are required to assess the value of the property, and damages for its detention. The value here intended is the value at the time of the trial. In case the prevailing party can obtain a delivery of the property, he must take it as it then is; if he cannot obtain such delivery, then the value is intended as a substitute and precise equivalent of the property. The damages for detention are the same, whether the party recover the property or its value. Now, suppose the property has been badly depreciated, intermediate the wrongful taking and the trial, still the prevailing party is obliged to take it if he can obtain it, and he is indemnified for the depreciation by the damages assessed to him. But he recovers the same damages if he cannot obtain the property and is obliged to take its value, and then if the value has been assessed as it existed at the time of the taking, before the depreciation, it is clear that he gets more than an indemnity. Hence there is no way of administering this law, except by holding that the value required to be assessed by the jury means the value at the time of the trial."

See, also, Luedde v. Hooper, 95 Tex. 172, 66 S. W. 55; Chemical Co. v. Nickells, 66 Mo. App. 686; Chapman v. Kerr, 80 Mo. 158; O'Meara v. North American Min. Co., 2 Nev. 112, 117, 126. So far as we are advised the rule announced by our Supreme Court in Phillips v. Sutherland, supra, has never been questioned by that court. Page v. Fowler, 39 Cal. 412, 2 Am. Rep. 462, is not in point. In that case the successful party, the defendant, was entitled to damages for conversion, the property having been disposed of by the plaintiff shortly after it had been taken by him under a writ of replevin. There the court was dealing with a rule of damages. Nor is Hartnett v. Wilson, 31 Cal. App. 678, 161 P. 281, in point. In that case the District Court of Appeal based its ruling to a large extent upon a stipulation or concession made by the appellants in the course of the trial. In Tully v. Harloe, 35 Cal. 302, 95 Am. Dec. 102, the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment without adverting to appellant's claim that the value of the property should have been determined as of the date of the wrongful taking. So far as we are advised, these are the only decisions in this state which have any bearing upon the question now under consideration, and of these cases Phillips v. Sutherland is the only one which is directly in point. Not only are we satisfied that the doctrine of that case is supported by cogent reasoning, but it is, moreover, binding upon us here.

Respondent, who took the witness stand in his own behalf, testified that the value of the car on December 10, 1920, the day when it came into appellant's possession, was $2,000, and that at the date of the trial, March 28, 1922, its value was but $600. No witness placed the value of the automobile at more than $600 at the date of the trial. It is obvious that the jury, following the court's erroneous instruction to ascertain the value of the property as of the date of the demand therefor, fixed a value which has no basis in the evidence under the rule announced in Phillips v. Sutherland, supra.

[3] The only substantial errors which we find are those which are involved in the improper instruction above mentioned, and in the unsupported finding that the value of the property is $1,000. Since these only affect one issue—the issue as to value of the property for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the alternative money judgment—a retrial of the entire cause will not be required. Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 330, 95 P. 154, 159.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to retry the issue regarding the value of the automobile, for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the alternative money judgment to which plaintiff is entitled if for any reason a delivery of the property to him cannot be had.

GREEN v. DARLING. (Civ. 4001.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 23, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸931(3)—Findings being waived, all issues made by pleadings presumed to have been found for successful party.

Findings having been waived, all issues made by pleadings are presumed to have been found in favor of successful party.

2. Pleading ⟸8(2)—Allegation that parties to agreement rescinded held statement of ultimate fact.

Where complaint alleged contract of purchase of trailer in hæc verba, with additional fact that it was returned to seller and demand made by buyer for moneys paid on account, allegation that parties to agreement rescinded was not conclusion but statement of ultimate fact; "rescission" being a fact.

3. Sales ⟸92—On rescission of sale of trailer, seller was required to return money received.

Where minds of parties met on proposition that they would rescind sale of trailer, it was unnecessary that seller stipulate to return money received, law requiring him to do this as consequence of having agreed that contract be abrogated.

4. Pleading ⟸205(2)—Objection that essential fact appears as conclusion only not reached by general demurrer.

Objection that essential fact appears in pleading only in form of conclusion of law cannot be reached by general demurrer.

5. Appeal and error ⟸192(1)—Criticism of pleading as stating essential fact in form of conclusion not first urged on appeal.

Criticism of pleading as stating essential fact in form of conclusion comes too late when raised for first time on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Action by S. B. Green against Frank L. Darling. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Denio & Hart and Swaffield & Swaffield, all of Long Beach, for appellant.

G. M. Spicer and Herbert Moore, both of Long Beach, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The complaint in this action alleged that on September 21, 1920, the defendant was engaged in the business of selling automobile trucks and automobile trailers in the city of Long Beach, Cal.; that on said date the defendant, through his authorized agent, entered into a contract in writing with the plaintiff, by the terms of which the defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff one Utility trailer, tires and body. Said complaint consisted of three separate causes of action in each of which the alleged written instrument was embraced. It was further alleged that on or about October 5, 1920, the parties supplemented said contract by a further instrument in writing; that the trailer was delivered to the plaintiff, and that he began to use the same, but that it commenced to break down; that the defendant agreed to repair the same, but that it continued breaking down on an average of twice a week, and that the plaintiff finally returned said vehicle to the defendant, notified him that it was not suited to plaintiff's business, and had not given satisfaction as it was guaranteed to do, and demanded the return of $1,024.40 which had been paid on account of the purchase price thereof; that no part of said sum had been refunded, and that the same was due and owing from the defendant to the plaintiff. In the second count the principal allegations of the first count were repeated, with a further allegation that said trailer had become wholly useless; that it was returned; that the consideration for the execution of the contract failed in part before being rendered to plaintiff. In said second count it is also averred that "said contract mentioned in paragraphs 2 and 3 was rescinded by plaintiff on or about the 17th day of December, 1920; that plaintiff has returned to defendant the Utility trailer and everything of value received by reason of said contract." In the third count it is averred that "the parties hereto mutually agreed to rescind said contract contained in paragraphs 2 and 3"; it is then alleged that said trailer and everything of value received from the defendant was returned to him, and said amount demanded. In each of the last two counts it is alleged, as in the first, that the breaking of said vehicle was not the fault of the plaintiff.

No demurrer was filed by the defendant. He answered, admitting the execution of the contract, but denying that there was any warranty or guaranty, or that the trailer broke down, and denying that the consideration had failed; the defendant further denied that said parties mutually agreed to rescind, or that they did rescind, said contract.

The case went to trial before the court without a jury; findings were waived, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, specially reciting that "the contract mentioned in plaintiff's complaint was rescinded on the 17th day of December, 1921, and that the plaintiff do have and recover from the defendant" the amount demanded.

This appeal is brought up on the judgment roll alone, upon the sole contention that no count of said complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Appellant cites authorities to support his claim that the extent of a warranty is limited to the language of the contract, and that the buyer in bringing suit upon an alleged warranty must aver that he relied thereon in order to maintain an action for breach. It is further contended that the complaint did not sufficiently allege a mutual rescission, but that the allegations thereof constituted "purely a conclusion of law, unless the terms of the agreement to rescind are alleged."

[1] If the contract was mutually rescinded, as found by the court below, and as alleged in the second count, and if the rescission was sufficiently pleaded by the plaintiff in said count, it must follow that it is immaterial whether or not the trailer was sold upon a warranty or was defective. If the parties in fact canceled their contract, and everything of value was returned to the defendant in pursuance of such cancellation, it would be his legal duty to refund whatever consideration he may have received therefor; and the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed. The plaintiff alleged that the parties mutually rescinded the contract, and that everything of value received from the defendant was returned to him; these allegations were denied by the defendant, but upon the introduction of oral and documentary evidence the court adjudged and decreed that the contract mentioned in plaintiff's complaint was rescinded—extinguished. Findings having been waived, all the issues made by the pleadings are presumed to have been found in favor of the successful party. Antonelle v. Board of C. H. Com'rs, 92 Cal. 228, 28 P. 270.

[2] The complaint having alleged the contract in hæc verba, together with the additional facts that the trailer was returned to defendant and demand made by the plaintiff for moneys paid on account, the allegation that the parties to the agreement rescinded was not a conclusion, but it was a statement of ultimate fact. "Rescission is a fact." Seanor v. McLaughlin, 165 Pa. 150, 30 A. 717, 32 L. R. A. 467; Reliance Life Ins. Co. v. Russell, 208 Ala. 559, 94 So. 748. No other terms of the contract of rescission need to have been made or alleged.

[3-5] If the minds of the parties met on the proposition that they would rescind, it was not necessary that the defendant stipulate to return to the plaintiff the money which he had received, for the law requires him to do this as a consequence of having agreed that the contract be abrogated; and to require more of the pleader would make it necessary that he plead the evidence rather than the ultimate fact. The objection that an essential fact appears in the pleading only in the form of a conclusion of law cannot be reached by general demurrer. Santa Barbara v. Eldred, 108 Cal. 294, 41 P. 410. In the instant case no demurrer was filed, and it is therefore even more apparent that this criticism of the complaint comes too late when raised for the first time on appeal.

The facts alleged in the second count are sufficient as a pleading for the purposes of the action in the absence of a special demurrer.

The judgment is affirmed.

DELANNOY et ux. v. QUETU et al.
(Civ. 4468.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 16, 1925. Rehearing Denied Aug. 13, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 10, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸931(1)—In reviewing record and sufficiency of evidence to support finding, evidence establishing correctness thereof accepted as true with inferences therefrom leading to same conclusion.

In reviewing record on appeal and in examining sufficiency of evidence to support questioned finding, District Court of Appeal must accept as true all evidence tending to establish correctness of finding as made, taking into account all inferences which might reasonably lead to same conclusion.

2. Trusts ⟸372(3) — Evidence held not to warrant finding that defendant caused corporation to convey ranch land without consideration.

Under allegations that defendant induced plaintiffs to emigrate from France to help pay off his ranch, agreeing to give them a one-third interest therein, evidence that defendant thereafter incorporated ranch, and corporation exchanged parts thereof for other lands, and thereafter conveyed land to grantee, who conveyed to defendant's sister, held not to warrant finding that defendant caused ranch to be disposed of without consideration.

3. Corporations ⟸684—Trial court not without jurisdiction because of statute requiring commencement of suits for receiverships in county where corporation had office and principal place of business.

Where plaintiffs were not stockholders of corporation which had no creditors, and suit was not commenced to effect dissolution, trial court was not without jurisdiction because of Code Civ. Proc. § 565, requiring suits for receiverships to be commenced in county where corporation maintained office and principal place of business.

4. Corporations ⟸684—Suit for receiver of foreign corporation held triable in county where corporation owned or was entitled to land.

In suit for accounting and receivership, where plaintiffs alleged that defendant induced them to emigrate from France to help pay ranch off, and thereafter incorporated it under law of foreign state, and caused corporation to transfer it without consideration, issues were properly triable under Code Civ. Proc. §

564, subd. 7, in any county where corporation was alleged to have owned or been entitled to land.

5. Receivers ⊂⊃16—Generally courts may appoint receivers to preserve property pendente lite.

Generally, courts have jurisdiction to appoint receivers to preserve assets pendente lite.

6. Trusts ⊂⊃372(3)—Claim, if any, of plaintiffs to ranch fully satisfied by conveyance to them of other lands.

Plaintiffs alleged that defendant induced them to emigrate from France to help pay off ranch for interest therein. Held, under evidence, that if plaintiffs had any legal claim in corporation organized to take over ranch, it was satisfied by conveyance to them of other lands.

7. Estoppel ⊂⊃75—Plaintiffs, by transferring stock, were divested of interest regardless of failure to have transfer entered on books, and estopped to claim title thereto.

Plaintiffs alleged that defendant induced them to emigrate from France to help pay off ranch for interest therein, and defendant thereafter incorporated ranch and caused corporation to convey it without consideration. Held, under evidence, and in view of Civ. Code, § 324, that, even if plaintiffs were owners of stock in ranch corporation, by transferring it, they were divested of interest regardless of failure to have transfer entered on corporation's books, and were effectively estopped from claiming any title in stock transferred.

8. Trusts ⊂⊃372(3)—Property, under evidence, not held by or in trust for corporation of which receiver or trustee might be appointed.

Plaintiffs alleged that defendant induced them to emigrate from France to help pay off ranch for interest therein, and that defendant thereafter incorporated ranch and caused corporation to transfer property without consideration. Held, under evidence, that, no irregularity in transfers having been established, none of the property was held by or in trust for corporation, of which receiver or trustee might be appointed.

9. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1071(1, 6)—Erroneous finding or failure to find not affecting judgment is not ground for reversal.

Erroneous finding or failure to find which does not affect judgment rendered is not ground for reversal.

10. Appeal and error ⊂⊃110—No appeal from order denying new trial.

There is no right of appeal from order denying motion for new trial.

11. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1010(1)—Trial court's determination of questions, supported by substantial evidence, is conclusive.

As determination of questions by trial court was supported by substantial evidence, its action is conclusive on appeal.

On Motion for Rehearing.

12. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1011(1)—District Court of Appeal's only inquiry is whether trial court had evidence before it on which unprejudiced mind would reach same conclusion.

The District Court of Appeal will not weigh conflicting evidence, but its duty begins and ends with inquiry whether trial court had before it evidence on which unprejudiced mind might reasonably have reached same conclusion.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by Samuel Delannoy and wife against Alfred Quetu and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Walter Eden, of Santa Ana, for appellants.

J. Wiseman Macdonald and W. W. Wallace, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. Early in the year 1909, the respondent Alfred Quetu, a native of France, who had for many years resided in California, owned an option to purchase a ranch consisting of about 400 acres in Orange county. In the month of May of said year he visited his mother, Hermance Quetu, and his brothers and sisters, all of whom were then residing in France. During his stay abroad, his mother delivered to him 60,000 francs for investment in this country, and which he testified that he did invest in Arizona mining property. It appears that Quetu, upon his departure for the old country, had left a foreman by the name of Butler in charge of the ranch, and that prior to his return he paid for the same through Butler. During his visit abroad Quetu advised the plaintiff Julienne Delannoy, a sister, and her husband, Samuel, as he did Frank Dupre, a cousin, and Augustin Quetu and Gabrielle Quetu, a brother and sister, respectively, to come to America. Previously to Alfred Quetu's return they came here, and all commenced to live and work upon the Orange county ranch. The five immigrants continued working together on said ranch until each was allotted possession of a portion thereof, which respondent Alfred Quetu testified was thereafter operated for him on a profit-sharing basis. At some time after Alfred Quetu purchased said property, he mortgaged the same as security for the repayment of $45,000 which he testified he was compelled to borrow when forced to pay a note which he indorsed for another party. On April 24, 1914, he incorporated the Valencia Ranch Company, under the laws of the state of Arizona, with Phœnix designated as the principal place of business, and the said Alfred Quetu, Samuel Delannoy, and Augustin Quetu were named in the articles of incorporation as directors. On June 3, 1914, said ranch property, described as consisting of 407.1 acres, was deeded by Alfred Quetu to the corporation, for which he testified that all of the capital stock, of the par value of $1 per share, was issued to himself. There were 300,000 shares of authorized capital stock, 30,000 shares (the stockbooks actually indicated 31,000 shares) of which were thereafter caused to be reissued to Samuel Delannoy, and the other parties also received various amounts thereof. On January 29, 1915, copies of said articles were filed with the secretary of state in California, and with the clerk of Orange county, the principal office and place of business in this state being situated at or near San Juan Capistrano, in said county.

It appears that on March 27, 1915, the Valencia Ranch Company deeded to A. J. Visel and others 50.457 acres of said ranch lands; on March 22, 1916, said corporation deeded to the same grantees 333.03 acres thereof; on March 27, 1915, Visel and his cograntees deeded to the corporation certain lands in the county of Riverside, which on August 24, 1915, said corporation deeded to one White, who, in turn, conveyed the same to the defendant Gabrielle Quetu on March 9, 1916; and on May 17, 1916, one Carrie Williamson and her husband conveyed to the plaintiff Samuel Delannoy two lots at Downey, in Los Angeles county.

Appellants instituted this action in San Bernardino county on June 16, 1920, alleging that at some time subsequent to March 27, 1915, the corporation exchanged the Riverside property for lands in San Bernardino county, which latter the defendant Alfred Quetu had caused to be deeded to his sister, Gabrielle, without consideration. Appellants contend that Alfred Quetu while in France promised them that if they would come to America and work on the Orange county ranch, and help "pay it off," he would give them a one-third interest therein; that after Delannoy had complied with his part of such alleged agreement and the corporation had acquired said property, it forfeited its right to do business in California, and that the defendants Alfred Quetu, and Augustin Quetu, former directors, are sued as trustees of the property of the corporation, together with Gabrielle Quetu, to whom the San Bernardino property is alleged to have been conveyed at the instance of the defendant Alfred Quetu. The complaint demands that a decree be entered adjudging that the defendant Gabrielle Quetu holds title to said last-mentioned lands, and to the Riverside property, in trust for the stockholders and creditors of the corporation; that a trustee be appointed in lieu of the directors who held their offices as such at the time said corporation forfeited its California rights; that the Riverside and San Bernardino properties be restored to the corporation; and that such trustee account for the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and close up the affairs and distribute the assets.

The defendants denied that plaintiffs were promised any interest in said property, or in the corporation, and denied that any of the property was conveyed to or by the corporation without consideration. It is contended by them that Alfred Quetu suggested that plaintiffs could make more money in America than in France, and that if they desired to work on his ranch he would pay them for their services; that he and the corporation did pay the plaintiffs for all such services, and advanced other moneys to them, until 1911, when they commenced working a portion of the ranch on shares; and the defendants also pleaded the statute of limitations, of frauds, and insist in their briefs that the superior court of San Bernardino county had no jurisdiction of the suit because section 565 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires that the appointment of a receiver or trustee of a foreign corporation be made in the county in which the corporation maintains its office and principal place of business.

The trial court found for the defendants upon all grounds set forth in their answer, and the plaintiffs appeal, asserting that the evidence was not sufficient to support the findings or the judgment based thereon.

[1] Much of the evidence in this case is not contradicted, but we are bound by the rules heretofore announced by the Supreme Court in reviewing a record presented upon appeal, and "in examining the sufficiency of the evidence to support a questioned finding, * * * must accept as true all evidence tending to establish the correctness of the finding as made, taking into account, as well, all inferences which might reasonably have been thought by the trial court to lead to the same conclusion." Bancroft-Whitney Co. v. McHugh, 166 Cal. 140, 134 P. 1157. As expressed also in Woodard v. Glenwood Lumber Co., 171 Cal. 513, 153 P. 951:

> "We must be understood to be setting forth the evidence, in so far as it is conflicting or subject to opposing inferences, in the light most favorable to the support of the judgment under review. This is the right in which the evidence must be deemed to have been regarded by the court below, and represents, therefore, that view of the facts which is binding on this court on appeal."

It appears that Alfred Quetu's investment of his mother's money in the Arizona project was ill advised, and that her funds were lost, but that she passed away shortly thereafter, and her estate was not probated; that while he did not consider the plaintiffs or his codefendants legally entitled to any portion of the ranch, or to an interest in the corporation, he did believe that, except for the loss suffered through the Arizona investment, each of them would have received a share of his mother's estate, and that he should protect them. Quetu testified that he at no time agreed to give any of the parties an interest as the plaintiffs alleged and that they were fully compensated for all their services; that Gabrielle Quetu invested money in the Orange county ranch and continuously worked thereon, much of the time without wages or other compensation, until the property was sold and the Riverside ranch was deeded to her in March, 1916. It was shown that previously to Alfred Quetu's return to America he completed paying for the Orange county ranch, and that nothing remained to be "paid off," as plaintiffs contended it was part of the agreement that they should assist in accomplishing. Some time after Quetu's return he mortgaged said property for the sum of $45,000, but he testified that this was necessary in order to raise sufficient funds with which to meet a promissory note which he had indorsed for another person, not a party to this suit.

The fact is in evidence that, although plaintiffs assert that Quetu controlled the affairs of the corporation, and dictated all transactions, none of which was understood by them, he discussed all business matters with them in the French language before any important action was taken, and that all corporate acts were voted upon and authorized by the full board of directors, with the complete understanding and acquiescence of all the parties concerned.

[2] Despite the contention of appellants that Alfred Quetu caused the Orange county ranch to be conveyed to the corporation, and subsequently to be disposed of without consideration, we find no evidence that would warrant a finding to such effect. The property in Orange county, as heretofore stated, was conveyed by the Valencia Ranch Company to Visel and others in 1915 and 1916, and the latter conveyed Riverside county property to the corporation in 1915; both 1915 transfers were dated March 27th. The property received by the corporation in 1915 was situated near Hemet, Cal., and was subsequently exchanged for a one-half interest in a ranch near Loma Linda; the 1916 conveyance was made in exchange for the remaining half of said Loma Linda ranch, all of which was deeded by the corporation to Ben White by deed dated August 24, 1915, and on March 9, 1916, this latter property was conveyed by White to Gabrielle Quetu. In May, 1916, Alfred Quetu purchased and caused to be conveyed to the Delannoys a residence and orange grove near Downey, in Los Angeles county, which they accepted subject to a mortgage, and moved thereon. It was testified that when the plaintiffs left Orange county they also received and took with them to the Downey property household furniture, farming implements, and five valuable imported Belgian horses that had belonged to Alfred Quetu.

It affirmatively appears that the expense of operation, together with interest on the $45,000 mortgage, rendered the burden of maintaining the corporation unprofitable, and that all the parties interested therein after united consultation decided that it should be dissolved and the property disposed of, which was done, as we have indicated above. All the outstanding certificates of capital stock were indorsed by the various holders thereof, including appellants, and were delivered back to Alfred Quetu, who testified that as soon as he was advised both from Sacramento and from Phœnix, Ariz., that the corporation had been finally dissolved, he destroyed the entire issue, though it does not appear that the surrender and transfer was entered upon the books of the corporation.

The trial court found "It is not true that plaintiffs had any agreement of any kind or character to help Alfred Quetu pay for said ranch, but it is true that said ranch was fully paid for by the said Alfred Quetu prior to the time that the plaintiffs came to America"; and as a conclusion of law it was determined that the defendants were not indebted to the plaintiffs or either of them in any sum whatsoever; that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an accounting of the rents, issues or profits of the real property described in the complaint, and that there was no necessity for the appointment of a receiver or trustee.

It was testified that when Quetu caused the Downey ranch to be conveyed to the plaintiffs he informed them that they must accept the same in full satisfaction of any claims they might have, and that they replied "All right," and that Delannoy thereafter said, "I understand that you are not obliged to furnish us any more property since we have accepted the Downey property in full settlement."

Appellants assign many grounds upon which they seek a reversal of the judgment below.

[3] The respondents urged that the trial court was without jurisdiction of the action for the reason that section 565 of the Code of Civil Procedure required suits for receiverships to be instituted in the county where the corporation maintained its office and principal place of business. Said section provides that:

"Upon the dissolution of any corporation, the superior court of the county in which the corporation carries on its business or has its principal place of business, on application of any creditor of the corporation, or of any stockholder or member thereof, may appoint one or more persons to be receivers or trustees of the corporation, to take charge of the estate and effects thereof and to collect the debts and property due and belonging to the corporation, and to pay the outstanding debts thereof, and to divide the moneys and other property that shall remain over among the stockholders or members."

It was not alleged nor attempted to be shown that the defendant corporation when in existence did business in the state of Arizona, or had an office or filed its articles in any California county other than Orange county. From what has been said, however, it becomes manifest that the section in question does not here apply. Appellants' suit was not commenced for the purpose of effecting the dissolution of the corporation, they were not then stockholders, and there were no creditors; and, as we have indicated, we are of opinion that the property described in the complaint was no longer subject to an action against said corporation or its former stockholders.

[4] We think, however, that the issues presented were properly triable in any county wherein the corporation was alleged to have owned or been entitled to real property, by virtue of subdivision 7 of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as argued by the appellants. It is there provided that:

"A receiver may be appointed by the court in which an action is pending, or by the judge thereof: * * * 7. In all other cases where receivers have heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity."

Respondents apparently unduly stress the importance of the receivership in these proceedings, which were instituted, not primarily for the purpose of dissolving the corporation or marshaling the assets of its estate, but praying a decree that the plaintiffs were the owners of properties alleged to have been alienated by the corporation without consideration, and that it be reconveyed and distributed to them, as an incident to which result a receivership would have been appropriate had appellants established the facts as they alleged them to exist.

In Cunliffe v. Consumers' Ass'n, 280 Pa. 263, 124 A. 501, 32 A. L. R. 1348, the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, in discussing the question here presented, said:

"It would seem strange to say that the courts of Pennsylvania have no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver for a corporation where all of the assets, all of the business, all of the officers and directors, and all of the books and records of the corporation are in this state, merely because the promoters of the corporation for some purpose went to another state to have the company incorporated."

In Acken v. Coughlin, 103 App. Div. 1, 92 N. Y. S. 700, applying the same rule upon the authority of previous like holdings, it was said:

"The courts of this state, at the suit of an officer, director, stockholder or creditor of a foreign corporation, have jurisdiction to compel the officers or directors of the corporation, over whom jurisdiction has been acquired by the service of process, to account to the corporation for property of the corporation in their hands or which they have misapplied."

[5] This rule is generally recognized, that courts have jurisdiction to appoint receivers for the purpose of preserving assets pendente lite. McAtamney v. Comm. Hotel Constr. Co. (D. C.) 296 F. 500; Natl. Guar. Credit Corp. v. Worth & Co., 274 Pa. 148, 117 A. 914; Starr v. Bankers' Union, 81 Neb. 377, 116 N. W. 61, 129 Am. St. Rep. 684, 5 Thomp. on Corp. § 6861; 3 Cook on Corp. (5th Ed.) § 865.

But there are at least three of the more prominent features presented by the record, either one of which would require an affirmance, to which we shall devote attention, namely: (1) Upon the theory that Samuel Delannoy received stock in the corporation merely as security for the moral obligation to pay his wife her share in her mother's estate, we think that if appellants possessed any legal claim it was fully satisfied by the conveyance to them of the Downey ranch; (2) assuming that Delannoy was the legal owner of said shares of stock, he accepted the real property, and to all intents and purposes transferred his stock, regardless of a failure to have the same entered upon the books of the corporation, divesting himself of all interest in the corporation; and (3) the action having been based upon the theory that a receiver or trustee should be appointed to take charge of and distribute the real property described in the complaint, and no irregularity in the above-mentioned transfers having been established, none of said property is held by, or in trust for, the corporation, of which a receiver or trustee might be appointed.

[6] Accepting the evidence in support of the findings and judgment below as true, appellants received $250 during the first three or four months after their arrival in California, and were paid each month thereafter for their services. When they commenced operation of a portion of the Orange county ranch on shares, they also received the amount of proceeds due them after the payment of taxes, interest, and other expenses. Up to the time of their removal therefrom, therefore, no unpaid balance remained due them for their share of the labor and management of said property. Thereafter, assuming that they held said stock as security, it is obvious that, upon acceptance of the Downey property and surrender of such security "in full settlement," they were no longer entitled to demand a further consideration for the same obligation, whether it be a moral or legal one, on the part of Alfred Quetu. It was not claimed by appellants, nor was there any showing attempted to be made by them, that Alfred Quetu was legally indebted to them on account of the loss of moneys invested by him for the mother; on the contrary, it does appear that Quetu had never agreed to pay them any amount in behalf of said estate, and that Hermance Quetu gave him the funds, without restriction, to invest as he might desire; and he testified that he had returned to her a considerable amount of her money previously to her demise. However, it is conceded by the respondents that Alfred Quetu may have assumed at least a moral obligation to divide the portion of the estate which was intrusted to him, and, adopting such theory for the purposes of this case, we think appellants were precluded, by their acceptance of the Downey property, from successfully seeking other equitable relief.

[7] If it be said that Delannoy was the legal owner of 31,000 shares of the stock of said corporation, and that as such he should be entitled to one-tenth of its property upon the forfeiture of its right to do business in this state, and its dissolution in the state of its creation, he was not such stockholder at the time this suit was instituted. He was therefore estopped to maintain such an action as a stockholder, and it does not appear that there were any creditors of the corporation. It has been repeatedly held in most jurisdictions, including our own, that, regardless of the emphatic requirements of the statute, by-laws or charter, requiring that transfers of stock be entered on the books of a corporation, an assignment and delivery of certificates effectually estops the transferor from claiming any title to the stock so transferred. 4 Thomp. on Corp. (2d Ed.) § 4355.

Section 324 of the Civil Code expressly provides that as to the parties, shares of corporate stock "may be transferred by indorsement by signature of the proprietor, his agent, attorney, or legal representative, and the delivery of the certificate." An alleged gift of the capital stock of a corporation, without consideration, was involved in Calkins v. Equitable B. & L. Ass'n of the United States, 126 Cal. 531, 59 P. 30. One Daniel Calkins assigned certain certificates of stock to F. G. Calkins and others, which were thereafter under his instructions held by the assignees without notice to or transfer upon the books of the corporation. Upon the death of the assignor the assignees presented said stock to the corporation for transfer upon its books, which was refused, whereupon they brought an action for the purpose of obtaining a mandatory decree directing such transfer. The executor of Daniel Calkins' estate intervened, claiming that the attempted assignment was void. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and from such judgment and an order denying a new trial the intervener appealed. The Supreme Court, after reciting the facts, and following the quotation of section 324 of the Civil Code, said:

"Everything necessary to a complete transfer of the stock, as between the parties, was found by the court to have been done by them in the lifetime of Daniel Calkins, and it is also found that these things were done with the intent to make a present transfer, and not with the intent to make a testamentary disposition. We think these findings are fully warranted by the evidence, and that the conclusion of the trial court that a valid transfer of the stock was effected is fully supported. * * * The gift and transfer of the stock was accomplished by the written assignment and delivery of the stock with the intention to make a gift thereof to plaintiffs. The donor thereby gave up to plaintiffs the title and control of the stock, and he could not thereafter revoke the gift."

The same rule was announced and applied in Pacific Natl. Bank v. Western Pac. R. Co., 157 Cal. 573, 108 P. 676, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 987, 21 Ann. Cas. 1391; Spreckels v. Nevada Bank, 113 Cal. 272, 45 P. 329, 33 L. R. A. 459, 54 Am. St. Rep. 348, and Strout v. Natoma Water, etc., Co., 9 Cal. 78.

In Riverside Land Co. v. Jarvis, 174 Cal. 316, 327, 163 P. 54, 59, it was said, that the provisions of section 324 of the Civil Code are not exclusive, and that:

"This language does not forbid the making of agreements to transfer, nor the making of contracts, good between the parties, that a certificate shall pass with the transfer of certain other property. Corporate stock would be transferable without such provision. Civ. Code, § 1044. The provision merely prescribes a mode by which the transfer may be made. It does not prohibit a transfer by other methods, nor declare that when made in another manner a transfer may not be enforced by the party entitled to the shares."

Young v. New Pedrara Onyx Co., 48 Cal. App. 1, 15, 192 P. 55, 60, citing the case last mentioned herein, held "that a transfer of title, good as between the parties, may be made in any manner appropriate to the assignment of choses in action or intangible personal property."

The obvious conclusion therefore follows that, although the record does not disclose the exact date of Delannoy's transfer to Quetu of the 31,000 shares of stock previously received, it appears that long before this suit was begun he parted with all his right, title, and interest in said shares by a legal present assignment and delivery of the certificates. The appellants having disposed of their stock, for a consideration which we think was ample, they were therefore not stockholders when this action was instituted, and were not, as such, entitled to recover, or, in fact, to maintain the suit.

[8] The third and most strenuously urged ground upon which appellants founded their asserted right to recover, is, we think, likewise without merit. As we have shown, the corporation parted with its Orange county properties, and the lands in suit were conveyed to Gabrielle Quetu for a sufficient consideration to preclude the corporation or its representatives from reclaiming them. It is the positive testimony of some of the witnesses that she invested her money in the corporate enterprise, and that she labored during many years in its interest, without compensation other than the final conveyance to her of the lands in controversy upon abandoning the Orange county lands and the surrender of her corporate stock in the manner and with the intent which accompanied the Delannoy settlement. No fraud was shown to have entered into any of the transfers, nor does the evidence disclose any apparent dissatisfaction of appellants with their settlement at the time it was consummated, though it does appear that following their unequivocal admission that their claim, if any they had, was fully adjusted with Quetu, they later reconveyed the property which they had accepted to the original vendor; that they then pressed Quetu with further demands, whereupon he again and again at no little effort and expense attempted to pacify them, but without success. We are convinced from the evidence here presented that appellants not only failed to establish any legal or equitable claim against Quetu or the corporation, but that their contention that the properties described in their complaint belonged to the corporation, or were held in trust by Gabrielle Quetu therefor because of illegal transfers, is without foundation. And, this being true, the subject-matter of the attempted receivership did not exist; hence, in the absence of corporate or trust property, the appointment of a receiver or trustee would have been an idle act which the courts cannot be called upon to perform, and there was no cause of action.

[9] A number of the findings are attacked as not being supported by the evidence, and in several instances this criticism is justified, for instance: That the plaintiff Samuel Delannoy was not called upon to act as an officer of the corporation, that Alfred Quetu did not sell the crops, and that the plaintiff Samuel Delannoy never was a stockholder of the corporation. But from the view we take of other legal questions involved, it is not necessary to consider these assignments of error. Although such findings are contrary to the evidence and erroneous, we think that correct findings in these respects would not alter the result reached by the court below if the judgment appealed from were reversed and the same evidence adduced upon a new trial. Such errors must therefore be disregarded, since an erroneous finding, or a failure to find, which does not affect the judgment rendered is not a ground for reversal. Hall v. Crowley, 12 Cal. App. 30, 106 P. 426; Ramboz v. Stansbury, 13 Cal. App. 649, 110 P. 473; Forestier v. Johnson, 164 Cal. 24, 127 P. 156; Gallatin v. Corning Irr. Co., 163 Cal. 405, 126 P. 864, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 74; McRae v. Ross, 170 Cal. 74, 148 P. 215; Eastman v. Piper (Cal. App.) 229 P. 1002.

[10] The judgment below is affirmed. There is no right of appeal from the order denying motion for new trial, and the appeal from such order is therefore dismissed.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; WORKS, J.

On Motion for Rehearing.

CRAIG, Acting P. J. The judgment of the superior court herein having been affirmed, appellants petition for a rehearing, and assign two grounds upon which they assert that it should be granted.

It is said, first, that the opinion of this court was founded principally upon the fact that after Delannoy became a stockholder of the Valencia Ranch Company he redelivered to Quetu his stock in consideration for property situated at Downey, and that Delannoy therefore was no longer a stockholder, and had no further interest in the corporation or the land in suit; that the trial court found "that said land was conveyed to Samuel Delannoy, but expressly made no finding as to whether or not said property was conveyed in full satisfaction of all claims of plaintiff against defendant," and that this amounted to a finding in favor of the plaintiffs.

We think the appellants misinterpret the finding of the lower court, and seek to restrain the holding here within bounds far narrower than its language permits. It should be borne in mind that real property alleged to have been situated in San Bernardino and Riverside counties constituted the subject of the action, and that appellants claimed an interest therein as a basis for their prayer for the appointment of a receiver. The trial court found that appellants had no interest in said property, and that there was no necessity for the appointment of a receiver. Beyond the issues presented the court could not venture, and it did not attempt to do so, but, confining itself within those limits, it found that the parties had no agreement such as alleged by appellants, and concluded that the defendants were not indebted to the plaintiffs, or either of them, in any sum whatsoever. It was testified that Delannoy admitted having received the Downey property in full settlement, and stated in the original opinion, that we "must accept as true all evidence tending to establish the correctness of the finding as made." The exact language of the finding referred to by petitioners was as follows:

"The court expressly makes no finding as to whether or not the said property was conveyed in full satisfaction of all claims of the said plaintiff Samuel Delannoy against the said Alfred Quetu."

[11] Whether or not the plaintiffs had or might have some claim against Alfred Quetu could not possibly be determined, but as to the main issues presented by the pleadings in this case—being the existence of the alleged verbal contract, the indebtedness of the defendants to the plaintiffs and the interest of the latter in certain specified corporate property—the trial court found adversely to appellants. These questions were the principal ones presented, and, as their determination by the trial court was supported by substantial evidence, its action is conclusive here.

[12] The only remaining point advanced by petitioners is the contention that, notwithstanding testimony that a ranch was conveyed to Gabrielle Quetu in consideration for money advanced and services rendered by her, and the finding of the court below that she paid a valuable consideration therefor, this court should review the conflicting evidence and hold that which favors respondents to be unworthy of belief after it has been accepted as true by the judge who tried the case. This court's duty begins and ends with the inquiry whether the trial court had before it evidence upon which an unprejudiced mind might reasonably have reached the same conclusion which was reached. Wallace v. Sisson, 114 Cal. 42, 45 P. 1000; Cronenwett v. Underwriters, 44 Cal. App. 568, 186 P. 826; Dunphy v. Dunphy, 161 Cal. 380, 119 P. 512, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1230.

The petition is denied.

I concur: WILLIS, Justice pro tem.

HARVEY v. MACHTIG. (Civ. 4392.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 18, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 14, 1925.)

1. Negligence ⟸32(3)—Resort keeper liable for injury to customer in car parked as usual by concessionaire.

Where plaintiff was injured by collapse of defective amusement device in defendant's resort while sitting in a car being driven by concessionaire to dining hall, who had stopped near such amusement to unload packages for his stand, held defendant was not relieved of liability by his concessionaire so parking where it was customary for people generally to park there.

2. Negligence ⟸32(1)—Resort keeper under duty to test apparatus frequented by invitees.

A resort keeper is under duty to protect invitees against injury from latent defects in frequented apparatus, and a failure to frequently and properly test such apparatus is not exercise of due care.

3. Negligence ⟸54—Resort owner responsible for safety of structures erected by predecessors.

An owner who has operated a resort for a month, but who visited place frequently for several years, is responsible for safety of structures erected by predecessors.

4. Negligence ⟸48—Resort owner liable for injury from decayed tree, though not knowing of decay.

Owner of a resort to which public is invited is liable for injury from collapse of tree used as an amusement place, though he did not know tree was decayed.

5. New trial ⟸70—Where verdict is only one under evidence, it should not be set aside and new trial ordered.

Where undisputed evidence shows verdict to have been only one possible, it should not have been set aside and new trial ordered under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 6, for insufficiency of evidence to justify verdict.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1015(3)—Order granting new trial reversed when no evidence on which to base contrary finding.

Though appellate court is reluctant to reverse order granting or refusing new trials, it will do so if it can find no evidence on which to base a contrary finding.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by Sarah M. Harvey against Eugene Machtig. From an order setting aside a verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Drapeau, Orr & Gardner, of Ventura, for appellant.

Michael F. Shannon, of Los Angeles, Charles F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Appellant sustained personal injuries while seated in an automobile which stood on the highway leading from the county thoroughfare to a public resort owned and conducted by respondent. For her damage thus sustained she instituted this action. A jury awarded her a verdict for $5,000, and on motion of respondent a new trial was granted by the lower court upon the ground that the evidence adduced was insufficient to justify or sustain the verdict. From the order setting aside the verdict and judgment and granting a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

Said resort is known as the Sulphur Mountain Springs, and immediately adjoins the main thoroughfare to Santa Paula, in the Ojai valley, Ventura county. At some distance back from the county road the respondent operated a large dining hall, dancing pavilion, swimming pool, cottages, and various amusements. Ingress and egress to and from these attractions were available by means of a driveway about 30 feet in width, for the passage of vehicles, along which highway or drive were situated concessions for the sale of refreshments, etc., which were under the independent management of lessees who paid respondent a percentage of their gross receipts as rental. On one side of respondent's said driveway stood a large black walnut tree, which was very old, the main trunk of which was trifurcated about 3½ feet above the roadbed. The total spread of the tree was shown to have been about 50 feet, one of its three trunks growing nearly perpendicularly, another sloping away from the highway, and the third, which caused the accident, about 3½ feet in diameter, extending out over the highway to a distance of about 30 feet. Across the fork, or space formed by the three trunks, and about 12 feet from the ground, a large platform had some years previously to respondent's purchase of the premises been constructed of logs, with a heavy railing or sidewall, and an improvised bench serving as a seat, also of logs, around three sides, all of which rested upon the three massive branches, and was fastened by a cable. Said platform was approximately 15 feet square, and to the open side a stairway about 5 feet wide, with banisters, was constructed from the ground at the side of the highway. Respondent testified that said platform was provided and maintained for the accommodation and amusement of patrons of his resort, and that it was "one of the show places of the resort," from which they could "look over the entire premises"; that his guests would use the tree for entertainment in connection with the resort.

About 15 feet to the north of this tree, which was estimated to have been 50 yards from the dining hall, Rogers and Harvey, copartners, operated one of the concessions. They sold soft drinks, confectionaries, and tobaccos. The highway from the public thoroughfare, through respondent's premises, to the principal amusement center, extended directly past said tree and stand, and was somewhat wider at this point than elsewhere along its course, its border reaching to the base of the tree. Respondent testified that "it swayed in that way to some extent," but that "there was a water faucet to prevent them driving next to the tree"; that before approaching the tree, and beyond it, were parking places for automobiles, one of which consisted of an acre of space, but that machines were accustomed to park along the driveway, and to pass under the tree; that "all laws of etiquette were violated by people, how to park or to act." He admitted, however, that he had not objected to such custom.

On the morning of July 20, 1921, George Harvey, one of the concessionaires last mentioned, made a reservation at respondent's dining room for an extra dinner for his grandmother, appellant herein, who resided at Santa Paula; he then proceeded to that city and purchased supplies for his concession, returning between the hours of 11 and 12 o'clock noon of the same day, with his wife and appellant in his automobile. Harvey drove to the side of the road, and stopped his machine under the tree in question. He and his wife alighted, taking their packages to the stand, and leaving appellant seated alone in the automobile. He testified that he stopped merely for a moment to unload a few supplies, intending to continue his course up the driveway to the dining room; that he did not enter his stand, but had just left the car and deposited his packages, and was starting back toward his machine, when he heard "a couple of little cracks," and saw the platform and tree trunk nearest the highway fall upon the machine. Appellant was severely injured in the crash, which necessitated the amputation of her left arm. She was 75 years old, and previously to the accident was paralyzed on the right side.

This action was commenced by complaint alleging that respondent's place of business was a public resort, and that all the roads and highways upon the premises thereof were open to the public, and were used for the accommodation and to facilitate the ingress and egress of its patrons; that the walnut tree overhanging said driveway was decayed and rotten and was unsafe; that the defendant knew it to be unsafe, and could easily and readily have discovered its dangerous condition by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence. The defendant joined issue upon the material allegations as to liability, but admitted that all of said roads and highways were open to the public, and were maintained by him to facilitate their ingress and egress; he alleged, however, that if said roads and highways within his said resort were used for accommodation of the public as averred by the plaintiff, they were so used without his consent or invitation, and merely under license of the owner, and alleged that if the plaintiff was injured as she contended, her own carelessness contributed to and was the proximate cause of such injury.

The evidence tended to show, and it was not denied, that the decay had progressed to a degree rendering it plainly visible to the casual observer; that the tree was as much a part of the public amusement resort as any other feature thereof; that the highway in question constituted the only means of passage into the grounds; and that appellant when injured was on her way in the automobile in the direct and only possible route from Santa Paula to respondent's public restaurant or dining hall, at the end of the driveway. It was shown that the tree fell on a calm, quiet summer day, when there was no wind, and that there was no one on the platform at the time. Seven witnesses called by the plaintiff testified regarding the condition of the tree, four of whom swore that it was decayed in the roots that protruded above the ground, some of them saying that from the platform above, a badly decayed spot in the crotch could also be seen, and some of them testified that when on the platform they found the tree "shaky," and came down. The witness Rogers testified that before the tree fell there was a spot of decay on one side about 4 inches by 6 inches, plainly visible from the ground, and it was further shown the hole was so large that people playing games were accustomed to place their horseshoes therein. Rogers photographed the tree after the accident, and inspected it; he testified that it had been supported by a thin shell but a few inches thick, and that four-fifths of the trunk was dead, the heart being gone. All of said seven witnesses testified that until about July 1, 1921, there had been a sign about 18 inches long nailed to the trees or stairway, bearing the words "Danger, Keep Out," or "Danger, Keep Off," and which some witnesses claimed to have seen there as late as July 4th. Respondent admitted that he had heard about the sign, but he strenuously denied having seen it or ordered it removed; he testified that he had carefuly inspected the platform, but that he had never investigated to ascertain the condition of the tree; that nearly every evening he saw people on the platform, and that on one occasion there were as many as 50 people upon it at the same time.

It is not contended that the evidence was not sufficient to establish the facts presented, but it is insisted that, conceding all of said facts to be true, they did not constitute grounds upon which the respondent would be liable for damages, since he did not know that the tree was decayed, did not order Harvey to stop on his way up the driveway, and was not chargeable with the duty to ascertain that the tree was dangerous; wherefore, it is maintained, these facts established proof of carelessness of Harvey, and contributory negligence of the plaintiff who had intrusted herself to his care. It is argued that the automobile in which appellant was seated when injured had been "parked" on the side of the highway leading to respondent's resort, without right. The court below entertained and repeatedly expressed the same view, ruling that "the defendant cannot be held for something that he did not know."

[1] It is at once inconsistent and futile to attempt the application of two incompatible principles of law to the same state of facts, by asserting on the one hand that the public, invited to traverse the sole means of approach to a public resort, were invited patrons, and on the other hand that they should be deemed and treated legally as trespassers or mere licensees if injured by the collapse of a defective device which constituted one of the attractions of such resort. Appellant was not in charge of the automobile, and whether or not it should stop, and if so where, were questions not left to her judgment. The highway was wider at this point, but it was used by the public generally, without objection, and it cannot be said that because Harvey was a concessionaire and was induced to frequent the place by causes concurred in by respondent, he should be denied privileges which were constantly extended to all other persons. The effect of respondent's argument is that the breaking of a defective attraction at his resort, with which neither Harvey nor the appellant had any concern, would be no fault of respondent if his concessionaire, in bringing him business, should incidentally interrupt the performance of that errand to facilitate the operation of the concession. Harvey testified that he invariably left his machine at that point when returning with supplies; and in this he followed the custom of those who patronized "one of the show places of the resort."

Respondent insists that the case falls within the rule announced in Means v. Southern California R. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 P. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206, wherein it was said that "the plaintiff was not on the freight house premises to obtain any package from Wells Fargo & Co.; he had changed his mind about going to that office; * * *" and in Polk v. Laurel Hill Cemetery Ass'n, 37 Cal. App. 624, 174 P. 414, in which it was said, "We have found no support for any rule which would protect those who go where they are not invited, but merely with express or tacit permission, from curiosity or motives of private convenience, in no way connected with business or their relations with the occupant;" and he quotes with assurance from Kennedy v. Chase, 119 Cal. 637, 52 P. 33, 63 Am. St. Rep. 153, as follows:

"The duty of the owner in such a case has relation to the object for which the right of entry is extended, and is limited to responsibility for the condition of that portion of the premises required for the purpose of the visit; it does not impose liability for the want of safety at a point without those limits, and where the injured party was neither invited nor expected to go." (Italics supplied.)

But the injured party here was on her way to respondent's dining room for the noonday meal, was on a part of the respondent's highway running through his resort, at a point continuously used by others when there for the same purpose; she was not there without invitation, nor for curiosity or motives of private convenience, unconnected with respondent's business. The authorities cited do not apply to the facts presented.

[2] It was respondent's duty to protect those whom he invited against injury from latent defects in contrivances maintained upon the premises which they were expected to frequent. To use and keep in operation a device or apparatus upon which the safety of human life depends, without it being frequently or properly tested as to its continued strength and efficiency to meet the purposes for which used, is not such reasonable care as a prudent man should take to guard the safety of those intrusted to his protection. Burke v. State, 64 Misc. Rep. 558, 119 N. Y. S. 1089.

[3] Respondent had been operating the resort but about one month when the accident occurred; but he had visited it for years, and had done so frequently from 1919 until he took possession. When he assumed control he became responsible for the safety of structures erected by his predecessors. Palmore

v. Morris, 182 Pa. 82, 37 A. 995, 61 Am. St. Rep. 693. If the contingency were such that a secret cause of danger might grow and increase and yet be hidden, it could not be assumed that, as matter of law, the defendant was not bound to do anything except use ordinary means to ascertain when danger was imminent and imperilled the safety of passers-by. Vosper v. New York, 49 N. Y. Super. Ct. 296. The dangerous condition of the tree was observed by others, and the fact that it was decayed, and that it fell on a calm, clear day, is indisputable evidence that it had been in the process of disintegration for so long a time that its impending fall should have been anticipated by the respondent. Lundy v. Sedalia, 162 Mo. App. 218, 144 S. W. 889; Rapho & West Hempfield Township v. Moore, 68 Pa. 404, 8 Am. Rep. 202.

Accepting, as we should, the strongest view of the case which the facts permit, in favor of the lower court's action in ordering a new trial—that appellant was in the care of a concessionaire, whose duty it was to proceed directly to her destination, that he stopped at one of the attractions, on one side of the principal driveway, and that this was unnecessary, and conceding that respondent was ignorant of the constant danger at that point—eliminating evidence which may have been conflicting—the result would be the same. If it were shown that Harvey had control of the defective amusement as a part of his concession, though this is not even intimated by respondent, still the latter would not be relieved from the duties and obligations incident to control of the entire resort. In Johnstone v. Panama-Pacific Int. Expos. Co., 187 Cal. 323, 202 P. 34, the complaint alleged that the plaintiff, a visitor within the exposition grounds was injured by an electric carriage belonging to a concessionaire while passing to another portion of the premises. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and upon appeal from such order the Supreme Court, quoting with approval from Thornton v. Maine State Agr. Soc., 97 Me. 108, 53 A. 979, 94 Am. St. Rep. 488, said:

"It is too well settled to need the citation of authorities that, if the owner or occupier of land either directly or by implication induces persons to come upon his premises, he thereby assumes an obligation to see that such premises are in a reasonably safe condition, so that the persons there by his invitation may not be injured by them or in their use for the purpose for which the invitation was extended.

"Therefore, having invited the public to its fair, it was the duty of the defendant to use reasonable care to keep its grounds, and the usual approaches to them, so far as the approaches were under its control, in a safe condition, safe for all who were invited. * * * The defendant would not be relieved from this duty by leasing portions of its grounds to the proprietors of shows and attractions, and becoming their landlord. As between it and the invited public, the duty still remained of using reasonable care to see that all of the exhibition grounds were safe. * * * Even if it be true, as respondent insists, that there was no duty, as matter of law, resting upon it to provide separate thoroughfares for vehicles and pedestrians, there was a duty imposed upon respondent to use ordinary care to keep its grounds, including the thoroughfares, in a safe condition for its invitees, and the complaint alleged that respondent was under this duty. * * * As was held in Whyte v. Idora Park Co., [29 Cal. App. 342, 155 P. 1018] supra, and the other cases we have quoted, the fact that the injury was inflicted by a concessionaire and not by the proprietor would not relieve the latter of responsibility for the negligent acts which resulted in the injury, and as was declared in Thornton v. Maine State Agr. Society, supra, it was the company's duty to use reasonable care 'both in the original letting of space, and in the subsequent inspection and supervision' of the concession." (Italics inserted.)

[4] It is contended by respondent that if he did not know that the tree was decaying, he could not be expected to guard against its possible collapse. But we are cited to no authority so holding upon facts even approaching in resemblance those here presented. Under the evidence adduced in the case at bar, it becomes apparent that to apply such a rule would possibly require that civil liability would arise only upon evidence strongly tending to show criminal negligence of the proprietor. But such is not the length to which an injured patron must go in order to recover for damage sustained at a resort which is thrown open to the public, and to which he is both impliedly and expressly invited. The rule announced in the case from which we have quoted is recognized and applied generally. Hollis v. Kansas City, Missouri, Retail Merch. Ass'n, 205 Mo. 508, 103 S. W. 32, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 284; Texas State Fair v. Brittain, 118 F. 713, 56 C. C. A. 499; Texas State Fair v. Marti, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 132, 69 S. W. 432; Richmond & M. R. Co. v. Moore, 94 Va. 493, 27 S. E. 70, 37 L. R. A. 258; Thompson v. Lowell, L. & H. St. R. Co., 170 Mass. 577, 49 N. E. 913, 40 L. R. A. 345, 64 Am. St. Rep. 323; Graffam v. Saco Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, 112 Me. 508, 92 A. 649, L. R. A. 1915C, 632. In most of the cases here cited the offending object or apparatus was shown to have even been in the possession, control, and management of a concessionaire, but in each instance the proprietor of the resort was held to have been charged with the duty to inspect and to guard against injury to patrons drawn thereto by the general enterprise. The tree in controversy here, however, was of no concern to Harvey, but was admittedly under the exclusive custody, control, and management of the proprietor, respondent herein.

[5] Section 657, subd. 6, of the Code of Civil Procedure, provides that a new trial may be granted upon the grounds of "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, or that it is against law." It must be conceded that if the undisputed facts in the instant case show the verdict and judgment rendered to have been the only result warranted by the evidence—and the authorities cited impel us to that conclusion—in such event the verdict was not, as held by the court below, unsupported by the evidence nor against law, and should not have been set aside and a new trial ordered.

[6] We are not unmindful of the reluctance with which appellate courts reverse orders granting or refusing new trials, nor of the rule that a trial court in passing upon such a motion is not bound by the findings of the jury if there is sufficient evidence to sustain a contrary finding. Huckaby v. Northam (Cal. App.) 228 P. 717. Where, as here, however, there is no evidence upon which a contrary finding could be founded, the order granting a new trial cannot be sustained upon appeal. As was said in Huckaby v. Northam, supra, in which an order granting a new trial as to certain defendants was upheld upon the ground that as to them the evidence was conflicting, but was reversed as to others:

"The evidence shows clearly that the other defendants have no interest in the property. The order granting a new trial was therefore erroneous as to such defendants."

The order granting a new trial and vacating and setting aside the verdict and judgment is therefore reversed.

PEOPLE v. OROSCO. (Cr. 1172.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 13, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⟸655(1)—Use of word "murder" by trial judge in reference to offense held error.

In prosecution for murder, reference by trial judge in presence of jury to offense as "murder" was error.

2. Criminal law ⟸656(9)—Remark of trial judge in admitting evidence that it was remote held invasion of province of jury.

In prosecution for murder, where claim of self-defense lay in evidence concerning difficulty between accused and deceased about a year prior to killing, remark by trial judge, in admitting in evidence stipulation as to what absent witness would testify concerning such prior difficulty if present, that it was remote, invaded province of jury.

3. Criminal law ⟸656(6, 9)—Remark of trial judge as to importance as evidence of accused's coat, slashed by deceased in former fight, and as to knowledge of witness, held error.

In prosecution for murder, in which accused's claim of self-defense lay in evidence concerning difficulty about one year prior to killing, on offer of testimony that witness took slashed coat which was received in evidence away from accused, remarks of court indicating that such coat was of no importance, and that witness knew nothing as to how cuts were made, were prejudicial as interfering with explanation of how damaged coat had been preserved instead of being discarded.

4. Criminal law ⟸1166½(12)—Remark of trial judge, that there was no appearance of contradiction in coroner's inquest because such inquest had not been proven, held, if error, harmless.

In prosecution for murder, where state's witness on cross-examination was asked for purpose of impeachment, if he had testified at coroner's inquest that he could not point out person who did shooting because it was dark, statement of trial judge that there was no appearance of contradiction, because coroner's inquest had not yet been proven, if error, was harmless, where it was not denied that accused fired fatal shot.

5. Witnesses ⟸388(7)—Not necessary to show transcript of testimony is authentic before reading question to witness for purpose of impeachment.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, relating to impeachment of witness by evidence of his statements at other times inconsistent with testimony, even if such statements are in writing, circumstances of time, place, and parties present must be stated to witness before writing is shown, and proof that such writing is authentic is not necessary.

6. Witnesses ⟸388(2)—To impeach witness by inconsistent statement, oral contradictory statement must be recited to him, and his answer as to whether he made it obtained, before others may testify concerning it.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, relating to impeachment of witnesses by contradictory statements, any oral contradictory statement claimed to have been made by witness must be recited to him, and his answer must be obtained as to whether he made it, before others may testify concerning it.

7. Criminal law ⟸655(5)—Statement of trial judge that procedure of accused's attorney in impeaching witness was bad, etc., held prejudicial error.

In prosecution for murder, in which accused's attorney attempted to impeach state's witness by proof of contradictory statement made by him at coroner's inquest, by reading question from transcript of coroner's inquest, and asking if witness had made such statement, prior to proof that written transcript thereof was authentic, remarks of trial judge that it was bad practice, that it was prejudicial, and that question asked by counsel shows iniquity of such method was prejudicial error.

8. Homicide ⇐188(1)—Question whether deceased had been in habit of drinking intoxicants held improper.

In prosecution for murder, where deceased's widow testified for state at stage of trial prior to proof of attack by deceased on accused one year before killing, when deceased was intoxicated, sustaining objection to question on cross-examination whether deceased had habit of drinking intoxicating liquor was proper.

9. Criminal law ⇐861—Refusal to permit jurors to smell and taste contents of bottle which fell out of deceased's pocket soon after shooting held not error.

In prosecution for murder, where no evidence had been presented that attack by deceased on accused about one year before killing was while deceased was intoxicated, refusal to permit jurors to taste and smell contents of bottle which fell out of deceased's pocket shortly after killing, to determine whether it held intoxicating liquor, was not error.

10. Homicide ⇐174(1)—Evidence that deceased's friends stoned automobile carrying passengers to notify police of killing held inadmissible to prove conspiracy to take accused's life.

In prosecution for murder, where theory of defense was that deceased and his friends had come to place of killing to take life of accused, evidence that automobile carrying messengers to telephone for police shortly after killing was stoned by persons who had come with deceased to scene of killing was not admissible to prove alleged conspiracy to kill accused.

11. Criminal law ⇐829(5)—Refusal of instruction as to self-defense held error.

In prosecution for murder, refusal of instruction, that one when attacked may stand his ground and defend himself and may pursue his adversary until he has secured himself from danger, on ground that it was covered by other instructions given, was error, regardless of instruction that party assailed may repel force by force to any extent which to him is apparently necessary, acting in reasonable manner.

12. Homicide ⇐300(3)—Refusal of instruction that jury could consider prior relations between accused and deceased as determining their state of mind at time of shooting held error.

In prosecution for murder, refusal of instruction that jury could consider evidence of previous difficulties between deceased and accused to determine their state of mind at time of shooting, in view of remarks of trial judge, was error.

13. Criminal law ⇐776(5)—Refusal of instruction that evidence of good character of accused aided general presumption of innocence, and might generate reasonable doubt sufficient for acquittal, held error.

In prosecution for murder, in which accused introduced testimony that his reputation for peace and quiet was good, refusal to instruct that evidence of good character aided general presumption of innocence and might generate reasonable doubt was error.

14. Homicide ⇐117—When killing in self-defense justifiable stated.

To justify killing in self-defense it must not only appear to accused as reasonable man that he had reason to believe and did believe that he was in danger of his life or of receiving great bodily harm, but it must also appear to his comprehension, as reasonable man, that to avoid such danger it was absolutely necessary to take life of deceased.

15. Homicide ⇐300(11)—Instruction that accused seeking quarrel could not set up self-defense was erroneous as not sustained by evidence.

In prosecution for murder, where there was no evidence that accused sought quarrel with deceased, instruction that one seeking quarrel with design to force deadly issue cannot defend on ground of self-defense was error.

16. Criminal law ⇐829(1)—Refusal of requested instruction as to prejudicial statements of trial judge held error.

In prosecution for murder, where trial judge referred to attempted impeachment of witness for state by reading from transcript of testimony at coroner's inquest before proving authenticity of transcript as iniquitous, refusal of instruction that such reference was not intended to reflect discredit on counsel for accused or accused, nor was jury to infer therefrom that judge had any opinion of facts in case, was error, regardless of other instructions.

17. Criminal law ⇐660, 728(2)—If judge makes damaging comment in presence of jury, or if district attorney takes course having like effect, counsel of injured party should ask judge to admonish jury.

Where judge makes damaging comment in presence of jury during trial, or where district attorney takes course which has like effect, counsel of injured party has duty to give judge opportunity to obviate possibility of harm by admonishing jury, if misconduct of either judge or district attorney is such that its effect may be removed by admonition.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Jos. Orosco was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Wm. T. Aggeler, Public Defender, and G. A. Benedict, Deputy Public Defender, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendant was charged with the murder of one Nicolas Rios by shooting. He admitted the killing, but contended that the act was done in self-defense. He was convicted of murder in the second degree, and appeals from the judgment of conviction.

[1] The first point made by appellant for a reversal of the judgment is that the trial judge, in the presence of the jury and during the trial, referred to the killing of Rios as "the murder." It is contended that the remark tended to prejudice the rights of appellant in the minds of the jurors. The use of the word to which objection is made came about in this manner: Appellant's counsel had offered evidence concerning an event which occurred after the shooting of Rios, whereupon the judge, without objection having been made by opposing counsel, asked the question: "What is the use of taking up time with an episode that happened after the murder?" In discussing the point thus presented by the record appellant cites a long list of cases to the proposition that the presiding judge in a criminal case should not, directly or indirectly, assume or hypothetically suggest the guilt of the defendant. Particular reliance is placed on People v. Williams, 17 Cal. 142. That was a murder case, and during his charge to the jury the trial judge referred to the person who had been slain as "his victim," that is, as the victim of the defendant on trial. The Supreme Court said:

"We are not disposed to criticize language very closely in order to reverse a judgment of this sort, but it is apparent that in a case of conflicting proofs, even an equivocal expression coming from the judge, may be fatal to the prisoner. When the deceased is referred to as 'a victim,' the impression is naturally created that some unlawful power or dominion had been exerted over his person. And it was nearly equivalent, in effect, to an expression characterizing the defendant as a criminal. The court should not, directly or indirectly, assume the guilt of the accused, nor employ equivocal phrases which may leave such an impression. The experience of every lawyer shows the readiness with which a jury frequently catch at intimations of the court, and the great deference which they pay to the opinions and suggestions of the presiding judge, especially in a closely balanced case, when they can thus shift the responsibility of a decision of the issue from themselves to the court. A word, a look, or a tone may sometimes, in such cases, be of great or even controlling influence. A judge cannot be too cautious in a criminal trial in avoiding all interference with the conclusions of the jury upon the facts; for of this matter, under our system, they are the exclusive judges."

We are convinced that the use of the word "murder" by the judge in the present case comes within the condemnation embraced in this language, although, in our opinion, the word was not as objectionable as the one with which fault is found in the opinion from which quotation is made. There is room for the supposition here that the jury understood at the time that the judge intended by the use of the objectionable word merely to refer to the killing; and that appellant killed Rios is admitted. The possibility of such a supposition is minimized, however, by the fact that, as a matter of course, the judge told the jury in his final instructions, in effect, that murder is a crime. The jury was therefore notified of the difference between a murder and a killing, and it is quite likely that in the last analysis the judge's use of the word to which objection is made left an impression unfavorable to appellant in the minds of the members of the trial body. It appears, then, that the word should not have been used, and that its employment was error. This untoward circumstance, standing alone, is not of great moment, and it is given such extended notice principally because the judge, throughout the trial, let fall other expressions which could not but have been injurious, each in some degree, either lesser or greater, to the rights of appellant. This occurrence was but one of a chain of events of a similar character, and as such it is to be considered when we come to view, as we must, the various errors of the court in applying to the cause the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. Respondent points out that no exception was taken at the time to the trial judge's use of the word "murder," and no admonition was asked to be given to the jury concerning it. This circumstance will be considered when we later pass upon the action of the judge in refusing certain instructions asked by appellant.

[2] A part of appellant's claim at the trial that the killing of Rios was in self-defense lay in evidence concerning a difficulty between him and Rios which occurred about a year prior to the shooting. According to this testimony, Rios, on the occasion mentioned and while he was in an intoxicated condition, made a vicious assault upon appellant in a certain poolroom. The person of appellant was uninjured during the assault, except for a slight cut on the head, but a coat worn by him was slashed in several places by means of a knife or dagger in the hands of Rios, so much so that it was unfit for further use. It was stipulated in writing during the trial that a certain person who was confined to his bed by illness and who was therefore unable to be present in court as a witness might be deemed to have testified to certain matters concerning this poolroom altercation. When the stipulation was offered in evidence objection was made to it by the district attorney. In ruling upon the objection the trial judge said:

"Well, I think it is remote, but I am going to overrule the objection. I will permit it to be read to the jury."

It is contended that the judge's remark that the evidence was remote was error, and the point is well taken. It is settled that evidence of the character now under discussion, offered for the purpose for which this was offered, is admissible even if remote in point of time; in short, that the objection that it is remote goes to its weight and not to its admissibility. People v. Brown, 76 Cal. 573, 18 P. 678; People v. Wilson, 23 Cal. App. 513, 138 P. 971. The remark of the judge to which exception is taken was therefore an invasion of the province of the jury, as that body is the sole judge of the weight of evidence. Here again, as in the instance of the point of which we have above made disposition, respondent calls attention to the fact that at the immediate time of the court's remark no objection was made, and no admonition to the jury was asked. This circumstance will later be considered.

[3] Still having in mind the poolroom episode, the mutilated coat was produced at the trial and was received in evidence. It came from the custody of one Serra and his wife, with whom appellant lived at the time of the occurrence. There was testimony that appellant at the time came home with the slashed garment on, and Serra testified that he then took the coat from appellant. The record then shows this:

"Q. Now, what did you mean when you said you took the coat away from Orosco?

"The Court: I don't think I would spend any more time on that coat. I don't think he saw the cuts that were made.

"Mr. Fulcher [counsel for defendant]: We will connect it up.

"The Court: So far I think it has been a waste of time, all about the coat, so far as I can tell.

"Mr. Fulcher: We will show, of course—

"The Court: If you can show by somebody who saw it. He didn't see the cuts made.

"Mr. Fulcher: We were identifying it as Orosco's coat.

"The Court: Well, Orosco must have told him it was his coat. How does he know?

"Mr. Fulcher: If he saw it on him; he testified he saw it on him.

"The Court: We are going far afield on this thing. I expected he would know something as to the cuts made."

The remarks of the judge shown by this excerpt from the record were erroneous and prejudicial. It was most material for appellant to explain how the damaged garment had been preserved for a year, instead of having been consigned to the limbo of discarded clothing, and how, after that length of time, he was able to produce it at the trial. The testimony of Serra tended to make clear this circumstance, which otherwise would have perplexed the jury. The remarks of the judge must have materially interfered with this clearing up process. Moreover, certain of his observations tended to discredit in the eyes of the members of the jury the entire poolroom episode as an item in the defense of appellant that the homicide was justifiable. These particular remarks were:

"So far I think it has been a waste of time, all about the coat, so far as I can tell. * * * We are going far afield on this thing."

These observations of the judge made a substantial addition to his remark that the poolroom occurrence was remote. Here again, as in the case of the points already discussed, appellant at the time took no exception to the comments of the judge, and asked no admonition to the jury concerning them.

[4] During the trial appellant's counsel sought to lay a foundation for the impeachment of a certain witness for the prosecution. He asked the witness if he testified at the coroner's inquest held over the body of Rios, and the answer was in the affirmative. He then asked if the witness had given certain answers to questions propounded to him at the inquest and if the questions were answered. Then the following occurred:

"Mr. Fulcher: Now, your honor, I have some more cumulative matter along exactly the same line, at the preliminary hearing.

"The Court: You mean for impeachment?

"Mr. Fulcher: For the same purpose. It is cumulative of the coroner's inquest; in other words, it contradicts his testimony here.

"The Court: There isn't any appearance of a contradiction yet in the coroner's inquest, because you haven't proven the coroner's inquest yet."

It is contended that this statement of the judge was error, and, in order to state the point completely, it becomes necessary to refer further to the record. The witness on the stand had accompanied Rios to the place where the latter met his death at the hands of appellant. When they arrived appellant was seated on a certain bench, and immediately upon the arrival the life of Rios was taken. The witness testified on his direct examination that as he and Rios and others approached he saw appellant seated on the bench, and that he saw him "get up" from it. On cross-examination the witness was asked if a certain question was put to him at the coroner's inquest and if he gave a certain answer to it. The following were the question and answer:

"Q. Point out the man who done the shooting in the room. A. I can't point him out, because I couldn't see him in the dark; I know it was a person who got up."

As to whether he had so testified the witness answered:

"Maybe I did, if it is written there."

This matter in the record closely precedes the statement of the judge to which exception is taken, and the statement referred in part to it. We need not decide, however, whether the remark of the judge was erroneous, as it related to what turned out, upon the presentation of the evidence for the defense, to be an immaterial circumstance. It was in fact appellant who arose from the bench. Moreover, it transpired that there was to be no controversy in the case as to who fired the fatal shot. As the remark of the judge could have affected a determination of that question alone, the error committed by him, if error there was, harmed appellant not at all. The fact that the evidence for the defense was devoted solely to a showing that appellant shot Rios in self-defense rendered innocuous any harm which might otherwise have lurked in the comment of the court.

[5] Other unfortunate occurrences arose through attempts of appellant's counsel to impeach witnesses by showing statements made by them at the coroner's inquest which were claimed to be contradictory of their testimony at the trial. These occurrences, three or four in number, were of a similar character and will be treated together. The following transpired when one of the witnesses for the prosecution was under cross-examination:

"Q. I want to show you a part of your testimony, page 16 of the coroner's inquest, beginning at line 1. The question to which he gives the answer is on page 15, at line 30, and I ask you if you so testified at the coroner's inquest.

"The Court: Ask him first if he recollects testifying at the coroner's inquest. A. Some of the words I remember testifying, and then others I don't remember. * * *

"Q. Do you remember testifying at the coroner's inquest over the body of Nick Rios at the day and date given on the front of that? A. Yes. * * *

"Mr. Ryan [a deputy district attorney]: Is this for the purpose of impeachment?

"Mr. Fulcher: It certainly is."

The district attorney then made the objection that:

"It is not impeachment, and if it be impeachment it is impeachment upon a collateral matter, and * * * that there is no evidence that this is a true and accurate copy of the coroner's inquest."

Then came this:

"The Court: He says part of it he remembers, and part of it he does not remember. Until you have shown this is an authentic copy—

"Mr. Fulcher: Your honor, I think impeachment by the coroner's inquest is the same as impeachment by any other oral person.

"The Court: No; except word for word. He says these things he does not remember. You undertook to read word for word. You cannot read it until you prove he did say it.

"Mr. Fulcher: My contention is this: I have a right to ask him if he did so testify, giving him the exact words.

"The Court: You have; nobody objected to that.

"Mr. Fulcher: I haven't been permitted to ask him that. There is nothing in the record to show what the question is on which the ruling is made. * * *

"The Court: Will you indicate the line on this page that you want for the record, and then I will read them?

"Mr. Fulcher: If I find an authority on that, will your honor consider it, on the question of reading the transcript?

"The Court: If you can find it. It is bad practice. It has been, as I understand the authority, not to read a transcript to the jury and have it afterwards held to be of no effect, unless it is reversible error; and I won't allow it.

"If it is reversible error, I will. I think it is such an iniquitous practice, until the Supreme Court say so, I will not do it. * * * I will not let it go to the jury and then afterwards rule it is immaterial, and should not go to the jury, and waste the time of the court, and in my opinion it is prejudicial."

After a further colloquy between the judge and Mr. Fulcher, the following transpired:

"The Court: I will permit you to ask the question, beginning line 30, the bottom of page 15. * * * You had better ask him if he remembers that particular part, but I take it that is what you wanted to show. I will permit you to read the whole of it. * * *

"Mr. Ryan: What about my * * * objection on the ground this transcript has not been shown to be authentic?

"The Court: He can ask whether at a certain time he made a certain statement, irrespective of the transcript. That is, I understand, what he proposes to do now.

"Mr. Fulcher: That is the purpose, your honor.

"Q. Now, I will ask you if the following question was put to you at the coroner's inquest."

The assumed question was then stated, and further queries concerning alleged questions put and answers made at the inquest were propounded to the witness. A somewhat similar chain of circumstances presented itself when another witness for the prosecution was under cross-examination. It was sought to impeach the witness by showing that he had made at the coroner's inquest, statements contradictory of testimony given by him on direct examination at the trial, and several questions had been put to him for the purpose of laying a foundation for the impeachment. Then:

"Mr. Ryan: At this time I move all the questions and answers be stricken from the record until it is shown this testimony was taken at the coroner's inquest.

"Mr. Fulcher: That is a matter of proof on the part of the defendant, proving the remainder of our case. If he says he don't know whether he testified or not, we will prove he did so testify.

"The Court: The question shows the iniquity of that method, because it does not appear here you will show it.

"Mr. Fulcher: If we don't prove it—

"The Court: I understand, but it has gone before the jury."

The attitude of the judge upon the legal question involved in these quotations from the record was incorrect. The counsel was following exactly the course required when an attempt is made to impeach a witness by showing that he has made statements out of court which are contradictory of his testimony given in court. Section 2052 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads:

"A witness may * * * be impeached by evidence that he has made, at other times, statements inconsistent with his present testimony; but before this can be done the statements must be related to him, with the circumstances of times, places, and persons present, and he must be asked whether he made such statements, and if so, allowed to explain them. If the statements be in writing, they must be shown to the witness before any question is put to him concerning them."

The decided cases do not add to the requirements of this section the rule that alleged contradictory statements which are in writing must be proven to be "authentic" before they can be shown to the witness who is sought to be impeached, nor do we think that reason requires such a step. In all instances, under the mandate of section 2052, before an attempted impeachment may be made complete, the witness sought to be impeached must be made acquainted "with the circumstances of times, places, and persons present" when it is claimed the contradictory statements were made, and they must be "related" to him. So far the requirements of the section may be said to be general. After this general provision the Legislature has added the special requirement that if the "statements be in writing, they must be shown to the witness before any question is put to him concerning them." This special mandate of the section is not operative until the general requirement is complied with. That is, even when the alleged statements are in writing, the circumstances of time, place, and parties present must be stated to the witness, and, logically, they must be stated before the writing is shown. After that is done, the special provision of the section operates, and the witness, having been made acquainted with the circumstances of time, place and persons present, and having seen the alleged contradictory statements on paper, may be asked whether he made them. This is all that the statute by its letter requires, and the witness has had before him everything that in fairness could be required for the purpose of refreshing his recollection and putting him on his guard. He is fully armed and warned. Whether or not the transcript which is presented to him is "authentic" is not necessary to his enlightenment. Certain definite statements are presented to him, with all the circumstances under which it is claimed that they were made, and he is given fair opportunity to say, at his peril, it is true, whether he made them. If he says he did not, the very statements which have been exhibited to him must be proven in substance, either by a showing that the transcript of his statements is "authentic," that is, that a stenographer was in attendance when he made the statements, and that he was accurately reported, or by the testimony of those who were present at the time. We are convinced that if a court should require that the authenticity of the transcript be proven in advance of the time when the witness is impeached, the requirement would be an addition to the statute and not a construction of it and would be a work of judicial legislation.

[6] In connection with what has been said above, it is to be observed that the trial judge in the present instance did not take the view that the "authenticity" of the transcript of the testimony before the coroner must be shown in order to enlighten the witness in view of his threatened impeachment. The judge took the ground that if the transcript were not so supported something improper might get before the jury. That position was untenable. The danger which the judge feared is one which is incident to every attempt to impeach a witness by showing statements out of court which contradict his testimony. Under what we have termed the general provision of section 2052, any oral contradictory statement claimed to have been made by a witness must be recited to him, and his answer must be obtained as to whether he made it before others may testify concerning it. The only relief from the danger apprehended by the judge, whether the asserted contradictory statements are oral or written, is to remove their injurious effect, if there be any, by admonition and instruction in the event that there is in the last analysis no evidence that they were made.

As we have already remarked, there is no authority for the position taken by the trial judge on the subject now under examination. There are a number of cases in which the question arose as to whether a sufficient foundation was laid for an impeachment by means of contradictory statements made at preliminary examinations. In them the rule directly prescribed by section 2052 is stated and nothing more; that is, it is said that before a witness may be impeached the alleged contradictory statements must be shown or read to him. People v. Ching Hing Chang, 74 Cal. 389, 16 P. 201; People v. Dillwood, 4 Cal. Unrep. 973, 39 P. 438; People v. Hawley, 111 Cal. 78, 43 P. 404; People v. Lambert, 120 Cal. 170, 52 P. 307. Of course, as indicated in one of these opinions, that in People v. Hawley, the authenticity and correctness of the transcript must be shown before it may be used for the final purpose of impeaching the witness. The sufficiency of the foundation for impeachment has arisen in cases in which the alleged impeaching statements were made at previous trials of the causes in which the witnesses later testified, and in those cases also only the rule expressly stated in section 2052 is set forth (People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 317, 20 P. 719; Doudell v. Shoo, 20 Cal. App. 424, 129 P. 478; People v. Fitzgerald, 138 Cal. 39, 70 P. 1014); and statements made in an unsigned deposition have been put in the same category by another decision (Lanigan

v. Neely, 4 Cal. App. 760, 89 P. 441). As far as we are able to discover, questions touching impeachment where the alleged contradictory statements are made at a coroner's inquest have been considered in this state but once (People v. Devine, 44 Cal. 452), and it seems to appear from the report of the case that the transcript of the proceedings at the inquest was not shown to the witness who was sought to be impeached, as it is said that she was "asked" whether she had made the alleged contradictory statements. The decision turned upon the question whether the transcript contained a report of a proceeding judicial in character and therefore admissible for the purpose of impeaching the witness, due foundation having been laid. The Supreme Court decided that it was such a report, and reversed the judgment for the reason that the trial court had excluded the transcript. If this decision has not been overturned, as to the exact point determined by it, by Mar Shee v. Maryland Assurance Corp., 190 Cal. 1, 210 P. 269, a transcript of the proceedings at a coroner's inquest would seem to be governed by the provisions of section 2052, like a transcript of proceedings at a preliminary examination, but if it has been overruled by the late case noted, it is possible that such a transcript is not to be viewed as containing statements "in writing" of the witness testifying at the inquest, as that term is used in the special provision contained in section 2052. It has been held in one case that a statement made by one to the police and by the latter reduced to writing is not a statement "in writing," under the section, of the party who makes the statement. People v. Glaze, 139 Cal. 154, 72 P. 965. See, also, People v. Talman, 26 Cal. App. 348, 146 P. 1063. If the statements made at the inquest here were not statements in writing, as that term is employed in the section, they need not have been "shown" to the witnesses whose impeachment was desired, and it would have been sufficient, of course, merely to have asked whether the statements were made. While the exact question which we now discuss has never been decided in this state, the procedure which we have above outlined as being proper seems actually to have been followed in People v. Morine, 61 Cal. 367, a case in which the alleged contradictory statements were made at an earlier trial of the cause in which the impeached witness was on the stand. After an "effort had been made by the defense to impeach the witness * * * by showing that he had testified on a former trial of this case to a state of facts different from that stated by him on the second trial," and while the evidence of the defendant was being produced, the reporter who had been in attendance at the first trial was placed on the stand. It was shown by him that his transcript of that trial was "authentic," and he testified to the making of the contradictory statements. We are satisfied that the attitude of the trial judge here in making his remarks concerning the practice followed by appellant's counsel was based upon an incorrect understanding of the law.

[7] We have not discussed the legal question arising under section 2052 for the purpose of imputing error to the trial court in any ruling which he made involving it. No such error is claimed. It appears that appellant at last succeeded in getting before the witnesses the various questions he desired to propound to them through the expedient, apparently devised by the judge, of "asking" them, but not "word for word" from the alleged record, whether they had made the asserted contradictory statements. It is contended, however, that the judge erred in saying in the presence of the jury concerning the course being taken by appellant's counsel, that "it is bad practice," that "it is such an iniquitous practice," that "it is prejudicial," and that a question asked by counsel "shows the iniquity of that method." These expressions, strong as they were, would have been of doubtful propriety if the judge had been correct in his view of the law, and if it had become necessary for him to halt counsel in the course he attempted to take, albeit by remarks of a more temperate character. We have been at pains to examine the question of law which counsel and judge debated, upon the theory that the error of the latter was the greater if he were wrong in his view of the law and if counsel were right. We are satisfied that the judge injured materially the defense of appellant by the character of rebuke he administered when not even a mild rebuke was deserved. He held appellant's counsel up to the jury as one who, in an endeavor to win his cause, would resort to iniquitous practices. In fact, he in effect accused the counsel of pettifogging, and he accused him unjustly. His course must have lessened appellant's chances of acquittal. It is to be observed here again, that no exception was taken to the remarks of the court at the time they were made, and that no admonition was asked concerning them.

[8] The widow of Rios testified for the prosecution. On her cross-examination she was shown a half-pint bottle containing a white or yellowish fluid, and was asked whether she had seen it in her husband's possession when he left home immediately preceding his death. She replied that she had not. She was then asked whether Rios was in the habit of drinking intoxicating liquor. An objection to the question was interposed, and the objection was sustained. It is contended that the ruling was error. This occurrence was at a stage of the trial which preceded what we have above termed the poolroom episode, during which, it will be remembered, Rios, while intoxicated, had made a vicious assault upon appellant. The court had no knowledge, when the question was put to Mrs. Rios, that appellant had ever had trouble with the deceased when the latter was in a state of intoxication, or that he knew anything about the habits of deceased in that regard. Whether the question put to Mrs. Rios would have been proper if it had come after the evidence concerning the trouble in the poolroom, under the rule stated in slightly varying forms in People v. Lamar, 148 Cal. 564, 83 P. 993, People v. Bennett, 161 Cal. 214, 118 P. 710, and People v. Barrett, 22 Cal. App. 780, 136 P. 520, we need not pause to decide. The question having been propounded at the early stage of the trial which brought it forth, and without intimation that there would be any evidence showing appellant's knowledge concerning the alleged habits of Rios, we are satisfied that the trial court did not err in sustaining the objection to it.

[9] At a later period of the trial it was shown that the bottle which had been exhibited to Mrs. Rios was taken from the clothing of Rios when, soon after his death, his body was lifted into a conveyance for transport from the scene of the homicide. The bottle and its contents were offered and received in evidence. Appellant then asked that the members of the jury be permitted to smell the contents of the bottle in order to determine whether it held an intoxicating liquor, and the permission was refused. Laying aside points made by respondent as justifying the refusal, we think the court did not err in making it for the reasons stated in the last preceding paragraph. At the time of the request a part of the evidence concerning the poolroom affair had been introduced, it is true, but there was at that stage of the trial no hint that Rios had made the assault upon that occasion while he was intoxicated, nor was the court notified in any other manner that appellant knew anything whatever as to the alleged habits of Rios in the use of intoxicants.

[10] Immediately after Rios was killed, certain of the bystanders got into an automobile and started toward a telephone for the purpose of notifying the police of the occurrence. The defense offered to prove that the automobile was stoned, as it left the place, by those persons who had come with Rios to the scene of his death. Upon objection the offer was rejected. It was the theory of the defense that Rios and his friends had come to the place for the purpose of taking the life of appellant. It is contended that the rejected evidence was admissible in proof of the alleged conspiracy. In our opinion it was not.

Appellant requested several instructions on the law of self-defense. They were refused on the ground that the matter presented by them was covered by instructions which were given. We have read the instructions which the court gave upon the subject, and we are satisfied that all but two of the requested instructions were properly rejected for the reason stated. We shall therefore proceed to a specific consideration of those two alone.

[11] One of the rejected instructions contained the statement "that a person in the exercise of the right of self-defense * * * not only has a right to stand his ground and defend himself when attacked, but he may pursue his adversary until he has secured himself from danger." This requested instruction, like others on the same general subject, was denied on the ground that its matter was covered by instructions which were given. We find in the record no instruction in which the substance of the language above quoted was presented to the jury. Respondent calls our attention to an instruction which recited that, in the exercise of the right of self-defense, the party assailed has "the right to repel force by force," and that he may employ the right to defend himself from the apprehended danger "to any extent which to him is apparently necessary, acting in a reasonable manner." The language thus given did not, to our minds, cover the point. The refusal to give the requested language was therefore error. "The right to stand one's ground should form an element of the instructions upon the necessity of killing and the law of self-defense." People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, 42 P. 307, 30 L. R. A. 403. "When [a man] without fault himself is suddenly attacked in a way that puts his life or bodily safety in imminent hazard, he is not compelled to fly, or to consider the proposition of flying, but he may stand his ground, and defend himself to the extent of taking the life of the assailant, if that be reasonably necessary." People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 50 P. 405. The requested instruction was peculiarly applicable in the present instance, as it fitted exactly certain phases of the testimony in the case.

[12] One of the instructions which was requested and refused read as follows:

"The jury may take into consideration the evidence of the previous difficulties between Nick Rios and Jose Orosco in this case and likewise any other matters pertaining to their prior relations which have been introduced in evidence for the purpose of determining their state of mind at the time the fatal shot was fired."

The court gave no instruction upon the subject covered by this language, and we think, therefore, that the refusal to give the requested instruction was error. Such an instruction was called for by the testimony, and it was made particularly necessary because of the trial judge's reference to the poolroom episode as "remote," and by the manner in which he commented upon the evidence concerning appellant's damaged coat when the witness Serra was on the stand.

[13] Appellant introduced testimony at the trial to the effect that his reputation for peace and quiet was good. In view of this evidence he asked the court to give two certain instructions, but both were refused. One of them read:

"The court charges the jury that evidence of the good character of the defendant comes in aid of the general presumption of innocence, and is no more to be laid aside by the jury in their deliberations than is the general presumption itself. It is a fact in the case and itself may, in connection with all the other evidence in the case generate a reasonable doubt, sufficient to entitle the defendant to an acquittal."

The other proposed instruction, although differently couched, was in legal effect the same as the one here set forth. The court erred in not giving one or the other of the two. People v. Wilson, 23 Cal. App. 513, 138 P. 971.

[14] One of the instructions read to the jury contained the following:

"The law of self-defense is founded on necessity, and in order to justify the taking of life upon this ground it must not only appear to the slayer, as a reasonable man, that he had reason to believe, and did believe, that he was in danger of his life, or of receiving great bodily harm, but it must also appear to his comprehension, as a reasonable man, that to avoid such danger it was absolutely necessary for him to take the life of the deceased."

The question whether this instruction, in its use of the term "absolutely necessary," is a proper statement of the law has had a stormy career in the courts of this state, but its correctness was established in People v. Bruggy, 93 Cal. 476, 29 P. 26, and since that decision it has been upheld, either in the form in which it was given to the jury here or in similar forms, in People v. Lemperle, 94 Cal. 45, 29 P. 709, in People v. Emerson, 130 Cal. 562, 62 P. 1069, where the expression "necessary" was used without the qualifying word "absolutely," and perhaps in other cases. It was practically conceded to be correct in People v. Cyty, 11 Cal. App. 702, 106 P. 257. These cases deal with what may be termed the rule of apparent necessity; that is, they decide that where it appears to an assailed person as a reasonable man that, because of the conduct of his assailant, it is necessary, or absolutely necessary, to take the life of the assailant in order to save his own life, or to protect himself from great bodily injury, he may slay with impunity. The instruction here given was therefore correct. In addition to the cases last cited there are also decisions which deal with what may be called the rule of real necessity under the law of self-defense. These latter decide that where the jury finds that the assailed person was, through the conduct of the assailant, put in jeopardy of life or in danger of great bodily harm, the absolute necessity for slaying the assailant arises as matter of law. The cases on this subject are People v. Hecker, supra, People v. Newcomer, supra, and People v. Estrada, 60 Cal. App. 477, 213 P. 67. It is not contended that appellant asked any instruction under the law as declared in these decisions.

[15] It is urged upon us that the trial court erred in instructing the jury "that self-defense is not available as a plea to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with the design to force a deadly issue and thus, through his fraud, contrivance or fault to create a real or apparent necessity for killing." The point is well taken. While the instruction was a correct statement of an abstract proposition of law, it was improperly given in the present instance, for the reason that there was not in the record the slightest evidence that appellant sought a quarrel with Rios during the series of events leading up to the latter's death. See People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 86 P. 187; People v. Roe, 189 Cal. 548, 209 P. 560.

[16] In considering the damaging remarks and comments made by the judge during the trial of the action, we have several times observed that no objection was interposed to them at the time they were uttered, and that no request was made that the jury be admonished to disregard them. Appellant did, however, ask the court to read to the jury the following as a part of his final instructions:

"During the course of this trial, counsel for the defendant asked a question by way of impeachment of one of the witnesses in this case to which I answered as follows: 'The question shows the iniquity of that method. Because it does not appear here you will show it.' You are not to infer from this statement of mine nor from my attitude during the period of time which I made this statement that I intend to reflect any discredit upon the counsel for the defendant or upon the defendant himself; nor are you to infer from this statement that I have any opinion regarding any of the facts in this case, for with them I have nothing to do. You are the sole and exclusive judges of the facts."

The following instruction was also proposed by appellant:

"You are further instructed that during the course of this trial I have engaged at different times in discussions with the attorneys in the case and have made certain remarks during that time. In referring to certain evidence which the defendants were attempting to introduce, I have spoken of a certain practice as being 'iniquitous.' You are not to infer from my statements or from my attitude or actions in this case that I have any opinion in regard to the facts in this case. You are the sole and exclusive judges of the facts in this case, and with them I have nothing to do, nor are you to infer from anything which I have said that I have any opinion regarding them; and if my remarks have seemed to reflect even in the slightest degree upon the integrity of the counsel for the defendant, you are not to so regard them, nor are you to indulge in any inference against the defendant because of my remarks made during the course of this trial."

Each of these requested instructions was refused.

[17] Where a judge makes damaging comment in the presence of the jury during a trial, or where a district attorney takes a course which has a like effect, it is the duty of the counsel for the injured party to give the judge an opportunity to obviate the possibility of harm by means of admonition addressed to the jury, if the misconduct of either judge or district attorney is such that its effect may be removed by admonition. People v. Hayes (Cal. App.) 237 P. 390. In many of the cases which announce this rule it is said that the request for an admonition must be "timely." We do not understand this expression to mean that a request for the insertion of such an admonition in the final instructions to be given to the jury is so untimely as to justify a judge in refusing to grant it. Such a request is surely timely to the extent that it will be effective, and a judge should be eager to give the instruction if a beneficial result may be expected or even hoped to flow from it. We think the refusal to give either the one or the other of the requested instructions set forth above, under all the circumstances of the present case, was error. Some good could certainly have been accomplished by reading one of them to the jury, and the judge, having wrought the harm which followed from his injudicious remarks, should have made haste to embrace the opportunity to eradicate it. The judge did give a certain instruction which is read to juries in practically all cases, but we think it did not cover prominent features of the instructions which were refused. The given instruction read:

"I have not expressed, nor intend to express, nor have I intimated or intend to intimate, any opinion as to what witnesses are or are not worthy of credence; what facts are, or are not, established; or what inferences are to be drawn from the evidence adduced. If any expression of mine has seemed to indicate an opinion relating to any of these matters such expressions must be disregarded by you."

The refused instructions did not specifically cover all the harmful comment of the judge made during the trial, it is true, but some of the general language of them was calculated better to cover all of his injurious remarks than was the more general instruction which was given.

We have made a careful examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, for the purpose of determining whether, under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, a reversal of the judgment must follow from the error shown in the record. The evidence offered by appellant went solely to the point as to whether he had shot Rios in self-defense. In support of the issue thus presented by him, there was much evidence of a positive character, while the testimony to the contrary was wholly negative and was much attenuated. This state of the record is so plain that we find it unnecessary to recite the evidence upon the subject. We do not hesitate to say that if we could be called upon to decide the cause from the showing made by the record, not having an opportunity to observe the witnesses and thus to determine their credibility from their demeanor, we should hold that a slaying in self-defense was shown by a vast preponderance of the evidence, and that appellant should have been acquitted. It may be, of course, that the witnesses offered by appellant were entirely unworthy of belief, and that the jury may have been able to so determine from their appearance and manner of testifying. By our attitude upon the subject we do not intend to say that the question was not solely for the jury at the trial. It was. We express ourselves so forcibly only for the purpose of indicating that the showing of the cold record, upon which alone we may make application of the rule of the Constitution, imperatively demands a reversal of the cause. This result must follow even if we view appellant's request for a final admonitory instruction as not being broad enough to cover all the erroneous remarks made by the judge during the trial. His characterization of the efforts of appellant's counsel when the latter was seeking to impeach some of the witnesses of the prosecution, his refusal of proper instructions requested by appellant, and his giving of an instruction asked by the prosecution, which was improper, demand a reversal. As the evidence shown by the record inclines so strongly toward a support of the defense made by appellant, we are bound to assume that even a slight added circumstance favorable to him, or the removal of a slight circumstance unfavorable to him, would have impelled the jury to return a verdict of acquittal. Surely, if the trial court had not committed the errors mentioned, such a result would have been not only possible, but probable. This fact is indicated by a circumstance which we have reserved for final mention. Appellant was charged with murder. Under the evidence he either shot Rios in cold blood, or he was totally innocent of crime for the reason that the killing resulted through the exercise of the right of self-defense. There was in strictness no middle ground. The jury, however, found appellant guilty of murder in the second degree. Not only so, but after expressing that finding the verdict ends, "and ask the extreme lenience of the court." Here was a remarkable verdict. It showed nothing if it did not indicate that the minds of the members of the jury were in a state of doubt as to the correctness of their solution of the problem submitted to them.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

73 Cal. App. 678

ARCHER v. MILLER (two cases). (Civ. 4649, 4651.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. July 20, 1925.)

1. Quieting title ⟸37(1)—Answer asking affirmative relief must, as to sufficiency of allegations, conform to rules applicable to complaint.

In action to quiet title, answer setting up rights under a contract should allege fairness of contract and adequacy of consideration, since rule requiring such matter be shown in complaint applies to an answer through which pleader seeks judicial recognition and declaration of an equitable interest.

2. Specific performance ⟸73—Contract for personal service not subject to specific performance.

Contract for sale of real estate, providing that purchaser plant and cultivate orange trees on property, is a contract calling for personal service by one of the parties; hence specific performance cannot be enforced.

3. Quieting title ⟸37(1)—Answer setting up contract of sale not alleging performance by defendant no defense.

Answer in suit to quiet title, setting up contract of sale, which contains no statement of facts showing performance by defendant or excuse for nonperformance of conditions prescribed therein, fails to state a defense or show right to affirmative relief.

4. Quieting title ⟸37(1)—Defense setting up contract in which time is of the essence must show actual compliance.

Where in action to quiet title answer set up contract in which time was of essence, and which provided defendant was to purchase orange trees on contract and assign contract to plaintiff on or before November 1, an allegation that defendant purchased trees for planting on or about November 10 was no defense under Civ. Code, § 1657.

5. Quieting title ⟸15—Contract of sale, not specifically enforceable, no defense.

A contract for sale of real estate, containing provision that purchaser was to plant and cultivate orange trees, not being specifically enforceable because there was no mutuality of remedy, could not be the basis of defense against an action to quiet title.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by C. E. Archer against H. B. Miller. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Reversed.

See, also, 192 Cal. 67, 218 P. 410.

Tobias R. Archer and O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macniel, all of Los Angeles, for plaintiff.

B. J. Bradner and Seward A. Simons, both of Los Angeles, for defendant.

CONREY, P. J. These are two appeals in the same action. Plaintiff brought the action to quiet title to 40 acres of land owned by him. By his answer the defendant admitted that the plaintiff is the owner and in possession of the land, but alleged that the same is subject to contract rights of the defendant. These rights are claimed under a contract dated September 10, 1921, whereby Archer, as party of the first part, leased said real property to Miller for the term of ten years, commencing November 1, 1921, at a total rent of $40,000, payable as follows: $4,000 on or before four years from November 1, 1921; $6,000 each year thereafter until the entire principal is paid, with interest on said $40,000 at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable annually from the 1st day of November, 1921. The contract, after setting out many of the ordinary stipulations of a lease, provided as follows:

"Should the said party of the second part during the faithful performance by him of all the covenants of this lease desire to purchase the said premises, then said party of the first part agrees to sell the said premises to the said party of the second part at any time during the faithful fulfillment of this lease, if no default exists on the part of said party of the second part, for the sum of $40,000, together with interest thereon at 7 per cent. per annum, computed and payable annually from the commencement of this lease to the completion of purchase. Any amounts paid on the $40,000 rent and on the interest thereon may be applied to the purchase price of principal and interest at the time of purchase, but unless the whole purchase price is paid at once, this lease and the terms thereof shall continue until the whole purchase price is paid and completed.

"Should the said party of the second part fail to make any of the payments agreed to be made in this lease, or to fulfill any of the obligations of this lease or this agreement, then the said party of the second part agrees to and hereby does relinquish all rights and interest created or conferred by or under this indenture and in all sums paid thereunder, and in the property herein described.

"For the consideration of fifty ($50.00) dollars paid to said party of the first part by said party of the second part, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the said party of the second part is hereby given the right to terminate this indenture on or before November 1, 1921, by notice in writing, signed by him, to that effect; otherwise this indenture is to continue in full force.

"It is agreed that said party of the second part is to purchase for and plant all of said premises to first-grade orange trees during the year 1922, said planting thereof to begin on or before March 2, 1922, or otherwise if agreed to by both parties, and to be completed on or before May 1, 1922; and to that end, said party of the second part, as a part of the covenants of this lease, agrees to level and put in good condition said land and premises prior to any such planting, and agrees to purchase said first-grade orange trees therefor by contract with one-third cash payment or more down, before or on November 1, 1921, and to assign such contract and all his interest therein to said party of the first part on the condition and agreement that if the provisions of this indenture are not fulfilled by said party of the second part he forfeits to said party of the first part all his interest in said contract and orange trees, and all the payments made thereon to and the same shall thereby vest in the party of the first part, as an absolute assignment thereof to him, and he shall have the right thereupon to complete the payments under such contract for said orange trees, and take and receive all of said trees under said contract. Said party of the second part agrees to plant, cultivate, irrigate, and carefully and diligently care for all of said orange trees, and keep the same in good and thrifty condition on said premises during the existence of this indenture.

"All royalties or bonuses from oil are to apply on purchase price of land.

"In case said second party does not terminate this indenture, then immediately after November 1, 1921, said party of the first part will furnish to said party of the second part a certificate of title of said premises, showing the same vested in said party of the first part and may at his option furnish such certificate at any time during this indenture, showing title to said premises free and clear of all incumbrances, except taxes accruing subsequent to the date of this indenture, and will furnish such certificate on the completion of the purchase of said premises by said party of the second part hereunder." * * * "It is mutually agreed that time is of the essence of this indenture and agreement."

The judgment, after first determining that the plaintiff is owner in fee of said land subject to the rights of the defendant under and by virtue of said agreement, further decreed as follows:

"II. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said agreement is a valid and subsisting contract for the purchase of said property, and that defendant is relieved from any forfeiture or attempted forfeiture by the plaintiff of his rights under said contract, and that said defendant is entitled to have said contract concluded and carried out, but only on the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth.

"III. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that upon the payment to said plaintiff within 60 days from the date hereof of the sum of $40,000, and taxes accruing subsequent to the 10th day of September, 1921, that plaintiff execute and deliver to the defendant, H. B. Miller, a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of said property, free and clear of all incumbrances.

"IV. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed if the said plaintiff shall fail and refuse and neglect to make such conveyance, that the clerk of this court be, and he is hereby, appointed commissioner to execute such deed, and that such transfer, when made by such clerk as such commissioner, shall operate as a transfer to defendant of the said premises.

"V. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that upon the payment by the defendant of the said sum of $40,000 and the taxes as aforesaid, and upon the execution of said deed of conveyance by plaintiff, or in lieu thereof by the clerk of this court as hereinbefore provided, the plaintiff and all persons claiming, or to claim, said premises, or any part thereof, through or under said plaintiff, be and they are hereby restrained from thereafter asserting any right, title, or interest in or to any of the property described in the defendant's answer and in the findings herein.

"VI. It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that in the event of failure of the defendant to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $40,000, which amount is hereby decreed to be due and payable to said plaintiff at the date of the trial of this action, and taxes accruing subsequent to the 10th day of September, 1921, within 60 days from the entry of the judgment herein, that the said agreement hereinbefore referred to be canceled and of no effect, and that in such case said premises be restored to said plaintiff and that in such event said defendant has not any right, title or interest in or to said property, or any part thereof, and that in such event said defendant is thereafter perpetually restrained and enjoined from setting up any claim or claims thereto or any part thereof."

Plaintiff's appeal is from every part of the judgment adverse to him and in favor of the defendant. Defendant's appeal is in form an appeal from the entire judgment, but his sole objection is to that part of the judgment which requires him to make full payment within 60 days from the date of the judgment and upon his failure to comply with that requirement terminates all of his rights under the contract.

The first point presented by plaintiff is that the court erred in overruling his objection to the receipt of any evidence in support of the answer. The ground of the objection was that the answer failed to state a defense. Plaintiff contends that, for several reasons, the answer is fatally defective. The terms of the judgment indicate that the court treated the answer as a cross-complaint. Possibly the answer was so intended by the pleader. The prayer thereof is:

"That plaintiff take nothing by his cause of action, and that defendant be given possession of said land so that he may fulfill and carry out the agreement, and for costs of suit, and such other and further relief as to the court may seem meet in the premises."

[1] One of the plaintiff's points against the sufficiency of the answer is that it is silent upon the subjects of fairness of contract and adequacy of consideration. He contends that the rule requiring that the facts respecting such matters be shown is as applicable to an answer through which the pleader seeks judicial recognition and declaration of an equitable interest as it is to a complaint or cross-complaint having a similar object. Although no authority has been cited in support of this proposition, we are inclined to the opinion that the rule should be so applied. The answer contains no allegation as to the actual value of the land, and the facts stated are not sufficient to show that the contract was just and reasonable or that the consideration was adequate. This is clearly insufficient for any purpose involving an equitable remedy. The facts showing that the contract was just and reasonable should have been alleged. Salisbury v. Yawger, 184 Cal. 783, 795, 195 P. 682.

[2] It further appears that the contract is not one which furnishes a basis for mutuality of remedy. Therefore it is not a contract which can be specifically enforced. This is so because agreements to perform acts in the nature of personal service cannot be specifically enforced, and the contract herein provides for such service by defendant. By its terms it requires the defendant to prepare the land for planting, and to plant, maintain, and care for orange trees on the entire tract. "It is elementary that mutuality of remedy is an indispensable prerequisite to the specific performance of a contract. The remedy must be mutual as well as the obligation, and when the contract is of such a nature that it cannot be specifically enforced as to one of the parties, equity will not enforce it against the other. Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 404; Stanton v. Singleton, 126 Cal. 657, 59 P. 146, 47 L. R. A. 334; Los Angeles, etc., Development Co. v. Occidental Oil Co., 144 Cal. 528, 78 P. 25; Pacific, etc., Ry. Co. v. Campbell-Johnston, 153 Cal. 106, 94 P. 623. 'Neither party to an obligation can be compelled specifically to perform it, unless the other party thereto has performed, or is compellable specifically to perform, everything to which the former is entitled under the same obligation, either completely or nearly so, together with full compensation for any want of entire performance.' Civ. Code, § 3386." Poultry Producers of So. Cal., Inc., v. Barlow, 189 Cal. 278, 287, 208 P. 93, 96.

[3, 4] It further appears that the answer contains no statement of facts showing performance by the defendant or excuse for nonperformance by him of the conditions prescribed to be performed by him "before or on November 1, 1921." For that reason we think that the answer fails to state a defense and fails to show any right to affirmative relief. Since the answer does not allege any repudiation by plaintiff of the contract until on or about the 10th day of November, 1921, it is plain that such repudiation cannot be a valid excuse for defendant's failure to do the things which he was to do before or on November 1st. The provision of the contract whereby the defendant agreed to purchase first-grade orange trees to be planted on said land and to make said purchase "by contract with one-third cash payment or more down before or on November 1, 1921, and to assign such contract and all his interest therein" to the plaintiff, and that if this was not done the defendant would forfeit all his interest in said contract and orange trees and all payments made by him, required not only that the contract be made not later than November 1st, but that the assignment thereof to the plaintiff must be made not later than November 1st. The answer alleges that in fulfillment of said agreement the defendant purchased trees for the planting of said premises and on or about November 10, 1921, took possession of the premises and commenced work thereon, but was ejected by the plaintiff. This was not an allegation of assignment to plaintiff of the contract or of any tender or offer of or attempt to make such assignment. The contract by its terms provided that time was of the essence thereof. "If no time is specified for the performance of an act required to be performed, a reasonable time is allowed. If the act is in its nature capable of being done instantly—as, for example, if it consists in the payment of money only—it must be performed immediately upon the thing to be done being exactly ascertained." Civ. Code, § 1657. The assignment of a contract is a thing capable of direct and immediate performance as soon as the contract exists. Here there was nothing alleged, nor is there anything in the terms of the contract, which would exempt defendant from his obligation strictly to perform his obligation to assign said contract before or on November 1st. On the contrary, the nature of the contract, particularly as it existed prior to November 1st, was such that plaintiff was clearly entitled to the full benefit of the provision making time of the essence of the contract, for the contract reserved to the defendant until that date the right to withdraw therefrom. In other words, until then it was only an option under which defendant had the right to become lessee of the land with further right of purchase.

[5] We think that the court erred in overruling the objection of the plaintiff to the evidence offered in support of the affirmative defense. This error caused a miscarriage of justice, because it has resulted in a judgment to which the defendant was not entitled, even though it be conceded that all of the allegations of the answer are true. It is sufficient on this proposition to refer to the rule, established by decision, that a contract of purchase and sale which is not specifically enforceable cannot be the basis of defense against an action to quiet title. Jolliffe v. Steele, 9 Cal. App. 212, 98 P. 544; Valentine v. Streeton, 9 Cal. App. 640, 99 P. 1107; Crane v. Roach, 29 Cal. App. 584, 587, 156 P. 875.

Both parties are dissatisfied with that part of the judgment found in paragraphs III, V and VI thereof. For the reasons which have been stated in discussing the answer of defendant, the result necessarily follows that the defendant was not entitled to any judgment enforcing the contract by compelling the plaintiff to execute a deed, either upon payment of the sum of $40,000 to plaintiff within the time stated in the judgment, or at all. This being so, it is unnecessary to consider and determine the merits of defendant's contention that he should not have been required to pay the full contract price within 60 days from the date of the judgment, or upon failure so to do be deprived of his right to purchase the property.

The judgment is reversed.

Where the findings fail to respond to issues framed by pleadings, it must be assumed in support of judgment that the court heard evidence sufficient to sustain them.

2. Appeal and error ⟹197(1)—Variance between pleading and proof must be raised below.

3. Appeal and error ⟹916(1)—On appeal on judgment roll without bill of exceptions presumed that no objection on ground of variance was made below.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by A. H. Swallow against Herbert Francisco and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Crouch & Crouch, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Forbes & Guthrie, of Bishop, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to recover an attorney's fee. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant Soteras and against defendant Francisco. The latter appeals.

The sole point presented by appellant is that the findings of the trial court are not responsive to the issues framed by the pleadings. The complaint alleged that at all times mentioned in it respondent was a duly licensed, qualified, and practicing attorney at law in the state; that within two years last past, he, at the special instance and request of defendants performed certain legal services for which they promised and agreed to pay him the reasonable value thereof on demand; that the reasonable value of the services was the sum of $500, and that he has demanded of defendants the payment of the amount, but that they have wholly failed and refused, and still fail and refuse, to pay the same or any part thereof except the sum of $45.90. Judgment was prayed for $454.10. The defendants answered separately. In the answer of appellant it is denied that respondent at the instance and request of appellant, or otherwise or at all, performed any legal services for appellant, or for his use or benefit; that appellant ever agreed to pay respondent the reasonable value of any legal services whatever, or any sum of money for any legal services; or that the sum of $500 is the reasonable value of the services claimed to have been rendered by respondent for appellant. In addition to these denials the answer of appellant contained an averment that he is not indebted to respondent in any sum for services, or at all.

The trial court found, so far as its findings were material to the issues in the cause, that between September 15 and December 25, 1920, respondent performed legal services which were of the reasonable value of $500 for defendant Soteras and at his special instance and request; that on or about December 17, 1920, appellant, for a certain consideration moving to him from defendant Soteras, promised and agreed to and with Soteras, and to and with respondent, to pay to respondent the reasonable value of the services rendered to Soteras, as found by the court; and that appellant has paid no part thereof except the sum of $45.90.

[1-3] It is not necessary to determine whether the findings fail to respond to the issues framed by the pleadings. Even if they do, it must be assumed in support of the judgment that the court heard evidence sufficient to sustain them. If the findings do not follow the pleadings, the evidence upon which they were based was also not within the issues, and there was a variance between pleading and proof; but the point that there is such a variance must be made at the trial. People v. Gonzales (Cal. App.) 231 P. 1014. As the present appeal comes to us on the judgment roll alone, without bill of exceptions, it will be presumed in aid of the judgment that no objection on the ground of variance was made in the trial court. Practically all of these questions have lately been passed upon by us. Gaffny v. Michaels (Cal. App.) 238 P. 746. See, especially, concurring opinion.

Judgment affirmed.

CITY INV. CO. v. PRINGLE et al.
(Civ. 5112.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 28, 1925.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⊂=209—Landlord cannot sue undertenants for rent or for use and occupation of premises without privity of contract.

Where, as between landlord and subtenants and their subtenants, there was neither privity of estate nor contract, landlord cannot sue undertenants on original lessee's covenant to pay the rent, unless undertenants had assumed the lease, nor for use and occupation of the premises, unless there had been an agreement for use of the premises, express or implied, between landlord and sublessee.

2. Landlord and tenant ⊂=209 — Equity will compel subtenant to pay rent to landlord, where original lessee becomes insolvent.

Though, as between landlord and subtenants, there is neither privity of estate nor privity of contract, equity will compel subtenant to make all future payments of rent to landlord according to terms of sublease, when original lessee becomes insolvent.

8. Landlord and tenant ⊂⊃184(2) — Title to money, deposited by subtenants with original lessee remained in them subject to terms and conditions of lease.

Title to money, deposited by subtenants with original lessee, as security for performance of the lease, remained in them subject to terms and conditions of the lease, notwithstanding failure of original lessee to perform his obligations to landlord.

4. Set-off and counterclaim ⊂⊃8(1)—Equity will take cognizance of cross-claim between litigants, though wanting in mutuality.

Equity will take cognizance of a cross-claim between litigants, though wanting in mutuality, and set off one against the other, whenever it becomes necessary in order to effect a clear equity or prevent irremediable injustice.

5. Landlord and tenant ⊂⊃223(2)—Subtenants held entitled to set off money deposited by them with original lessee in action for rent.

In suit in equity by owner against subtenants for rents, original lessee having failed to pay rent, and his estate being insolvent, subtenants held entitled to set off money deposited by them with original lessee as security for performance of the covenants of the lease, under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, notwithstanding lack of mutuality between them and owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by the City Investment Company, a corporation, against Edward J. Pringle, etc., and others, with set-off by Helmut Lewin and another. From a judgment allowing the set-off, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan Moran, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jos. B. Kennedy, of San Francisco, for respondent Exnicios.

Jacob Samuels and Oscar Samuels, both of San Francisco, for other respondents.

CASHIN, J. An action commenced by City Investment Company, a corporation, appellant herein, against Edward J. Pringle and Sidney J. Pringle, as executors of the last will and testament of William B. Pringle, deceased, the deceased being the original lessee of certain real property, Helmut Lewin and Herman Oppenheim, copartners, and others, sublessees of portions thereof, to recover rents unpaid by certain of the sublessees, the estate of deceased being insolvent.

Appellant is the owner of a certain building divided into storerooms fronting on Market and Eddy streets in the city of San Francisco, a lease of which was on June 22, 1909, executed by its predecessors in interest to William B. Pringle for the term commencing on said date and ending on June 22, 1924, at a monthly rental of $2,988.42 for the first five years, and $3,238.42 for the second five years of the term, payable each month in advance, and which lease permitted the lessee to sublet.

On June 23, 1909, Pringle sublet a portion thereof to respondents Lewin and Oppenheim for the term commencing on said date and ending on June 22, 1919, at a monthly rental of $800, payable each month in advance. Pursuant to a provision of the lease, said respondents deposited with Pringle the sum of $3,200 as security for the performance by them of all the terms and conditions thereof, it being agreed therein that upon such performance prior to the last four months of the term the amount so deposited should be applied in payment of the rent for those months and that Pringle should pay interest semi-annually on such deposit at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. Said respondents thereupon sublet a portion of the premises demised to them to Cohn & Cohn (also made defendants in the action) for the monthly rental of $400 per month.

Thereafter Pringle leased the whole of the premises described in the original lease to D. D. Oliphant for the term which expired June 22, 1919, who in turn leased to James Hansen for a term expiring June 21, 1919, and who on his part executed a lease thereof to Fred Sturmer and Kate C. Mason for a term which expired on February 21, 1919. Subsequently to the execution of the lease last mentioned, Sturmer transferred to J. Holmes Wade (one of the defendants) his interest therein.

The rent, as provided by the original lease was paid to appellant and its predecessors in interest for the portion of the term ending on December 21, 1917, from which date to February 26, 1919, the rent accrued and unpaid amounted to the sum of $48,576.30.

William J. Pringle died on December 10, 1916, and his executors from the month of January, 1917, to February 26, 1919, held and occupied the leased premises, not in person, but by the subtenants mentioned. The estate of Pringle was at all times insolvent and without assets of any character.

On October 31, 1918, the date of the commencement of the instant action, appellant commenced an action in ejectment in the same court against the same defendants for the recovery of the premises described in the original lease, following which a judgment therein was entered on February 26, 1919, adjudging the original lease forfeited on account of the failure to pay the rent as provided therein, that all of the rights of the lessee thereunder be terminated and that plaintiff recover possession of the premises.

The executors appealed from the judgment, which appeal was hereafter on November 3, 1919, by order and judgment of the Supreme Court, dismissed, and on December 4, 1919, the remittitur from said court was filed in the court from which the appeal was taken.

Respondents Lewin and Oppenheim performed all the covenants and conditions of their lease from Pringle with the exception of the payments provided to be made in the month of December, 1918, and the months of January and February, 1919. After the commencement of the actions by appellant as above mentioned, said respondents withheld payment, and upon the appointment of John Exnicios, one of the respondents herein, as receiver by the court in the instant case to collect the rents unpaid by the various subtenants, upon order theretofore made by the court, said respondents and their sublessees Cohn & Cohn paid to the receiver the sum of $2,154.24, which sum was equivalent to the rental due and unpaid by said respondents to February 23, 1919. Upon the entry on February 26, 1919, of the judgment in the ejectment action, said respondents, treating such judgment as an eviction, entered into a lease with appellant for the portion of the premises occupied by them under the Pringle lease at the same monthly rental for a term commencing on said date and extending beyond the term provided in their original lease. Thereupon by their supplemental answer to appellant's complaint in the instant case, said respondents alleged the fact of the entry of said judgment in ejectment, the insolvency of the estate of Pringle, the eviction of respondents, that by reason of the eviction the amount of the deposit less the proportion thereof which might properly be applied to the rent earned between the 23d day of February, 1919, and the date of the entry of said judgment became payable to respondents, and prayed that the balance thereof be offset against the claim of appellant for the rents accrued under the Pringle lease.

It appears that respondents occupied the premises under the Pringle lease for a period of three days after the rental payment date of February 23, 1919, provided therein, and before the eviction, for which Pringle or those claiming under him would be entitled to the sum of $80, and in payment of which the deposit to that extent might properly be applied.

In the instant case the court, pending the final determination of the action, upon motion duly made by said respondents therefor, ordered the receiver to pay to respondents the moneys by them and their sublessees paid to the receiver, to wit, the sum of $1,716.98, with the further sum of $437.26, the amount paid to said receiver by Cohn & Cohn, being the total sum of $2,154.24; and thereafter on June 5, 1923, entered judgment for appellant against certain defendants other than respondents herein and Cohn & Cohn, and for the payment by the receiver to appellant of sums collected by him from certain of the sublessees other than respondents and Cohn & Cohn, and further adjudged that appellant take nothing as to respondents, and that the latter recover from appellant their costs. From the judgment entered for respondents Lewin and Oppenheim, the appeal was taken.

The facts on which the court based its order for the payment by the receiver of the sums mentioned to respondents, and on a finding of which was based the judgment for respondents, were that respondents, except for the three days from the 23d to the 25th of February, 1919, both exclusive, did not enjoy the last four months of their subtenancy under the lease to them from William B. Pringle, although respondents had theretofore faithfully performed all the terms, conditions, and covenants of their lease; that save for the termination of the leasehold estate of William B. Pringle in the ejectment proceedings respondents would have been entitled to the application of their deposit to the four months' rental as provided therein from February 23, 1919; that the pro rata of rent earned for the three days above mentioned under their lease was the sum of $80, and that the balance of said deposit, to wit, the sum of $3,120, was not applied or consumed by way of rent and had not been repaid to respondents.

It is the contention of appellant that judgment should have been entered for the recovery by it of the rents accrued under the lease from Pringle to respondents, being the total of the sums paid by them and their sublessees to the receiver, to wit, $2,154.24; that no part of the deposit could properly be applied as an offset to their right to recover from respondents the amount of such accrued rents.

[1, 2] As between appellant and respondents and their sublessees there was neither privity of estate nor privity of contract. Buttner v. Kasser, 19 Cal. App. 755, 127 P. 811; Ericksen v. Rhee, 181 Cal. 562, 185 P. 847. Appellant, therefore, could not sue the undertenants upon the original lessee's covenant to pay the rent, unless the undertenants had assumed the lease, nor could an action be maintained for the use and occupation of the premises, unless there had been an agreement for the use of the premises express or implied between the lessor and the sublessee. 36 Corp. Jur. "Landlord and Tenant," 379; 16 R. C. L. p. 879, § 384, "Landlord and Tenant." When, however, the original lessee becomes insolvent, equity will compel the subtenant to make all future payments of rent to the lessor according to the terms of the sublease. City Investment Co. v. Pringle et al. (Cal. App.) 231 P. 355; Story Eq. Jur. (14th Ed.) § 926g; Young v. Wyatt, 130 Ark. 371, 197 S. W. 575. The estate of the original lessee being insolvent, the amount unpaid by the sublessee is deemed in equity a trust or charge upon the estate, and the sublessee is bound in conscience not to take the profits without the due discharge of the rent out of them. Story Eq. Jur., supra. In Young v. Wyatt, supra, the court said:

"The authorities seem to be uniform in holding that an equitable lien exists in favor of the landlord, or original lessor, on the rent money in the hands of an undertenant in case the lessee becomes insolvent."

It is not contended that the obligations of respondents were increased by the failure of Pringle to perform his obligation to appellant, or that their rights under the sublease would be affected thereby, either as to Pringle or appellant, so long as the original lease had not been terminated.

[3] The claim of appellant is based upon the unperformed obligation of Pringle, and, there being no privity of estate or contract between it and respondents, the object of the proceeding and the relief afforded in equity is the satisfaction of this claim to the extent of the obligation of respondents. The latter obligation arose from their contract with Pringle, and the right to its performance was subject to the other express or implied terms thereof. The title to the money deposited by respondents as security for the performance of the covenants of the lease remained in them subject to the terms and conditions of the lease. 36 C. J. "Landlord and Tenant," 298; Alvord v. Banfield, 85 Or. 49, 166 P. 549; Moumal v. Parkhurst, 89 Or. 248, 173 P. 669; Degnario v. Sire, 34 Misc. Rep. 163, 68 N. Y. S. 789. Upon the eviction the right to the return of the deposit accrued, and an action to recover the excess above the amount of the rents unpaid could have been maintained, it appearing from the findings of the court that respondents had fully performed all of the covenants of the sublease with the exception of payment of the rents withheld and collected by the receiver (Rez v. Summers, 34 Cal. App. 527, 168 P. 156; Tiffany, Landlord and Tenant, § 323); and, had an action been brought by Pringle or his executors after the eviction for the rents theretofore accrued, a counterclaim for the portion of the deposit unapplied under the terms of the sublease might have been set up by respondents. Parish v. Studebaker, 50 Cal. App. 719, 195 P. 721; Hyman v. Jockey Club, etc., 9 Colo. App. 299, 48 P. 671.

But it is urged by appellant that, the eviction having occurred after the period ending February 22, 1919, to which date the sums collected by the receiver were received as rent under the Pringle lease, and the right to the return of the deposit not having accrued until the eviction on February 26, 1919, a cause of action therefor did not arise until the latter date, and that therefore such cause of action could not have been pleaded as a set-off or counterclaim under the provisions of section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure as against an action for the accrued rents brought before the eviction; that, the action in the instant case having been brought before the amounts here involved had accrued as rent under the sublease, its position is the same as that of a plaintiff in the case last assumed.

Assuming that the position of appellant would be correct had the action been brought by a solvent lessor before eviction for the rents accrued, the fact which distinguishes the instant case is the insolvency of Pringle and his estate. This fact was the ground for the proceeding, and upon it was based the jurisdiction of a court of equity to afford the relief sought. Story, Eq. Jur. supra; Pomeroy, Eq. Jur. (4th Ed.) § 189. The same fact would have been the occasion of equitable relief to respondents, the eviction having occurred and the right to the return of the deposit having accrued after the rents under the sublease became due and action therefor commenced, in that the insolvency of their lessor appearing equity would have sustained the right, other things being equal, to set off the deposit to the extent that it remained unapplied under the terms of the lease as against the claim for rent.

[4] In the case of Pendleton v. Hellman Commercial, T. &. S. Bank, 58 Cal. App. 448, 208 P. 702, an action by the administrator of the estate of a depositor against the bank to recover the deposit, the deceased having died insolvent and his estate being in the same condition, and wherein the bank sought to set off against the action for the deposit a note of deceased owned by the bank, but which by its terms was not due at the date of the death of decedent, and wherein it was held that the bank might apply the amount of the deposit to the unmatured note, the court said:

"We are of the opinion that the fact of insolvency of the debtor as applied to the situation existing in this case is sufficient to sustain the right of set-off in favor of the creditor bank, notwithstanding that the debt of the depositor was not due at the time when he died leaving an insolvent estate. The principles involved are discussed at length in Nashville Trust Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 91 Tenn. 336, 18 S. W. 822, 15 L. R. A. 710. In that decision it was noted that the doctrine of set-off, whether legal or equitable, is essentially a doctrine of equity. It was that natural justice and equity, which dictates that demands of parties, mutually indebted, should be set off against each other, and only the balance recovered, that gave birth to the idea of accomplishing the result in a judicial proceeding. * * * There is no magic in the statutory enactment of a rule derived from equity, whereby in receiving this legislative sanction the principle is deprived of its equitable qualities.

"It is not just that the representative of an insolvent debtor who on another account is the creditor of his debtor should be permitted to enforce the insolvent's claim without paying the other, merely because the obligation in his favor is due while the correlative obligation is not due,"

—citing further in support of the principle the cases of Carr v. Hamilton, 129 U. S. 252–255, 9 S. Ct. 295, 32 L. Ed. 670; People v. California, etc., Trust Co., 168 Cal. 241, 250, 141 P. 1181, L. R. A. 1915A, 299, the latter case holding the rule to be well settled that the insolvency of a party against whom a set-off is claimed is a sufficient ground for the allowance of a set-off not otherwise available. To the same effect in principle are the decisions in the cases of Coonan v. Loewenthal, 147 Cal. 218, 81 P. 527, 109 Am. St. Rep. 128; Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 13 S. Ct. 148, 36 L. Ed. 1059; Georgia Seed Co. v. Talmadge & Co., 96 Ga. 254, 22 S. E. 1001; Steelman v. Atchley, 98 Ark. 294, 135 S. W. 902, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1060; Hayden v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 120 Md. 163, 87 A. 672, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1059, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 686, 689.

The majority of the cases, wherein the rule has been applied, have been those in which a bank has sought to set off the unmatured indebtedness of an insolvent depositor to it as against a claim for the deposit by the depositor or his representative or as against the assignee of such depositor. The principle, however, applies in all cases where a right of the insolvent is asserted, and in accordance with equitable principles set-off should be permitted. As held in Nashville Trust Co. v. Fourth Nat. Bank, supra, cited with approval in the cases of Pendleton v. Hellman Com., etc., Bank, supra, and Coonan v. Loewenthal, supra, insolvency itself is a sufficient ground for the application of equitable set-off, and the fact, that the indebtedness on one side is not due when set-off is claimed, constitutes no obstacle to the assertion of the right as against an insolvent debtor. While it is our view that the claim of appellant, as against respondents upon the fund on which it is sought to impose a lien, is measured by the rights of the original lessee in the premises, should it be urged that there was no mutuality as between the demands of appellant and respondents, and that therefore, respondents may not set off a claim for the deposit as against appellant's demand for the rent, it is well settled that a court of equity will take cognizance of a cross-claim between litigants, though wanting in mutuality, and set off one against the other whenever it becomes necessary in order to effect a clear equity or prevent irremediable injustice. 24 R. C. L. Set-off and Counterclaim, § 70, p. 865; Georgia Seed Co. v. Talmadge, supra; Kentucky Flour Co's Assignee v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 90 Ky. 225, 13 S. W. 910, 9 L. R. A. 108; and, as held in the case of People v. California, etc., Trust Co., supra, where an administratrix deposited funds in her hands as administratrix in a bank which held an allowed claim against the estate, the bank having subsequently become insolvent, a want of mutuality was no defense as against the right of the administratrix to set off her deposit claim against the allowed claim of the receiver of the bank.

[5] It is our conclusion that upon the facts shown grounds existed for the application of the equitable rules above stated, and that the set-off claimed by respondents Helmut Lewin and Herman Oppenheim was properly allowed. It is therefore ordered that the judgment, as between appellant and respondents herein be affirmed.

HALM v. HALM et al.

(L. A. 8343.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1925.)

1. Wills ⇐16—Bequest to charitable institution held void.

A bequest, made in a will executed within 30 days of death to University of Heidelberg in Germany, was void under Civ. Code, § 1313, as being bequest to a charitable institution.

2. Wills ⇐16—University of Heidelberg not a tax exempt state institution that may take bequest made less than 30 days before death; "state institution"; "educational institution."

University of Heidelberg is not a "state institution" or "educational institution which is exempt from taxation" under Const. art. 13, § 1a, within the meaning of that section and accordingly cannot take, under Civ. Code, § 1313, a bequest made less than 30 days before death of testator.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Final accounting of Emil Halm, executor of the estate of Karl Halm, deceased. From an order allowing a bequest to the University of Heidelberg, Emma Halm, a residuary legatee, appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Stephens & Stephens, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Karl L. Ratzer and Max Adler, both of Los Angeles, and Gustav Gutsch, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a portion of the order settling the final account and for the distribution made, given, and entered by the superior court of the county of Los Angeles, wherein said court undertook to find that a certain bequest of the decedent, bequeathing a cash legacy of $1,000 to the University of Heidelberg was a valid legacy and ordering the distribution of the amount of said legacy to said legatee. The appeal is by Emma Halm, the widow of the decedent, who was the residuary legatee and devisee under the last will and testament of said decedent. The decedent died on the 28th day of February, 1923, being a resident of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, at the time of his death. On the 21st day of February, 1923, he made and executed his last will and testament. In said will he made the following bequest:

"11. As a memorial I bequest to the following institutions, relatives and friends the following sums:

"University Heidelberg, Germany, $1,000.00. * * *"

The will of said deceased was in due course offered and admitted to probate, and thereafter the executor thereof presented his first and final account and report and petition for distribution, wherein he alleged that the University of Heidelberg, of Germany, was a public educational institution not carried on for private gain, and that the bequest to it was therefore void under the prohibition of section 1313 of the Civil Code. The University of Heidelberg appeared by its attorney in fact, filed written objections to the account and petition for distribution, in which it denied that it is a public educational institution, alleging that it is a state institution of the state of Baden, and prayed for distribution of this legacy to it. After a hearing upon said account and petition and said objection thereto, the court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, wherein it found:

"That the University of Heidelberg is in the fullest sense of the word a state institution of the free state of Baden of the German Republic formed for scientific, literary, and purely educational purposes; and that its expenses and costs of upkeep are defrayed by the said free state of Baden, without any donations or endowments from any source whatever, and that the said university is and was not incorporated nor is the same conducted for profit, nor is any profit derived from the conduct thereof. * * *

"As conclusions of law the court holds:

"That the University of Heidelberg is not a charitable or benevolent corporation, and that the said University of Heidelberg is entitled to receive by decree of distribution herein the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000), to it bequeathed under the said last will and testament of the said Karl Halm, deceased."

Upon the foregoing findings of fact and conclusions of law the court made its order distributing said estate and said bequest in conformity therewith, and it is from said portion of said order that this appeal has been taken.

It appearing upon the face of said proceeding that the will of said decedent was executed within 30 days prior to the decease of the decedent, the sole question presented upon this appeal is as to whether the foregoing bequest to the University of Heidelberg was a valid bequest under the provisions and limitations of section 1313 of the Civil Code. Said section reads, in part, as follows:

"No estate, real or personal, shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses, except the same be done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the decease of the testator; and if so made at least thirty days prior to such death, such devise or legacy and each of them shall be valid; * * * and provided, further, that bequests and devises to the state, or to any state institution, or for the use or benefit of the state or any state institution or to any educational institution which is exempt from taxation under section 1A of article thirteen of the Constitution of the state of California, or for the use or benefit of any such educational institution, are excepted from the restrictions of this section. * * *"

[1] It is the contention of the appellant herein that, under the findings of said court, the University of Heidelberg must be held to be such a charitable or benevolent institution as would come within the inhibitions of the foregoing provisions of section 1313, Civil Code, and hence that said bequest was void and as a consequence that the order and decree of distribution awarding the sum provided for in said bequest to the University of Heidelberg was erroneous. We are of the opinion that this contention must be sustained.

The University of Heidelberg, according to the foregoing findings of the probate court, is a state institution of the free state of Baden of the German Republic, formed for scientific, literary, and purely educational purposes, with its expenses and costs of upkeep defrayed by the free state of Baden, and with its activities devoted apparently to the teaching of education freely to an indeterminate number of the youth of Germany who may from time to time be the recipients of its benefaction. It is thus to be placed in the same category with any other educational institution, whether founded by or under the provision of the state or by private gift, bequest, or trust. In the case of People v. Cogswell, 113 Cal. 129, 136, 45 P. 270, 35 L. R. A. 269, it was held that a private trust created for the purpose of the erection and maintenance of a polytechnic college devoted to the spread of technical knowledge and to the gratuitous instruction in mechanical arts of the youth of this state was a purely charitable foundation. In Estate of Sutro, 155 Cal. 727, 102 P. 920, the court quotes approvingly from Perry on Trusts (2 Perry on Trusts, § 711) the general definition of a charitable trust as given by Judge Gray in Jackson v. Phillips, 14 Allen (Mass.) 556:

"A charity, in the legal sense, may be more fully defined as a gift, to be applied consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works or otherwise lessening the burdens of government."

In the case of Skinner v. Harrison Township, 116 Ind. 139, 18 N. E. 529, 2 L. R. A. 137, it was held that a bequest to said township for the use and benefit of the common schools therein was a charitable bequest, and in Webster v. Wiggin, 19 R. I. 73, 31 A. 824, 28 L. R. A. 510, it was decided that a bequest to certain school districts of the state of New Hampshire for the purpose of establishing and maintaining public schools therein was a charitable trust. In Estate of Dol, 182 Cal. 159, 187 P. 428, this court had under consideration the question as to whether the particular recipient of the bequest in that case was a charitable or benevolent society within the meaning of section 1313, Civil Code, and while the court in that case held that it was not such, it suggested that there was no essential difference between the words "charitable" and "benevolent" as employed in that section, at least in so far as it had application to the case then in hand. We are unable to observe any such distinction between said terms as employed in said section, and our view in that respect is, we think, strengthened by the language of the proviso therein above set forth which clearly indicates that bequests or devises to a state or a state institution for educational purposes would come within the foregoing provisions of said section, unless such institution could be brought within the inhibition made in said proviso.

[2] It is the contention of the respondent herein, however, that under the terms of said proviso it is exempt from the foregoing limitations of said section for the reason that it is, as found by the court, a state institution of the free state of Baden, Germany. Reading said proviso as a whole, however, the conclusion appears inevitable that the state institutions and educational institutions referred to therein are only those which are exempt from taxation under section 1a of article 13 of the Constitution of the state of California; and it is plain that the educational institution in question here does not come within the terms of such exemption. We are therefore of the opinion that the University of Heidelberg is such a charitable or benevolent institution as would come within the terms and provisions of said section of the Civil Code and to which, therefore, a bequest would be void, unless the same were made by the testator by a will duly executed at least 30 days before his decease.

The will of the decedent herein not having been thus executed and said bequest thus being void, it follows that the order and decree of said court, in so far as it undertook to distribute the sum named in said bequest to that particular legatee, was erroneous, and that said sum should have been distributed to the residuary legatee of said decedent, the appellant herein. The order as to the portion appealed from herein is reversed, and the trial court is directed to enter a decree of distribution in said estate in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

GORDON v. BECK. (L. A. 7413.)

1. Principal and agent ⊜157 — Remedies of principal without knowledge of dual agency as against opposing principal having knowledge stated.

Principal having no notice or knowledge of duplicity of agent may, at his option, be relieved from contract as against opposing principal who had notice or knowledge, either by an affirmative action rescinding contract or by interposing dual agency as defense to action to enforce.

2. Brokers ⊜100—Engagement of purchaser's agent with vendor for compensation without former's knowledge rendered contract voidable.

Where purchaser had right to expect loyalty to his interest by his agent, latter's engagement with vendor for compensation without purchaser's knowledge rendered contract voidable at purchaser's option, even though vendor paid commissions in good faith.

3. Brokers ⊜105—Purchaser not chargeable with uncommunicated knowledge where agent was acting for vendor.

Where purchaser's agent acted also for vendor on commission basis, his interest was adverse to purchaser, and latter could not be charged with uncommunicated knowledge of actual conditions.

4. Brokers ⊜103—Vendor not permitted to disclaim representations and concealment of agent.

Where agent acted for vendor on commission basis, vendor, having accepted advantage obtained under contract and retaining it, cannot disclaim responsibility for representations and concealments of his agent.

5. Principal and agent ⊜157 — Dual agency not tolerated except by consent of both principals.

Dual agency can be tolerated only with knowledge and consent of both principals.

6. Judgment ⊜198—Omnibus finding that allegations of defense were not true held insufficient to support judgment.

Omnibus finding that material allegations in named paragraphs of defendant's affirmative defense were not proved held insufficient to support judgment.

7. Appeal and error ⊜1071(6), 1122(2)—Supreme Court unauthorized to make findings where trial court failed to do so, but will reverse for failure to make necessary findings.

When trial court has failed to make findings, the Supreme Court is unauthorized to do so, but will order new trial where findings not made are necessary to proper determination of rights of parties.

8. Evidence ⊜21 — Common knowledge that seller of real estate usually pays commission.

In case of purchase and sale of real estate, it is common knowledge that seller usually pays commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by G. L. Gordon against S. Beck, in which defendant counterclaimed for affirmative relief. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial, with directions to overrule demurrer to cross-complaint.

Hocker & Austin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Davis & Thorne, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHENK, J. After judgment of reversal herein counsel appearing amici curiæ were granted leave to file a petition for a rehearing on the representation that the decision in this case would probably have an important bearing on other and important pending litigation in which they and counsel associated with appellant's counsel were interested. As respondent had filed no brief, and as the importance of the questions involved seemed to warrant it, the rehearing was granted in order that respective counsel might have full opportunity to present more fully both sides of the controversy.

After due consideration of the questions involved we are satisfied with and adopt the reasoning and conclusions expressed in the former opinion, and will append such further comment as the additional points and authorities have elicited. As the contentions of amici curiæ are all in behalf of the respondent's position, they will be referred to and deemed the respondent's contentions. The former opinion is as follows:

"This is an appeal by defendant, S. Beck, from a judgment foreclosing his interest in an executory contract for the purchase and sale of real property. The record is presented pursuant to section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

"The action was commenced on January 21, 1921, by the filing of a complaint wherein it was alleged that on the 14th day of October, 1920, the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract for the purchase and sale of an improved lot in the city of Los Angeles for the sum of $1,800, of which $400 was to be paid on the execution of the contract and the balance in monthly installments of $20, and that no part of the contract price had been paid except the initial payment of $400. The plaintiff prayed that an interlocutory judgment be entered adjudging the defendant to be indebted to the plaintiff for the unpaid balance of the contract price, and that if the same be not paid within such time as the court might fix, the plaintiff's title to the property be quieted and the interest of the defendant therein be terminated. To this complaint the defendant filed an answer admitting that he had signed the contract, but setting forth as an affirmative defense that the contract was invalid and not binding on him, for the reason that without his knowledge or consent his agent in the transaction, one Claude Minor, had also acted for and as the agent of the plaintiff in the same transaction, and had received compensation therefor. The defendant also filed a cross-complaint alleging the dual agency of said Minor; that he had first discovered the duplicity of his agent about the first week in November, 1920, and immediately informed the plaintiff that he would not take possession of the property and would not carry out the terms of the contract; that he at no time had possession or control of said property, and that by reason of the dual agency of the said Minor, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, the contract was void and of no effect; that he had demanded the return of said $400 from the plaintiff, but that the same had not been paid. In the cross-complaint the defendant tendered the contract into court for cancellation. The plaintiff interposed a general and special demurrer to the answer and also to the cross-complaint. The demurrer to the answer was sustained with leave to amend, and the demurrer to the cross-complaint was sustained without leave to amend. Before the defendant filed an amended answer the plaintiff filed an amended complaint wherein the facts from the plaintiff's standpoint were more elaborately alleged, and certain defects appearing on the face of the original complaint were cured. To this amended complaint the defendant filed an answer wherein he again set forth in an affirmative defense, among other things, the alleged dual capacity of the agent, Minor, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant; that the plaintiff knew at the time he employed said Minor as his agent that Minor was acting as the agent of the defendant; that he had first discovered the duplicity of his agent about the first week in November, and immediately notified the plaintiff that he would not take possession of the property and would not carry out the terms of the contract. On the issues thus joined the court found in favor of the plaintiff, and entered an interlocutory judgment declaring the defendant to be indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,400, and that if the same be not paid within 90 days from such entry the plaintiff be awarded judgment terminating the interest of the defendant in and to said contract and property. The defendant failed to make such payment, and the final judgment was entered.

[1] "The appellant contends that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the cross-complaint, and that the findings are defective and insufficient to support the judgment and are not supported by the evidence.

"The demurrer to the cross-complaint was sustained, apparently for the reason that it did not affirmatively appear therefrom that at the time the contract was signed the plaintiff had knowledge or notice that Minor was also the agent of the defendant in the transaction, and on the theory that such knowledge or notice must be shown in order to subject the plaintiff to rescission. We do not so understand the rule. It is well settled in this state that a principal who has no notice or knowledge of the duplicity of his agent may at his option be relieved from the obligations of the contract as against his opposing principal who had notice or knowledge of such dual agency, either by affirmative action in rescinding the contract or by interposing such dual agency as a defense in an action to enforce the contract. Wilson v. Southern Pac. Land Co., 61 Cal. App. 545, 215 P. 396; Newell-Murdoch Realty Co. v. Wickham, 183 Cal. 39, 190 P. 359. In each of those cases the effect of want of knowledge of the dual agency on the part of the defendant principal was referred to but was not determined, for the very obvious reason that in each case the defendant principal had knowledge of the dual capacity of the agent. There is nothing in those cases, nor in any case in this state to which our attention has been directed, which would prevent the approval of the rule in its broader application as announced and declared by text-writers and the courts of other jurisdictions. Professor Mechem, in his work on Agency (2d Ed.) vol. 2, p. 1978, says that if neither principal has knowledge of the dual capacity of the agent, the action of the agent is a fraud on both, and a contract made under such circumstances is voidable at the option of either principal. Again, it is said, on page 1717 of the same volume: '* * * that not even an innocent third party, who is also the principal of the same agent, may be allowed voluntarily to retain benefits or advantages which come to him only through the act of his agent and as the result of that agent's perfidy to his other principal.' Also, on page 1713, we find the following: 'An agent who is relied upon to exercise, in behalf of his principal, his skill, judgment, knowledge or influence, will not be permitted without such principal's full knowledge and consent, to undertake to represent the other party also in the same transaction. Such conduct is a fraud upon his principal, and not only will the agent not be entitled to compensation for services so rendered, but the contract or dealings made or had by the agent, while so acting also for the other party without the knowledge or consent of the principal, are not binding upon the latter, and if they still remain executory, he may repudiate them on that ground, or, if they have been executed in whole or in part, he may by acting promptly and before the rights of innocent parties have intervened, restore the consideration received, rescind the contract and recover back the property or rights with which he has parted under it. It makes no difference that the principal was not in fact injured, or that the agent intended no wrong, or that the other party acted in good faith; the double agency is a fraud upon the principal and he is not bound.' (Italics added.) The rule is supported by cases cited by the author, and cases cited by appellant also approve the rule that such a contract is voidable at the option of either principal. Becker v. Spalinger, 174 Wis. 443, 183 N. W. 173; Ferguson v. Gooch, 94 Va. 1, 26 S. E. 397, 40 L. R. A. 234; Guthrie v. Huntington Chair Co., 71 W. Va. 383, 76 S. E. 795; Evans v. Brown, 33 Okl. 323, 125 P. 469; City of Findlay v. Pertz, 66 F. 427, 13 C. C. A. 559, 29 L. R. A. 188; Black v. Miller, 71 Ill. App. 342; People's Insurance Co. v. Paddon, 8 Ill. App. 447; Fish v. Leser, 69 Ill. 394; McElroy v. Maxwell, 101 Mo. 294, 14 S. W. 1; Greenwood v. Spring, 54 Barb. (N. Y.) 375; March v. Buchan, 46 N. J. Eq. 595, 22 A. 128; Henninger v. Heald, 52 N. J. Eq. 431, 29 A. 190; Arthur v. Georgia Cotton Co., 22 Ga. App. 431, 96 S. E. 232; Vinson et al. v. Pugh, 173 N. C. 189, 91 S. E. 838; Truslow v. Bridge & Terminal Co., 61 W. Va. 628, 57 S. E. 51.

[2-5] "The defendant was entitled to receive, and had the right to expect, absolute fidelity and loyalty to his interest on the part of his agent,

Minor, and under the authorities his engagement with the plaintiff for compensation in the transaction without defendant's knowledge rendered the contract voidable at the option of defendant, even though the plaintiff paid the commission in good faith. As Minor was acting for plaintiff upon a commission basis his interest was adverse to defendant, and the latter could not be charged with this uncommunicated knowledge of the actual conditions. On the other hand, having accepted the advantage obtained under the contract, and seeking to retain such advantage, the plaintiff will not be permitted to disclaim responsibility for the representations and concealments of Minor, his agent. Herdan v. Hanson, 182 Cal. 545, 189 P. 440. The law will not tolerate such a dual agency without the knowledge and consent of both principals. Glenn v. Rice, 174 Cal. 269, 162 P. 1020. No question has been raised upon this appeal as to the sufficiency of the cross-complaint in respect to the allegations thereof showing compliance with the requirements of section 1691 of the Civil Code to entitle a party to rescind, and we are not, therefore, called upon to consider that question. It must be concluded that the cross-complaint states a cause of action, and that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer thereto.

[6] "The appellant attacks the following finding as defective and insufficient: 'That the material allegations contained in paragraphs II, III, and IV of defendant's affirmative defense to plaintiff's amended complaint are not true for the reason that plaintiff advertised and dealt with Minor as the undisclosed agent of defendant, Beck, said Minor representing himself as a real estate broker, and charged plaintiff $50 as commission for his services in the sale of said property.'

"Paragraph I of the affirmative defense alleges that at the time the contract was signed the defendant was engaged in dealing in real estate on his own account, and in the conduct of his said business employed Minor as his agent to examine real estate offered for sale and to represent him in the examination, purchase, and sale of the same; that the plaintiff reposed confidence in the ability and integrity of his agent in connection with his business, and relied upon the judgment and representations of said agent. Paragraph II alleges certain representations made by Minor to the defendant concerning the transactions. Some of the allegations of this paragraph are immaterial. Paragraph III alleges that the plaintiff well knew that Minor was acting as the agent of the defendant upon an agreed compensation; that the plaintiff paid Minor $50 commission in the transaction; that the defendant had no knowledge of the duplicity of the agent in relation to the purchase and sale of said property, and did not discover the facts surrounding the transaction until about the first week in November, 1920, whereupon the defendant informed plaintiff that he would not receive or take possession of said house and lot and would not carry out the terms of such contract as set forth in the complaint. Paragraph IV alleges that the defendant at no time received or took possession of the house and lot, and that the plaintiff has at all times been in possession and control thereof, and that by reason of the fraud practiced upon the defendant the contract is void and of no effect. It will thus be seen that the allegations of the paragraphs referred to go to the very heart of the defense. 'The option to avoid the contract remained complete until the action was begun and was then available as a defense to the action.' Newell-Murdoch Realty Co. v. Wickham, supra.

"The finding that the material allegations contained in the paragraphs mentioned are not true is uncertain. No one may know what allegations were deemed material. Such an omnibus finding is insufficient for any purpose. Holt Mfg. Co. v. Collins, 154 Cal. 276, 97 P. 516; Turner v. Turner, 187 Cal. 632, 203 P. 109. The reason assigned by the court for the finding as incorporated therein does not cure the uncertainty. Even if the facts recited in the reason for the finding were true, it would not follow that the allegations of said paragraphs of the affirmative defense might not also be true. If those allegations were found to be true, the facts thus established would be a defense to said action.

[7] "When the trial court has failed to make findings this court is not authorized to do so. Where, under the pleadings and evidence, findings not made are necessary to the proper determination of the rights of the parties a new trial will be ordered (Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 P. 1017, 45 P. 252). From what has been said concerning the finding complained of we do not wish to be understood as deciding that the evidence is sufficient to support a finding that the allegations of said paragraphs are not true. On the contrary, it may be said that said allegations were established without conflict in the evidence except the allegation of paragraph III to the effect that at the time of the signing of the contract the plaintiff knew that Minor was the agent of the defendant in the transaction. This allegation the court found to be not true. But under the law and the facts as here shown that finding was not sufficient to support a judgment against Beck."

It is conceded on behalf of the respondent that the principal question involved in this case is one of first impression in this state, and it is insisted that it is the first case in the United States involving the point of setting aside a transaction of purchase and sale on the ground of the dual employment of an agent where both principals were unaware of such dual employment. It is suggested that the consequences flowing from a holding that a transaction involving such duplicity of an agent may be rescinded at the instance of either principal would be disastrous in all dealings wherein agents and brokers are employed, as, for instance, in two illustrations suggested by the respondent: First, in the case of stockbrokers, where the purchaser, desiring to acquire the ownership of a certain kind of stock, agrees to compensate the broker for procuring such stock, the seller also paying a commission; and, secondly, in the case of one desiring to purchase a home or property for industrial or other particular purposes, who employs a real estate agent to procure the same for him, the seller also paying a commission in the same transaction. But the results contemplated by respondent would seem to be more imaginary than real. In the case of a stockbrokerage business, it is stated by appellant to be a matter of common knowledge, and such statement is not denied, that persons handling transactions in that line of endeavor, by long established custom, may collect compensation or a commission from both buyer and seller, in which event they are in the class of known joint agents, for each principal is charged with knowledge of the custom.

[8] Likewise, it may be said that in the case of the purchase and sale of real estate it is a matter of common knowledge that the seller usually pays a commission, and that the parties to the transaction in the case at bar were charged with notice of that custom. But we find no sound basis for the conclusion that the appellant under such circumstances was negligent in not notifying the respondent not to pay Minor a commission, for the appellant had the right to rely upon the presumed good faith of Minor, and to rest assured that he would not violate his trust and breach the duty which the law imposed upon him. The facts in the case at bar do not present a situation where either principal may be charged with negligence in his relations with the other. It is not intimated that either innocent principal would have a cause of action for damages against the other on account of the duplicity of the common agent. Rather, the facts herein present a situation in which sound public policy demands that a transaction attended by such duplicity and concealment on the part of an agent as against both innocent principals may not be permitted to stand when, at the instance of either principal, the status quo may be restored. In such cases the personal and selfish interest of the agent is opposed to the interest of both principals. His concern is to see that the transaction is consummated in order to obtain his double commission. By reason of the fiduciary relation to both principals, he is, as to both, in such a peculiar position of trust and confidence that his advice and activities would be influenced by his own self-interest. It is immaterial that these results may not necessarily follow. It is enough that they are likely to follow. It is the policy of the law not to permit an agent to assume a position that will result in such a strain on his honesty. The protection of the public against such duplicity is the foundation for the rule. To deny the right of rescission to either innocent principal would necessarily result in a denial to both, and thus place the parties at the mercy of an unscrupulous agent. It is of no consequence that no fraud was actually intended by the agent, or that the rescinding party suffered no injury. Black v. Miller, supra.

In some of the cases above cited as approving the rule that a contract resulting from dual agency unknown to both principals is voidable at the option of either principal, it did not appear that the duplicity of the agent was unknown to the defending principal. In our consideration of those cases that fact was recognized. Others, however, as for example, the case of Marsh v. Buchan, supra, are directly in point. Although in some of the cases cited the defending principal had or was chargeable with notice of the dual agency, the discussion of the principles of law surrounding such inconsistent relationship recognized the right of either innocent principal to rescind, provided the defending principal could be placed in his former position.

The case of Blair v. Baird, 43 Tex. Civ. App. 134, 94 S. W. 116, relied on by respondent, is not in point, for the reason that, under the express terms of the contract between the parties, the agent was a joint agent appointed as and known to be such by both parties. Other cases cited on behalf of respondent have been noted, but an examination thereof discloses that they are not out of harmony with the rule as herein approved.

Finally, the respondent contends that a principal can only be held liable for the acts of his agent when the same are within the scope of his authority. It is conceded in this case that neither principal knew of the employment of the agent, Minor, by the other, and it may be assumed that it was beyond the scope of the authority of such agent, as to each principal, to enter the employment of the other without the consent of both; but, when the agent had done so, and thus exceeded his authority, it was optional with either principal to refuse to be bound by his acts and to rescind the transaction. When, as here, the respondent is standing on the contract, is insisting on his right to retain the benefits and advantages gained thereby, and is contending herein for his right to retain the same after full notice of his agent's duplicity, he will not be permitted to disclaim responsibility for the representations and concealments of said agent. Herdan v. Hanson, supra.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial, with instructions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer to the cross-complaint.

CUNNINGHAM v. ROBINSON et al.
(Sac. 3643.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1925.)

1. Principal and agent ⇐146(2)—Person, buying interest of partnership and assuming debts, not relieved from personal liability for debts so assumed, because he acted as undisclosed agent of another.

Under Civ. Code, § 2854, making creditor entitled to benefit of securities held by surety, where person bought interest in partnership and assumed debt evidenced by note and secured by chattel mortgage, he was not relieved from personal liability, because he acted as undisclosed agent of another.

2. Principal and agent ⇐145(4) — Creditor may hold person assuming debt liable or look to undisclosed principal for whom he acted.

Where person bought interest in partnership and assumed obligation of paying partnership debts, evidenced by note and secured by chattel mortgage, creditor may hold such person liable for payment of debt or look to undisclosed principal for whom he acted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by Richard Cunningham against F. E. Robinson and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, which denied entry or docketing of any deficiency judgment against defendant J. M. Jones, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with instructions.

John R. Connelly, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Elliott & Atkinson, of Sacramento, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is by the plaintiff upon the judgment roll and is from that portion of the judgment which fails to adjudge and decree that the defendant and respondent herein, J. M. Jones, is personally liable to the plaintiff upon the obligation sued upon by him herein, and that in that respect the said judgment is not supported by but is, as a matter of law, inconsistent with the findings of fact. The facts of the case, as they appear from the findings, are briefly these: On January 31, 1921, the defendants F. E. Robinson and B. D. Huff, who were copartners, executed and delivered their individual promissory note to the plaintiff herein for the sum of $400, payable on or before December 1, 1921, with interest and counsel fees, and at the time of the execution and delivery of said promissory note, and for the purpose of securing the payment thereof, also executed and delivered to the plaintiff their chattel mortgage upon certain personal property. Thereafter and on June 27, 1921, the defendant Huff, for a valuable consideration, assigned and transferred all of his right, title, and interest in the copartnership and also all of his right, title, and interest in and to the property covered by said mortgage to the defendant and respondent herein, J. M. Jones, who at the time of said assignment and transfer and as a part of the consideration therefore assumed in writing and promised and agreed to pay the obligation of said B. D. Huff created by the latter's aforesaid execution and delivery of said promissory note to the plaintiff herein. Thereafter, the said promissory note not having been paid, the plaintiff commenced this action for a recovery thereon, for the foreclosure of the mortgage given as security therefor, and for a deficiency judgment against the defendants Robinson, Huff, and Jones, in the event that the sale of the security should be insufficient to satisfy the judgment. The defendant Huff defaulted.

The defendant Jones appeared and set up as a defense to said action that at the time of the assignment and transfer to him by said Huff of all of his interest in said copartnership and in the property covered by plaintiff's mortgage, and at the time of the assumption by said Jones of the obligations of said Huff, and of his promise to pay the same, he, the said Jones, was secretly acting as the undisclosed agent for one W. C. Robinson, and that engaging in said transaction as a principal he did so for the use and benefit of said Robinson and solely as his agent, and that the secret relationship between himself and the said Robinson was unknown to any one other than themselves. The trial court, in addition to its other findings, found this to be the fact, and thereupon in its conclusions of law, which were generally in favor of the plaintiff as between himself and the other defendants, found that as to the defendant Jones he was not personally liable to the plaintiff. In its judgment, which otherwise followed the findings in plaintiff's favor, the court directed that whatever deficiency judgment should exist after the sale of the mortgaged property and the application of the proceeds thereof pro tanto to the payment of the plaintiff's judgment, should be docketed against the defendants Robinson and Huff, but that as to the defendant Jones the court failed to direct the entry or docketing of any deficiency judgment against him. It is from the latter portion of said judgment that the plaintiff has prosecuted this appeal.
